Turning now to the Law of Property Act, 1925, by section 39 the provisions set out in the First Schedule to the Act are to have effect "for the purpose of effecting the transition from the law existing prior to the commencement of the Law of Property Act, 1922, to the law enacted by that Act (as amended)." These provisions therefore are to mould what had been done under the law as it existed before 1922 into conformity with the new system. By section 39 (4) the appropriate provisions in the schedule are to apply for "subjecting land held in undivided shares to trusts for sale." This same heading is placed before the group of provisions in Part IV. of Schedule I. The question is which of these provisions applies to the present case. Before the commencement of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the land of the vendors was not settled land; but it was "immediately before the commencement of this Act held at law or in equity in undivided shares vested in possession." Does sub-paragraph (2) or sub-paragraph (3) of the subsequent sub-paragraphs in Part IV. apply?

In order to answer this question it seems right to bear in mind the purpose for which these transitional clauses are introduced as already stated, and to repeat the opening words of Part IV. of the schedule immediately before each sub-paragraph, whether (2) or (3). The result of this is that the land which is to be operated upon by the sub-paragraph is land which is regarded as it was immediately before the commencement of the Act, and that same land is the land affected by the operation of the later words. Can the time at which this same land is to be regarded be changed in the same sentence without clear words to that effect? I think not. "Before the commencement of this Act" is the dominant time at which the land is considered and affected by these transitional clauses. In this view the words "not being settled land" must also be attributed to the time immediately before the commencement of the Act. It may be that these words are unnecessary or tautologous, but it seems difficult to put a construction upon them which brings into the ambit of the clause land considered as it was before the commencement of the Act and, a few words later, considered as it is under the operation of the new Act, without any indication that the land is to be regarded at two different moments of time with inconsistent results. This is a part of the Act which is intended to deal with transition, and to formulate how land held as it was immediately before the commencement of the Act can be brought under the new system. It is such land upon which the transition is to work. A sufficient meaning can in my judgment be given to the words "not being settled land," if they are taken as indicating a caution, or nota bene, that sub-paragraph (2) in question does not deal with settled land. As to that, the next clause is the operative one. This construction is in accord with the ordinary canons of construction and leads to no hardship upon the vendors.

Two objections are raised to this construction. The first is that under the interpretation clause—section 205, subsection 1 (xxvi.), of the Law of Property Act, 1925—"settled land" is to have the meaning given to it by section 2 and section 1 (1) (v) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, so that land, subject to such a jointure as Blackacre is, is to be deemed "settled land." This definition applies, however, only unless the context otherwise requires, and the difficulty already pointed out of interpreting Schedule I., Part IV., paragraph 1, sub-paragraph (2), in the manner suggested appears to me to indicate that the context does "otherwise require." The second objection is that section 35 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, militates against the interpretation of the sub-paragraph that I have adopted. That section expresses the meaning of the "statutory trusts." The trustees are to sell and stand possessed of the net proceeds of sale after deductions named have been made "upon such trusts and subject to such powers and provisions as may be requisite for giving effect to the rights of the persons . . . interested in the land." These persons are defined to include "an incumbrancer . . . whose incumbrance is not secured by a legal mortgage." It is said that the jointress in the present case is such a person, for her incumbrance is not secured by a legal mortgage. She, therefore, fulfils one limb of the definition. It is, however, a definition, and only a definition, which may enable an incumbrancer's rights to be considered; but, per se, it does not confer new rights, and the trustees for sale are to hold the net proceeds only subject to such powers as may be requisite for giving effect to rights. If the rights of the jointress are not imperilled, it is not requisite to give effect to her rights to withhold the purchase-money from the vendors.

The three vendors held the land subject to the rentcharge. The extent of their estate is not enlarged. They convey it subject to the rentcharge, which is protected by paragraph 1, sub-paragraph (8), of this same Part IV. of the schedule, and no such power as of withholding the purchase-money is requisite to give effect to the rights of the jointress after sale. Mr. Justice Astbury's judgment turned upon his feeling unable to accept the interpretation as to the meaning of "not being settled land" in sub-paragraph (2), which I have adopted, and he gives reasons for his view derived from some difficulties or problems that may arise if the interpretation contended for by the vendors is accepted. I am conscious that I have not referred to or dealt with all of them; but such difficulties and problems must be considered when they arise in a concrete form. It may be that even yet another amending Act may be required to get rid of difficulties arising as the sequel to the interpretation given to the more fundamental clauses of the Acts. I will only add that I have had an opportunity of considering Lord Justice Sargant's judgment, and I agree with the view that he has expressed upon the other points raised and dealt with by him. The appeal is allowed, and the order will be as stated by Lord Justice Sargant.

Lord Justice Sargant.—The present appeal involves the determination of important questions under the Law of Property Act, 1925, and relates particularly to the effect of the transitional provisions of section 39 of the Act as affecting land held in undivided shares. The three appellants are the vendors, and the respondent is the purchaser under a contract dated February 13, 1926, for the sale of certain freehold land which has throughout been referred to as Blackacre. The origin and nature of the estate and interest of the appellants in this land are sufficiently indicated in the following paragraphs, which are substantially taken from the report of this case in the Court below ([1927] 1 Ch., 509).

In April, 1924, under and by virtue of a resettlement of July 14, 1866, a marriage settlement of November 6, 1869 (appointing a jointure of £2,500 per annum to the wife for life and a term of 1,000 years to secure it), a marriage settlement of July 19, 1897, and a disentail of March 10, 1920, certain freehold estates, including Blackacre, stood limited (subject to a £2,500 jointure and term to secure payment of the same) to such uses as the Duke of Marlborough and the Marquess of Blandford should jointly appoint. By a conveyance on sale dated April 14, 1924, the Duke of Marlborough and the Marquess of Blandford appointed Blackacre to the three vendors in fee simple as tenants in common in equal shares subject to the jointure but with an indemnity therefor. In this state of things, the vendors by a contract dated February 13, 1926, agreed to sell Blackacre to the purchaser for £1,700 subject to the jointure but with the benefit of the indemnity therefor. Apart from the legislation which had come into operation on January 1, 1926, there would have been no difficulty in carrying out this contract, conveying the land to the purchaser, and giving a good receipt for the purchase-money. But some difficulties have been introduced by this legislation, and particularly by that part of it which relates to undivided shares in land. Section 34 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, prohibits in general the creation of an undivided share in land, and provides that where after the commencement of that Act land is expressed to be conveyed to any persons in undivided shares and these persons (as was the case here) are of full age and not more than four in number, the conveyance shall operate as if the land had been expressed to be conveyed to the grantees as joint tenants upon the statutory trusts thereinafter mentioned, being trusts for the sale by the grantees of the land held by them under the conveyance. Section 39 of the same Act, which is headed by the phrase "Transitional Provisions," enacts, so far as material, as follows: "For the purpose of effecting the transition from the law existing prior to the commencement of the Law of Property Act, 1922, to the law enacted by that Act as amended"—such last-mentioned law being identical, for the present purpose at least, with the law enacted by the Law of Property Act, 1925—"the provisions set out in the

First Schedule to this Act shall have effect . . . (4) for subjecting land held in undivided shares to trusts for sale. . . ."

Part IV. of the First Schedule to the Act is headed by the words "Provisions subjecting land held in undivided shares to a Trust for Sale," and provides, amongst other things, as follows: Paragraph 1. "Where immediately before the commencement of this Act land is held at law or in equity in undivided shares vested in possession, the following provisions shall have effect. . . . (2) If the entirety of the land (not being settled land) is vested absolutely and beneficially in not more than four persons of full age entitled thereto in undivided shares free from incumbrances affecting undivided shares but subject or not to incumbrances affecting the entirety, it shall by virtue of this Act vest in them as joint tenants upon the statutory trusts." On the other hand, in the event of the entirety of the land being settled land provision is made by sub-paragraph (3) of paragraph 1 for its vesting in the trustees of the settlement if any, or, until there should be such trustees, in the Public Trustee, and in either event upon the statutory trusts, and further, in any case to which the previous provisions of Part IV. do not apply, it is provided by sub-paragraph (4) of paragraph 1 that the land shall vest in the Public Trustee upon the statutory trusts.

In this state of things the first question to be determined is who are the persons in whom Blackacre became vested under these transitional provisions? Did it vest under sub-paragraph (2) in the three vendors as joint tenants upon the statutory trusts? Or did it vest under sub-paragraph (3) or sub-paragraph (4)? At first sight the answer would seem to be quite simple and straightforward. The entirety of Blackacre was, immediately before the commencement of the Act, vested absolutely and beneficially in the three vendors; it was not then "settled land," and it was subject only to an incumbrance, namely, the jointure, affecting the entirety. And apparently, therefore, it complied with all the requisites of sub-paragraph (2) and would have been converted by the statute from being vested in the vendors as tenants in common to being vested in them as joint tenants upon the statutory trusts. This prima facie view was, however, controverted by the purchaser's advisers. They asserted that in the construction of Part IV. of the First Schedule the phrase "settled land" must, by virtue of section 205 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, have the same meaning as in the Settled Land Act, 1925; they pointed out that under section 2 and section 1 (1) (v) of the Settled Land Act, 1925, land subject to such a jointure as Blackacre was "settled land"; and they drew the conclusion, which has been accepted by the learned Judge, that the entirety of the land vested, under the provisions of sub-paragraph (3) of paragraph 1, Part IV. of the First Schedule, in the trustees of the settlement, or intermediately in the Public Trustee. In my judgment, however, this construction gives too rigid an effect to the definition of "settled land" in subsection (1) of section 205 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. Under that subsection the expression "settled land" and the other expressions in the subsection are given the meanings thereby assigned to them only "unless the context otherwise requires." Now the transitional provisions in Part IV. are for the very purpose of changing the legal position existing before the Act into a new legal position, to take effect under and subsequently to the Act. And, when in the course of so doing the Act defines the position existing before the Act, the definition must naturally, and indeed almost inevitably, refer to the law as it stood before the Act and can hardly, without some confusion of thought, be importing into that definition a state of law which is only to exist after the Act. In sub-paragraph (2) itself the land dealt with is defined as land the entirety of which "(not being settled land) is vested . . . in undivided shares." The last part of this definition obviously refers to the status of the land before the Act, and cannot refer to a status incapable of existing after the Act. It is therefore inconsistent with the context to apply to that part of the definition which consists of the words "not being settled land" a meaning derived from the new law introduced by the Act itself. The result would be a mongrel definition, involving a mixture of the old law and the new law, which is wholly unsatisfactory.

Perhaps there should be noticed here, if only for the purpose of rejection, a somewhat subtle argument for the purchaser, of the following nature. It is said that the words "(not being settled land)" in sub-paragraph (2) imply that the sub-paragraph includes not only land which is not settled land but some land which is settled land; that if the phrase "settled land" here has reference to the law existing before the Act there could not be any settled land falling within the definition in sub-paragraph (2), while if it has reference to the law as changed by the Act it might be satisfied by such a state of things as existed here with reference to Blackacre; and that therefore the language of the sub-paragraph is better satisfied by reading the expression "settled land" as referring to the new law. But this argument neglects the consideration that the sub-paragraph deals with both of two alternatives, namely, that of the land being free from incumbrances and that of the land being subject to incumbrances. Even under the new law the land, if free from incumbrances, would be no more settled land than under the old law; and therefore in the case of the first alternative the implication said to be involved in the use of the phrase "(not being settled land)" would be no better satisfied by reading the phrase "settled land" as referring to the new law rather than to the old. But in truth the subtleties considered in the last preceding paragraph are based upon a suggestion of implication which is too slight to prevail against the more obvious inferences to be drawn from the fact that sub-paragraph (2) is, as already pointed out, an enactment converting an existing legal position under the old law into a new legal position under the new law; and, if sub-paragraph (2) is closely compared with sub-paragraph (3), it seems reasonably clear that they constitute alternative provisions, and that while sub-paragraph (3) deals exclusively with the case of the entirety of the land being settled land, sub-paragraph (2) deals exclusively with the entirety of the land being unsettled land. In other words, the words in brackets "(not being settled land)" in sub-paragraph (2) are merely descriptive of the land being dealt with by that sub-paragraph, and the commencing words of the sub-paragraph are precisely correlative and alternative to the commencing words of sub-paragraph (3), and mean: "If the entirety of the land is not settled land and is vested," &c. This construction merely imputes some slight clumsiness of expression to the drafting of sub-paragraph (2) and in all other respects seems far more satisfactory than the construction suggested for the purchaser.

So far, then, the result is that on January 1, 1926, Blackacre became vested, subject to the jointure and to the term of years for securing it, but with the benefit of the indemnity against it, in the vendors as joint tenants in fee simple upon the statutory trusts for sale; and the natural conclusion would seem to be that they could sell what they had got, namely, the fee simple of Blackacre, subject to and indemnified against this existing incumbrance, and carry out their contract. But here again the purchaser raises a difficulty which, as stated by her counsel, may be summarized as follows. It is contended that under section 35 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the jointress here is a person whose incumbrance is not secured by a legal mortgage and would attach to the net proceeds of sale in the hands of the vendors as trustees for sale; that under section 28 of the same Act trustees for sale are to have the powers of sale of a tenant for life under the Settled Land Act, 1925, and that these powers when exercised are to operate to overreach any equitable interests made to attach to the net proceeds of sale; that tenants for life of the compound settlement said to exist in Blackacre could overreach the equitable interests of the jointress under section 38 and section 72 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, if they caused trustees to be appointed of the compound settlement and allowed the purchase-money to be paid to them; and accordingly that the vendors cannot sell and convey to the purchaser subject to the jointure, but are bound to sell and convey freed from the jointure and to allow the purchase-money to be paid to the trustees of the compound settlement when appointed. This argument is an elaborate and ingenious one; but, in my judgment, when carefully examined it breaks down at every stage. In the first place, section 35 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, is obviously aimed at giving corresponding rights in the net proceeds of sale to incumbrancers whose rights in the land are disturbed by the sale; it does not apply to a case such as this where the sale is made subject to the incumbrance. In such a case it is not "requisite" to give "effect to the rights of the person . . . interested in the land" by giving rights against the net purchase-money. For the rights of the incumbrancer in the land are left entirely unaffected by the sale. Next, section 28, subsection (1), of the Law of Property Act, 1925, does not apply; for, inasmuch as the equitable interest of the jointress will not attach to the net proceeds of sale, the exercise of the powers conferred by that subsection will not operate to overreach the equitable interest of the jointress. Again, it is at the least extremely doubtful whether the documents creating the jointure can be coupled with the statutory trust for sale under Part IV. of the First Schedule to the Law of Property Act, 1925, so as to form a compound settlement within section 1 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, especially in view of the provision introduced into that section by "a minor amendment" in the Schedule to the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, namely, "(7). This section does not apply to land held upon trust for sale." And lastly, even if Blackacre is held from and after January 1, 1926, under a compound settlement, yet section 1 of the Law of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, expressly allows the conveyance of settled land subject to a prior interest when the land had previously to January 1, 1926, been conveyed to a purchaser subject to the prior interest, whether with exoneration from or indemnity against the prior interest or not.

In my view no importance is to be attached in connexion with this case to the inconvenience or inconsistency that may arise in the case of two married women entitled before January 1, 1926, to land in fee simple as tenants in common with in each case a restraint on anticipation. It may be that in a very unusual case of this kind difficulties may arise and the protection of one or other of the married women may be endangered. If so, this is the result, in one exceptional case, of the drastic legislation which converts tenancies in common into joint tenancies upon trust for sale. It cannot alter the general construction of the transitional provisions of the Act with regard to land held in undivided shares.

In conclusion I desire to add that the learned Judge attached undue weight to certain expressions in a text-book written by a well-known conveyancer. Such expressions are no authority as to the construction and effect of recent legislation; at the most they can only be adopted by counsel as embodying their argument or by the Court as representing its ultimate view. Nor is any importance to be attributed to the views of the writer because he may be recognized as the draftsman of the statute in question. On the contrary, that very fact may disable him from taking an unbiased view of the expressions used in the Act.

In my judgment the order appealed from should be discharged and it should be declared that the requisitions and objections of the purchaser have been sufficiently answered, and that the vendors have shown a good title to the property in accordance with the contract. The purchaser must pay the costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgments which have just been delivered by my Lords. I agree with them, and have nothing to add.

WOOD v. BURKE.*

Insurance (National)—Summary proceedings—Question of insurability — Reference to Minister — Adjournment — Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), s. 22 (7)—National Health Insurance Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 38), s. 97 (4).

The requirements of s. 22 (7) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, and of s. 97 (4) of the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, are imperative. Therefore if in any summary proceedings under either Act the insurability of any person becomes material, and has not been decided by the Minister, the justices must forthwith refer the question to him and adjourn the hearing pending a final decision.

Informations were preferred by Sidney Wood (hereinafter called "the appellant") under section 96 (2) of the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and section 22 (2) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, against Rachael Burke (hereinafter called

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"the respondent") for that she, the respondent, did :—

(a) On January 9, 1926, within the County Borough of Walsall fail to pay a contribution in respect of the week commencing on December 28, 1925, which she was liable to pay under the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, in respect of an employed contributor, to wit, Elizabeth Bailey, contrary to section 96 (2) of the said Act and the regulations made thereunder ;

(b) On May 10, 1926, within the County Borough aforesaid fail to pay a contribution on May 10, 1926, which she was liable to pay under the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, in respect of an employed contributor, to wit, Elizabeth Bailey, contrary to section 96 (2) of the said Act, and the regulations made thereunder ;

(c) On May 10, 1926, within the County Borough aforesaid, did fail to pay a contribution in respect of the week commencing on May 10, 1926, which she was liable to pay under the Unemployment Insurance Acts, 1920 to 1925, in respect of an employed person, to wit, Elizabeth Bailey, contrary to the Unemployment Insurance Acts, 1920 to 1925, and the regulations made thereunder.

The informations were heard and dismissed on September 13, 1926.

Upon the hearing of the said informations the following facts were proved :—

(a) That the said Elizabeth Bailey (wife of William Bailey) had been employed as a lodging house deputy from August 1, 1925, for a period of 13 months and had received living accommodation, one room for herself, husband, and one child, and coal in return for her services, but received no wages or other money payment whatsoever ;

(b) That the said Elizabeth Bailey was employed part-time only and that her duties included the making of beds for three single men, cleaning five bed rooms and a kitchen, keeping a register, collecting money from lodgers and paying it over to the respondent ; in addition she attended to domestic and other household duties for her husband, child, and herself during the daytime and to her own private affairs ;

(c) That the said Elizabeth Bailey's husband with whom she was living, was in receipt of £1 per week from the Guardians which went to the joint support of himself and his wife and child ;

(d) That the said Elizabeth Bailey on or about April 5, 1926, handed to the respondent her unemployment card, and requested her to stamp it, that the card was not stamped for the weeks in respect of which the charges were preferred, and that Elizabeth Bailey was employed during the said weeks.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that there was a contract of service between the respondent and Elizabeth Bailey and that the employment of the said Elizabeth Bailey was within the meaning of Part I. (a) of the First Schedule to the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and Part I. (a) of the First Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, and as such was insurable.

On the part of the respondent it was contended :—

(1) That the said Elizabeth Bailey received no money or other wages payment whatsoever as required by Part I. (a) of the First Schedule to the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and Part I. (a) of the First Schedule of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920.

(2) That the employment of the said Elizabeth Bailey with the respondent was of a subsidiary nature and not as her principal means of livelihood, she being supported by her husband, William Bailey, and that she was exempt from insurance under the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, and

(3) That the employment of Elizabeth Bailey as a lodging-house deputy was equivalent to that of a caretaker where no wages were paid or other money payments were made and as such was excepted by Part II. (m) of the First Schedule to the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and Part VII. of the First Schedule to the National Health Insurance (Subsidiary Employments) Consolidated Order, 1924, and Part II. (j) of the First Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, and Part VII. of the First Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance (Subsidiary Employments) Special Order, 1925.

It was contended that it therefore became necessary for the determination of the proceedings that the question whether the said Elizabeth Bailey was an employed person within the meaning of the said Acts should be decided, and on the part of the appellant application was made to the justices for the adjournment of the informations pending reference to the Minister of Health and the Minister of Labour under section 97 (4) of the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and section 22 (7) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, respectively, for decisions by the said Ministers in accordance therewith, inasmuch as no decision of the said Ministers on the question aforesaid had theretofore been obtained. The said application was refused.

In the justices' opinion :

(1) The employment of the said Elizabeth Bailey was excepted by Part II. (m) of the First Schedule to the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and Part VII. of the First Schedule to the National Health Insurance (Subsidiary Employments) Consolidated Order, 1924, and Part II. (j) of the First Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, and Part VII. of the First Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance (Subsidiary Employments) Special Order, 1925 ; and

(2) They were not bound under section 97 (4) of the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, and section 22 (7) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, to adjourn the informations for reference to the respective Ministers for their decisions on the question of insurability.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

By the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, section 97 (4) : "In any summary proceedings under this Act whether for an offence or for the recovery of any sum as a civil debt the decision of the Minister on any question whether or not a person is or was an employed person or is or was the employer of an employed contributor within the meaning of this Act shall, unless an appeal against the decision is pending or the time for appealing against the decision has not expired, be conclusive for the purpose of those proceedings, and, if such a decision has not been obtained, and the decision of the question is necessary for the determination of the proceedings, the question shall be referred to the Minister for decision in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and, where any such appeal is pending, or the time for so appealing has not expired or any question has been so referred to the Minister, the Court dealing with the case shall adjourn the proceedings until such time as a final decision on the question has been obtained."

Section 22 (7) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, is, so far as material, in identical terms.

Mr. Harold Murphy appeared for the appellant; the respondent was unrepresented.

Mr. MURPHY said that a very similar question had been before the Court in the unreported case of Jones v. Martin, on July 24, 1925. That case arose under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, only, but the sections were identical. In Jones v. Martin there had been a decision of the Minister that the employee was insurable in September, but the justices held that they were entitled to inquire into the circumstances of his employment and to determine whether he was insurable in July. He submitted that the language of the sections was imperative.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—In my opinion this appeal ought to be allowed. In the Court below it had become necessary that the question whether Bailey was an insured person should be decided and accordingly an application was made to the justices to adjourn the case for the decision of the Ministers, inasmuch as no decision had been given. The justices rejected that application and held that they were not bound to adjourn the case for reference to the respective Ministers. In other words they undertook themselves the task which, under the statutes, is reserved to the Ministers, subject to an appeal to the High Court. It is not necessary to read the sections again. They are perfectly clear, and I think that the view which the justices formed was in the teeth of them, and that this appeal must be allowed.

Mr. Justice SHEARMAN.—I am of the same opinion. In view of the plain language of the statutes, the duty of the justices is clear: they must refer the question to the Minister, and having referred it must take the consequential step and adjourn the hearing.

Mr. Justice MACKINNON.—I agree.

[Solicitor—The Solicitor to the Ministry of Health.]

NOTE.—The following are the judgments delivered in the case of heard before Lord Hewart, C.J., Avory and Shearman, JJ., on July 24, 1925.

JONES v. MARTIN

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This appeal ought, I think, to be allowed.

Here, not to repeat unnecessarily the facts of the case, there has been a decision of the Minister, dated September 29, 1924, whereby it was held that Mr. Morgan as a carter and haulier had an employment within the meaning of the Act. But the date of the alleged offence, the default in payment, and these proceedings, was earlier than that—namely, July 5, 1924. In these circumstances one of two consequences followed. Either it appeared upon the evidence that the man's employment at July 5 was the same as his employment in September, 1924, when the decision of the Minister was given, or it did not. In the first case there was a decision of the Minister upon the point. In the second case there was need of a decision of the Minister to decide a question necessary for the determination of the proceedings. The Justices here seem in effect to have said that the decision of the Minister of September, 1924, did not relate back to July, 1924, and therefore, they themselves undertook the burden of deciding whether Morgan's employment in July, 1924, came within the Act or not. But that question, no less than the question as at September, 1924, is a question, not for the justices, but for the Minister. I think, therefore, that this appeal ought to be allowed and the case should go back to the justices with the direction that, if the facts are not such as to show that the decision of September, 1924, is dealing with the very same employment as that which was being carried on by Morgan in July, 1924, there is need for another decision, and that decision must be the decision of the Minister and should be referred to him in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

Mr. Justice AVORY.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

Mr. Justice SHEARMAN.—I agree.

SEYMOUR v. REED.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Profit or gain—Professional cricketer's benefit—Proceeds—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule E.

The House (Lord Atkinson dissenting) held that the proceeds of a professional cricketer's benefit match did not, in the circumstances, constitute an income, profit, or gain assessable to income-tax, since they were a personal gift and not a remuneration.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 514; [1927] 1 K.B., 90) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 514; [1927] 1 K.B., 90) reversing by a majority an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (42 The Times L.R., 377; [1926] 1 K.B., 588) affirming a decision of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for Lower South Aylesford, Kent.

The appellant was a well-known cricketer in the employment of the Kent County Cricket Club, and the question for determination was whether he was assessable under Schedule E, rule 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of a sum of £939 odd, being the net proceeds derived from a benefit match played at Canterbury in 1920 under the direction of the club for the benefit of the appellant.

The club's regulations for the staff contained a provision as to benefits and tours. That provision (so far as material) was as follows:—

"(1) The committee reserve to themselves an absolute and unfettered discretion as regards benefit matches, the collection of subscriptions in connexion with such matches, and dealing with the net proceeds of such matches in any way they may think desirable in the interest of the beneficiaire."

If a professional cricketer was granted a benefit, it was granted on the express understanding that he should allow the proceeds to be invested in the names of the trustees of the club during the pleasure of the committee. The income derived from the invested proceeds was paid to the beneficiaire. The invested sum was always handed over to the professional cricketer when his career as a cricketer was over, or when he found an investment, such as a share in a business or a farm, of which the trustees approved.

* Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The net proceeds derived from the benefit match, together with certain other sums obtained by public subscriptions, were invested by the club in the purchase of certain investments at a total price of £1,492 odd. The dividends on those investments, from 1921 to 1923, less income-tax, were received by the club and paid over to the appellant. Certificates of deduction of income-tax from the dividends were furnished to the appellant by the secretary of the club and the appellant preferred claims for repayment of income-tax for the relevant years, on the footing that the dividends formed part of his income.

In 1923 the investments were realized and the proceeds, amounting, with the addition of certain other moneys, to £1,914 odd, were paid by the club to the appellant and applied by him, with the approval of the trustees of the club, to the purchase of a farm.

In 1923 the appellant was assessed, under Schedule E, in the sum of £939 odd for the year 1920-1921 in respect of the net proceeds derived from the benefit match.

On appeal, the General Commissioners discharged the assessment, and their decision was affirmed by Mr. Justice Rowlatt, on the ground that the money in question was a personal gift and not such remuneration as would constitute income for the purposes of income-tax.

The Court of Appeal by a majority (the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Warrington, Lord Justice Sargant dissenting) reversed the decisions of Mr. Justice Rowlatt and the General Commissioners.

Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. W. T. Monckton appeared for the appellant; and the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), and Mr. R. P. Hills for the respondent.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords: In this case James Seymour, a professional cricketer, appeals against a judgment of the Court of Appeal in England by which, differing from the Commissioners for the General Purposes of Income Tax and from Mr. Justice Rowlatt, they held the appellant liable for income-tax in respect of the net proceeds of a benefit cricket match.

In the year 1920 the appellant, who had been for many years in the employment of the Kent County Cricket Club at a salary and had played fine cricket, was allowed by the club to have a benefit match, the match selected being the Kent v. Hampshire match played in the Canterbury week. The club's regulations for the staff contained the following provisions:—

"Benefits and Tours.

"The committee reserve to themselves an absolute and unfettered discretion as regards benefit matches, the collection of subscriptions in connexion with such matches, and dealing with the net proceeds of such matches in any way they may think desirable in the interest of the beneficiaire. The committee also reserve the like discretion in regard to granting permission to any player to go on winter tour and in regard to dealing with remuneration receivable by him on account of such tour."

The gate money received at the match in question, less some expenses, amounted to £939 16s. 11d., and this sum, together with other sums obtained by public subscription, was invested by the direction of the committee in certain securities, of which the income (less tax) for the years 1921, 1922, and 1923 was paid to the appellant. In the year 1923 the securities were realized and the proceeds, amounting (with the addition of certain other moneys) to £1,914 14s. 5d., were paid to the appellant with a view to their being applied, with the approval of the committee, to the purchase of a farm. Thereupon the respondent, the inspector of taxes, made an assessment upon the appellant under Schedule E of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in the sum of £939 16s., being the net gate money received from the benefit match for the tax year 1920-21, and the question for your Lordships to determine is whether this assessment was valid.

In considering this question, I will assume that the appellant was assessable (if at all) under Schedule E of the Act. It would appear that in the year 1920-21 any assessment upon him must have been made, not under Schedule E, but under Schedule D (see Great Western Railway Company v. Bater, 38 The Times L.R., 448; [1922] 2 A.C., 1); but the law was altered by the Finance Act, 1922, and it has not been disputed that the assessment in the year 1923, if allowable at all, was properly made under Schedule E.

The question, therefore, is whether the sum of £939 16s. fell within the description, contained in Rule 1 of Schedule E, of "salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever therefrom" (i.e., from an office or employment of profit) "for the year of assessment," so as to be liable to income-tax under that schedule. These words and the corresponding expressions contained in the earlier statutes (which were not materially different) have been the subject of judicial interpretation in cases which have been cited to your Lordships; and it must now (I think) be taken as settled that they include all payments made to the holder of an office or employment as such, that is to say, by way of remuneration for his services, even though such payments may be voluntary, but that they do not include a mere gift or present (such as a testimonial) which is made to him on personal grounds and not by way of payment for his services. The question to be answered is, as Mr. Justice Rowlatt put it: "Is it in the nature of a personal gift or is it remuneration?" If the latter, it is subject to the tax; if the former, it is not.

Applying this test, I do not doubt that in the present case the net proceeds of the benefit match should be regarded as a personal gift and not as income from the appellant's employment. The terms of his employment did not entitle him to a benefit, though they provided that if a benefit were granted the committee of the club should have a voice in the application of the proceeds. A benefit is not usually given early in a cricketer's career, but rather towards its close, and in order to provide an endowment for him on retirement; and, except in a very special case, it is not granted more than once. Its purpose is not to encourage the cricketer to further exertions, but to express the gratitude of his employers and of the cricket-loving public for what he has already done and their appreciation of his personal qualities. It is usually associated, as in this case, with a public subscription; and, just as those subscriptions, which are the spontaneous gift of members of the public, are plainly not income or taxable as such, so the gate moneys taken at the benefit match, which may be regarded as the contribution of the club to the subscription list, are (I think) in the same category. If the benefit had taken place after Seymour's retirement, no one would have sought to tax the proceeds as income; and the circumstance that it was given before but in contemplation of retirement does not alter its quality. The whole sum—gate money and subscriptions alike—is a testimonial and not a perquisite. In the end—that is to say, when all the facts have been considered—it is not remuneration for services, but a personal gift.

I am of opinion that this appeal should succeed, and that the order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt should be restored with costs here and below, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords : I concur in all that my Lord has said. I have had the advantage of reading the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble friend Lord Phillimore, and I concur entirely in his exposition and analysis of what are generally known as the Easter Offering cases. Personally I cannot help thinking that the whole trouble in this case has rather arisen from the fact that, although of course the controversy necessarily turned upon the particular words of Schedule E, yet at the same time it was a little forgotten to pay attention to the warning which I remember Lord Macnaghten gave us years ago when he said, "My Lords, I wish to remind you that income-tax is a tax upon income." When I think of this little nest egg —which, of course, paid income-tax as an investment and which, now that it has taken the form of a farm, will pay income-tax under Schedule A—being treated, the whole sum, as income, honestly, had it not been for the fact that honourable Judges whose opinion I respect have come to another conclusion, I would have thought the contention was quite preposterous. I therefore concur in the motion which has been made.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords : I regret that I am unable to concur with the judgment which has just been delivered by my noble friend on the woolsack, the Lord Chancellor, and I further regret that I am unable to concur in the judgments of my other noble friends. In those circumstances I must, of course, assume that the conclusions at which I have arrived are erroneous, though I cannot feel convinced of it. I have this consolation, however, that if I err, I err in good company, namely, in that of the Master of the Rolls and of Lord Justice Warrington, as he was when he delivered judgment in this case in the Court of Appeal.

In my view, this latter judgment, especially, appears to be sound, logical, sustained by the facts proved and consistent with the authorities cited in support of it. What has given me most trouble in the case is this—the bald, meagre and sketchy way in which the facts of the case have been stated.

It is rightly stated in the case that the sole question for decision is whether the large sum of £939 16s. 11d. derived by Seymour, the professional cricketer, from the benefit match played on the cricketing field of the Kent County Cricket Club, accrued to him, or came to him from his employment as the professional cricketer of this club, or was a gift not earned by him by the discharge with special efficiency of his duties as professional cricketer to the club, but independently of the discharge of those duties, unconnected with them, nor in any way springing from them. Accordingly, one would, I think, suppose that in order to determine this question, the first thing to be fully ascertained would be what were the terms upon which Seymour was hired ; what were his duties, what were the functions which he discharged upon the occasion of a benefit match being held. Did he himself play in it ? Did he in any way select the competing teams, or aid in the management of the fête, as it may well be styled ?

The only statement contained in the case at all touching these matters is the following :—

"(c) A professional cricketer in the service of the Kent County Cricket Club is granted a benefit on the express understanding that he shall allow the proceeds of the benefit to be invested in the names of the trustees of the club during the pleasure of the committee. The income derived from the proceeds invested is paid to the beneficiary. The invested sum has, however, always eventually been handed over to the professional cricketer when his career as a cricketer is over, or when he finds an investment (such as a share in a business or farm) of which the trustees approve."

The following is an extract from the regulations for the staff of the Kent County Cricket Club bearing on the point, actually in force when the above-mentioned match was played. The regulation is headed "Benefits and Tours" and runs thus :—

"The committee reserve to themselves an absolute and unfettered discretion as regards benefit matches, the collection of subscriptions in connexion with such matches, and dealing with the net proceeds of such matches in any way they may think desirable in the interest of the beneficiaire. The committee also reserve the like discretion in regard to granting permission to any player to go on winter tour and in regard to dealing with remuneration receivable by him on account of such tour."

This regulation may be fully adequate to protect the committee from any legal obligation towards their professional cricketer being imposed upon the club or the committee in respect of the matters named, but it is quite inadequate to prevent that cricketer from having a hope or an expectation, or a formed belief that he had a chance, if he discharged his duties well and to the satisfaction of his employers, of being given the prize of a benefit match. For all that appears, he owed no duties to the Kent club or to its committee save those which spring from his position of professional cricketer. If he got the reward of a benefit match by reason of the efficient discharge of those duties, it must, I think, in the absence of all evidence of the committee's being influenced by any other motive, object, or aim, be held that this reward accrued to him by reason of the office or employment he held within the meaning of Schedule E of the Act of 1842, or came to him from that employment within the meaning of Schedule E, rule 1, of the Income Tax Act of 1918.

I cannot find anything in the case suggesting that the club, or its committee, had any motive, object or aim in giving the benefit of this match to Seymour, their officer, other than to reward him for the efficient discharge of the duties of his post.

It is here that the bald, incomplete and unsatisfactory provisions of paragraph 2 (c) of the case stated cause embarrassment. Surely it would have been easy to have ascertained from Seymour or the committee what, if any, was the agreement made with, or assurance given to him as to the result of holding a benefit match, or whether it was the usual practice of the club to permit any professional cricketer they had in their service to obtain this benefit if he discharged the duties of his post well, though admittedly it was a matter entirely in their discretion, and they were not bound to do so. Suppose, for instance, that when Seymour was originally appointed, the committee or secretary of the club said to him, "The committee have absolute power to let you have the advantage of a benefit match or not just as they please. Their discretion is absolute and unfettered, but if you discharge the duties of your post to their entire satisfaction, they may possibly be inclined to let you have the benefit of such a match. They make no promise whatever to do so." It certainly would appear to me that if that remark or any equivalent remark had been made at the time suggested, it ought to be held that Seymour might naturally and reasonably anticipate that he would have a fair chance of obtaining the benefit of a match conferred upon him by his employers, if he discharged the duties of his post to their entire satisfaction. A grave injustice might be done to an employee or to his employer by the omission to elicit what took place when the employee was first engaged.

What were the precise conditions of his employment? Lord Justice Warrington deals with these points of view in a lengthy passage of his judgment. I quote it in full by reason of its importance, and because I thoroughly concur with it.

"Now did this money come to the respondent by virtue of his office? Looking at the regulations, I am satisfied that from that alone one must come to the conclusion that it did come to him by virtue of his office. It is something which obviously was contemplated as a possibility amongst the terms under which he was serving the Kent County Cricket Club, but more than that, it seems to me that this came to him not merely by virtue of his office, because it was something which he might expect to get from his office, but it came to him from his employers, when one comes to think of what really happened. If this match had been held without the exercise by the club of their discretion in this man's favour by making it a benefit match, the gate money would have been the property of the club and would have gone into their coffers. It is quite true that the gate money which would have been taken at the match if it had not been a benefit match may have been less in amount, but that seems to be quite immaterial. They were under no obligation to give the benefit. They were under no obligation to give him any portion of the gate money that day, and it seems to me that by making the match a benefit match it was their act which gave him the right to receive this gate money. That seems to me to be one extremely and perhaps the most important factor of all, and it is that fact which distinguishes the gate money from the subscriptions which were gathered outside. As regards those subscriptions, the club never had any interest in them at all. They were, as it seems to me, quite properly treated by the Crown as falling on the other side of the line, and as donations purely personal given by outsiders to the man for whose benefit they were given.

"That seems to me to be the crucial point in this case, that this was money given to him by the will of his employers and in a manner contemplated by the actual terms of his employment as shown by the regulations."

The fact that the giving of permission by the committee of the club to the holding of benefit matches is purely voluntary and discretionary is entirely immaterial (Herbert v. McQuade, 18 The Times L.R., 728; [1902] 2 K.B., 631.) The Master of the Rolls (Sir Richard Henn Collins, as he then was), at page 649 of the case, quoted a passage from the judgment of Lord Curriehill in a Scotch case to the following effect:—

"It is," said the learned Judge, "with some reluctance that I have formed the opinion that the Commissioners are wrong and that the appellant is liable for income-tax on the £100 mentioned in the case. It is true that it is a voluntary contribution by the parishioners, one which they are under no obligation to make and which they may withdraw at any time, but still it is a payment made to the appellant as their clergyman, and is received by the appellant in respect of the discharge of his duties of that office, which is one of public employment in the sense of the statutes."

Sir Richard Henn Collins, in commenting on this judgment, laid down a test in these words—"The test is, whether from the standpoint of the person who receives it (i.e., the payment) it accrues to him in virtue of his office; if it does, it does not matter whether it was voluntary or whether it was compulsory on the part of the persons who paid it. That seems to me to be the test; and if we once get to this—that the money has come to, or accrued to, a person by virtue of his office—it seems to me that the liability to income-tax is not negatived merely by reason of the fact that there was no legal obligation on the part of the persons who contributed the money to pay it."

This case of Herbert v. McQuade (supra) has been often approved of and followed. It may well be that there is nothing to prevent the Kent County Cricket Club from giving a handsome gift to their professional cricketer though they knew he was the worst cricketer that ever held a bat or bowled a ball, but these regulations do not appear to me to contemplate such a case. A benefit match permitted in such a man's interest would naturally secure very little money either in the shape of subscriptions or of gate money. A professional cricketer such as Seymour must have had some special merit to secure such a splendid prize as he obtained in this case. The money of both subscribers and of persons who passed the gate was rather lavishly given. It is difficult to imagine what special merit he could have had other than skill and efficiency in the game which he was employed by his employers to play and to teach. It is much to be regretted that Seymour was not examined, not only as to the terms of his employment, but also as to how he regarded this sum of £939 odd, and upon what ground he demanded a return of the income-tax paid yearly by his trustees. The decision in Herbert v. McQuade (supra) establishes that the test is whether from the standpoint of the person who receives the money it accrues to him in virtue of his office or employment.

Lord Hanworth, M.R., deals with this point in the following passage of his judgment in the present case. He said:—

"But after recounting the facts as I have done and giving consideration to the substance of the matter and bearing in mind the regulations which I have read, it appears to me that this sum of £939 cannot be considered to be an extraneous addition to Seymour's wages or a fortuitous donation, but that it was an addition arranged by and through his employers at a time when they considered that a benefit match should be allowed to him and was an addition contemplated as a possibility in the course of his employment in the very terms which regulated the employment of their staff, including respondent. For these reasons it appears to me that this sum of £939 falls within the principle which has been laid down in Herbert v. McQuade (supra) and the other cases, and is taxable just as any other sums are taxable which are received in the course of employment and are profits arising therefrom."

It is not disputed that the effect of these regulations is, according to a well-known principle of law, to create in Seymour an absolute ownership in the fund vested in the appointed trustees.

The mode in which the trustees discharged their trust affords an indication of how they and their beneficiary must have regarded the fund resulting from the benefit match.

At page 3 of the stated case it is set forth that the net proceeds of the match, with certain other sums obtained by public subscriptions, were, by the Kent County Cricket Club, invested in the purchase of the stocks named, that dividends from these investments were received by the county club, less the income-tax which was deducted, and were paid to Seymour by cheques drawn by the county club in his favour on October 21, 1921, October 21, 1922, and October 21, 1923, for the respective amounts of £55 8s. 6d., £64 5s. 8d., and £67 12s. 2d. At page 4 of the case stated it is set forth that certificates of the deductions of income-tax were furnished to Seymour by the Kent County Cricket Club, and that he, Seymour, claimed for repayment of the income-tax deducted. Herbert v. McQuade (supra) and the cases which followed it decided that it was the standpoint of the receiver of the money that determines the liability to income-tax. It was essential then that it should be ascertained in what light Seymour regarded these dividends. He was not apparently asked a single question upon the subject.

The judgment of Lord Loreburn in Blakiston v. Cooper (25 The Times L.R., 164 ; [1909] A.C., 104) has been frequently referred to. The head-note fairly states what was the pith of the decision. It is there set forth that voluntary Easter offerings of money given as a freewill gift to the incumbent of a benefice as such for his personal use are, if given for the purpose of increasing his stipend, assessable to income-tax as profits accruing to him by reason of his office under Schedule E, r. 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1842. There was, I think, a disposition during the argument to treat Lord Loreburn's judgment as having laid down a test as to when Easter offerings of this kind would be properly assessable to income-tax and when not. I doubt very much if Lord Loreburn intended to lay down any test of the kind. I doubt very much if the alleged test would have been workable, for he said, "Had it been a gift of an exceptional kind, such as a testimonial, or a contribution for a specific purpose, as to provide for a holiday, or a subscription peculiarly due to the personal qualities of the particular clergyman, it might not have been a voluntary payment for services, but a mere present."

In the present case no evidence was given to show that Seymour was possessed of anything beyond his skill in cricketing or the discharge of his professional duties to give him a claim to a benefit match, but that skill he was hired to exercise and display in the performance of the duties of his post ; the money he thus secured accrued to him by reason of that—not, so far as appears, by reason of anything else.

The judgment of Lord Robertson in Blakiston v. Cooper (supra) is well worth a careful perusal on this point. He said, "When the broader facts of the case are remembered, I confess that it savours of paradox to say that this money did not accrue to the appellant by reason of his office of vicar of East Grinstead. The cause of collecting the money was to supplement the legal income of the vicar, and, while this is the ordinary history of Easter offerings, in the present instance the thing is set out in black and white in the bishop's letter and the subsequent notices."

I think that, when no reason is shown for the gift to an official such as Seymour of the large and substantial prize given to him through the medium of a benefit match, it must in reason be assumed that it was given to him for the efficient and satisfactory discharge of the duties he was employed to discharge, and, if so, that the reward which accrued to him came to him from his employment. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right and should be affirmed and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Phillimore.—My Lords : The result of the assessment having been made upon the appellant as a person holding an office or employment under Schedule E and not upon him in respect of his professional earnings under Schedule D has been to bring under your Lordships' notice two quite different classes of authorities : those which deal with a public officer receiving some emolument not from his employers (if indeed he has any) but from persons with whom he has official relations, and those which deal with an employee receiving from his employers some benefit other than and additional to his contractual salary.

The conditions of these two classes of case seem to me so different that very little assistance can be derived in one case from the decisions applicable to the other.

The reported cases dealing with a public officer which have been brought to your Lordships' notice are cases concerning ministers of religion. It is suggested that at any rate from these cases it can be deduced that a perquisite or profit of office is none the less a perquisite or profit because the emolument bestowed is voluntary. I doubt whether the analogy can even be carried so far. In these religious cases the offering may be voluntary, but it is not spontaneous.

In the Easter offerings case, Blakiston v. Cooper (25 The Times L.R., 164 ; [1909] A.C., 104), the moral or religious duty to make the offering was inculcated by the bishop, and, as pointed out in the judgment of your Lordships' House, ecclesiastical machinery was set in motion to procure it.

Nor does the matter rest here. For a portion of the collection definite legal acts were required to effect the purpose. The collection at the offertory in the communion service is provided for by rubric, and by another rubric this offertory is to be disposed of "to such pious and charitable uses as the minister and churchwardens shall think fit, wherein if they disagree, it shall be disposed of as the Ordinary shall appoint."

Moreover, though the Easter offerings collected on the occasion in question were not the fruits of legal compulsion, they did represent and supersede in respect of some of the contributions a legal due. The rubric preceding the one I have just quoted says as follows : "Yearly at Easter every parishioner shall reckon with the parson, vicar or curate, or his or their deputy or deputies ; and pay to them or him all ecclesiastical duties, accustomably due, then and at that time to be paid."

Easter offerings or Easter dues are due of common right from the householder for every member of his family of 16 years of age and upwards.

True it is that the common law rate is 2d. per head only, though by custom it may be more.

It is, I believe, not uncommon, though at the moment I cannot think of an instance, and probably was more common when more offices were paid by fees than are so endowed now that there should be a legal fee of small amount which it was usual to augment. Such fees of office are intended to be covered by the words of Schedule E as profits or perquisites. Easter offerings along with mortuaries and surplice fees are dealt with as part of the legal income of the clergy by the Tithe Act, 1836, section 90, and the Tithe Act, 1839, section 9. They are also dealt with in the New Parishes Act, 1843, section 15.

The case of Herbert v. McQuade (18 The Times L.R., 728 ; [1902] 2 K.B., 631) has not the authority of your Lordships' House. But if it be taken to be law it was a case where, though the particular incumbent had no title to the annual grant, the annual income of the fund had to be distributed among selected incumbents of his class. In that case, too, there was an element of periodicity.

In fact, in these cases of ministers of religion there is always, I think, some element of periodicity or recurrence which makes another distinction between them and the cases of a single gift by an employer or employers. If they be put aside, little is left in the way of authority on which the Crown can rely except that in the case of Cowan v. Seymour (36 The Times L.R., 155 ; [1920] 1 K.B., 500) the Court of Appeal thought it important to point out that the gift to the liquidator did not come from his employer, the incorporated company, but from the several shareholders who in combination made up the company.

My Lords, I do not feel compelled by any of these authorities to hold that an employer cannot make a solitary gift to his employee without rendering the gift liable to taxation under Schedule E. Nor do I think it matters that the gift is made during the period of service and not after its termination, or that it is made in respect of good, faithful, and valuable service.

During the course of the argument, however, a subtler consideration seemed to emerge. It was suggested that the hope or chance of a benefit match was part of the inducement to a man to become a professional cricketer in the service of the Kent County Cricket Club, and I suppose it must be put as one of the terms under which he was engaged.

This line of argument is a departure from that hitherto put forward by the Crown. On the part of the Crown it has been accepted that the grant of the benefit match was voluntary ; and the whole weight of the contention has been, that though voluntary, it was still a profit or perquisite.

Anyhow the materials for this contention are wanting. The case stated by the General Commissioners does not find any facts to support it. The contentions on behalf of Seymour were either that the money which he received came from the general public and not from his employers, or that if it came from his employers it was to be treated as a donation or gift, and the General Commissioners accepted these contentions.

If it had been otherwise, a number of facts ought to have been found which we have not before us. The case would probably have stated the number of benefit matches which were usually held yearly, the number of professional cricketers in the service of the club, the usual duration of the tenure of office, or at least the percentage of cricketers in the service of the club who got benefit matches ; and I think it would be defective if it did not state that the expectancy of such a benefit was part of the inducement to Seymour to take his post.

I am not sure that it would not be necessary to find further that this inducement was held out to him by his employers.

The case does not, either in its narrative or in its extracts from the regulations of the club, show that there is any provision in the rules for granting benefit matches. All that it shows is that there are such matches of sufficient frequency to make it desirable to frame rules as to the distribution of the proceeds of such matches when they occur.

In my judgment this is a case of a plain gift not taxable as a profit or perquisite of employment, and I think that this appeal should be allowed.

Lord Carson.—My Lords : I concur with the motion proposed by the Lord Chancellor. In each case it is important that the words of the rule should be kept prominently in mind. They are plain words, of no technical import, and, in my opinion, no previous authorities can assist, as each case must depend upon the particular facts proved. In the present case the General Commissioners were, in my opinion, fully entitled to decide as a question of fact that the sum in question was not wages or perquisites or profits accruing by reason of the employment of the appellant. In fact the money was never, in my opinion, the money of the club at all, but was subscribed by the public for the benefit of the appellant. Speaking for myself, although, of course, the respondent was acting within his rights in the course this litigation has taken, I cannot help thinking that the case might well have been allowed to rest after the determination of the question by the General Commissioners and Mr. Justice Rowlatt. Protracted litigation, whilst easy sailing for the Revenue, is a great burden on the subject in a case where, so far as I can see, no question of principle was involved. I hope the appellant will be fully indemnified against costs.

Court of Appeal.

GILBERT v. GILBERT AND BOUCHER.*

Divorce — Variation of settlements — Petition after decree nisi but before decree absolute—Absence of jurisdiction to entertain—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 192.

After a decree nisi for dissolution of marriage the Court has no jurisdiction under s. 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, to entertain any application for an inquiry into and variation of settlements until after the decree has been made absolute.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Bateson, which raised a point of divorce practice—namely, whether there was power to initiate and carry on proceedings for variation of a settlement before the pronouncing of a final decree for a divorce.

A decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage was made on the husband's petition on April 26, 1926, but had not yet been made absolute.

The wife had, without the knowledge of her husband, settled her property, by two settlements dated September 26 and October 2, 1925, and it thereby became subject to a restraint on anticipation. On October 30, 1926, the petitioner filed a petition for a settlement of his wife's property. An answer was put in showing that the wife's position with regard to her property had changed, as she had settled it.

On March 25, 1927, the petitioner filed a petition to vary the existing settlements. The respondent thereupon applied to the Registrar to have the petition of March 25, 1927, dismissed because the decree nisi had not been made absolute. The Registrar dismissed the petition on that ground. The petitioner appealed to Mr. Justice Bateson, who dismissed the appeal, but gave leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal.

It was admitted by the petitioner that no order could be made varying the settlements until after the decree absolute was pronounced, but it was contended that meanwhile a petition could be filed and proceedings carried on under it. It was said to be important to be able to obtain an order as soon as the decree absolute was pronounced because then the respondent's interests would be released from the restraint upon anticipation.

Mr. Bayford, K.C., and the Hon. Victor Russell appeared for the appellant; Mr. Willis, K.C., and Mr. T. Bucknill for the respondent.

Mr. Bayford contended that the effect of Rule 71 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, had been impliedly altered by section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, containing the power to vary settlements. That section gave the power "after the decree" and left out the word "final."

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that the appeal raised a short, though important, point of practice. [His Lordship stated the facts and proceeded.] Until the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, there was no power for the Court to make any variation of settlements on a divorce, but by section 5 of that Act the Court was empowered, "after a final decree of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage," to inquire into the existence of marriage settlements and to make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or a portion of the property settled, for the benefit either of the children of the marriage or of their parents, as to the Court should seem fit.

It was clear from the section that the time when the Court might deal with settlements was after the decree absolute had been made. By Rule 71 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, application to vary marriage settlements must be made by petition filed after, but within one calendar month of, the decree. In Clarke v. Clarke and Lindsay ([1911] P., 186) it was laid down that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain any application for an inquiry into and variation of settlements until after the decree for dissolution had been made absolute, and that until that time the respondent was under no obligation to answer it. The Master of the Rolls, Sir H. Cozens-Hardy, said (at p. 189):—

"I can see no jurisdiction whatever to take any proceedings to rescind or vary the settlement until after the decree is made absolute. The petition is simply allowed to remain on the file to take effect the moment the decree is made absolute."

That was a very explicit decision of the Court. But it was contended that the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, had altered the powers of the Court. Section 192, which replaced section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, provided that the Court might inquire into and vary settlements which had been made on the parties "after pronouncing a decree for a divorce." It was argued that, as the word "final" before "decree" had been left out, some alteration of the law had been intended by that omission, and that the effect of it was to alter the law as laid down in Clarke v. Clarke and Lindsay (supra). He (his Lordship) thought that it was impossible so to interpret section 192. The Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, was not intended to make any alteration in the law, or in the rules or orders of the Court, but to preserve them. It was purely a consolidating statute.

The decision in Mitchell v. Simpson (6 The Times L.R., 341; 25 Q.B.D., 183) showed that it was impossible to treat a consolidating statute as altering the law. The Court could not derive much assistance from the cases on alimony, the section (190) dealing with alimony being different from those (191 and 192) dealing with settlements. The argument based on the omission of the word "final" from section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, was not sufficient to allow the deduction that there had been an important alteration in the law. The clause stood where it did when Clarke v. Clarke and Lindsay (supra) was decided. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Scrutton agreed. The presumption with which one started was that a consolidating Act was not intended to alter the law: Mitchell v. Simpson (6 The Times L.R., 341; 25 Q.B.D., 183). It might be that the language used was so clearly different that, although forming part of a consolidating statute, it must be construed so as to rebut the presumption and alter the law. That was the case in MacConnell v. Prill and Co., Limited (32 The Times L.R., 509; [1916] 2 Ch., 57), where Lord Justice, then Mr. Justice, Sargant said (at p. 63):—

"No doubt the prima facie presumption in the case of a consolidating Act, such as the present Act of 1908, is that the Legislature intended to reproduce the existing position, and my first inclination would be to hold that, as under section 129, subsection 3, of the 1862 Act, any notice is sufficient which sufficiently informs shareholders of the intention to act by way of extraordinary resolution. But this prima facie view must yield to plain words to the contrary. And, when regard is had, not merely to the very specific language of section 69 of the present Act, but to the extended operation thereby given to an extraordinary resolution and to the new method of defining it, I think it impossible to escape from the conclusion that the notice of the meeting must not merely indicate but actually specify the intention to pass the resolution as an extraordinary resolution: See the observations of Lord Herschell in Governor and Company of the Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers (7 The Times L.R., 333; [1891] A.C., 107, at p. 144)."

The decision of the House of Lords in Food Controller v. Cork (39 The Times L.R., 699; [1923] A.C., 647) was to the same effect. The well-known passage in the judgment of Lord Herschell in Governor and Company of the Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers (supra) showed that the clear words of a codifying Act in their natural meaning were to prevail.

Here section 5 of the Act of 1859 used the words "final decree," and then in spite of the fact that in 1860 a new decree nisi was introduced, it was held that the Court had no jurisdiction to inquire into settlements made by the parties before the decree absolute was made. It was argued that the omission of the word "final" in the consolidating Act showed that it was intended to alter the law. But if a decree for divorce within section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, included a decree nisi, the Court might make an order for variation of settlements though no decree absolute was ever made. It would require very clear language in the Act to convince him (his Lordship) that any such alteration in the law was intended, and he could not find such language. The appeal would be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT agreed.

IN RE BANCROFT—BANCROFT v. BANCROFT.*

Will — Construction — Specific bequest — All rights in connexion with play — Contract to sell film rights—Executory at testator's death — Sale completed by executors — Whether legatee entitled to the purchase-money.

A testator, who was the absolute owner of the copyright in English of a play, made a specific bequest of "all my rights to or in connexion with the play." Before the testator's death his agent accepted the offer of a company to purchase the film rights in English-speaking countries for £1,500. The testator's executors assigned these film rights to the company in consideration of the payment of that sum.

Held, that the donee of the specific bequest was entitled to the £1,500.

The late Sir Squire Bancroft appointed the plaintiff, George Pleydell Bancroft (his son) and Sir Gerald Du Maurier executors and trustees of his will. After giving certain specific and pecuniary bequests, the testator made the further specific bequests set out in the first schedule, including one to Sir Gerald Du Maurier in the following words: "I give to Sir Gerald Du Maurier all my rights to or in connexion with the play Diplomacy." The testator was the absolute owner of the copyright in English of the play Diplomacy, by Victorien Sardou.

By an agreement dated January 8, 1916, the testator had assigned certain film rights in the play to the Famous Players Film Company, Limited. For some time before the testator's death on April 19, 1926, negotiations had been going on to abrogate that agreement, and to sell the film rights in English-speaking countries to the Famous Players Film Company, Limited. On April 7, 1926, an offer by that company to purchase the film rights was accepted on behalf of Sir Squire Bancroft by his agent, Mr. Golding Bright. The executors, being advised that the correspondence between the testator, his agent, and the company constituted an executory agreement of which the company could get specific performance, assigned to the company on October 6, 1926, the sole and exclusive motion-picture rights in the play in English-speaking countries in consideration of the payment of £1,500.

The question for decision was whether, under the will, Sir Gerald Du Maurier was entitled to that £1,500, or whether it formed part of the testator's residuary estate.

Mr. Cecil Turner appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Danckwerts for the residuary legatees; Mr. Stafford Crossman for Sir Gerald Du Maurier.

MR. JUSTICE RUSSELL, in giving judgment, said that he had no doubt that at the date of the testator's death there existed a contract, binding on the testator, to sell the film rights for £1,500, and binding the purchasers to pay that sum. In those circumstances, since the contract was not carried out in the testator's lifetime, did the right to the £1,500 pass to Sir Gerald Du Maurier? The gift to him was in very wide terms:—"I give to Sir Gerald Du Maurier all my rights to or in connexion with the play Diplomacy."

At the time of his death the testator was still the owner, in law, of the film rights, although in equity he had parted with them. But he was only bound to complete the contract in exchange for £1,500. One of the rights "in connexion with the play Diplomacy" was the right to get specific performance of the contract of sale and to receive the purchase money. In his opinion Sir Gerald Du Maurier was entitled to the £1,500.

GRAINGER v. SINGER.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Case stated — Transmission to High Court—Seven days from receipt—Appellant inspector moved to another district—Delivery of case at his old office—Period for transmission—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 149 (1) (d).

Where an inspector of taxes requires the Special or General Commissioners of Income Tax to state a case, and is then moved to another district, it is not necessary for them to deliver the case to that inspector personally, but it is sufficient if the case be sent to the office to which he was attached; and the period of seven days fixed by s. 149 (1) (d) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, as the period within which the case must, after being received, be transmitted to the High Court, then begins to run.

His LORDSHIP dismissed the Crown's appeal, by way of a case stated by the General Commissioners of Income Tax, on a preliminary objection taken by the respondent that the appeal was out of time in that the case had not been transmitted to the High Court within seven days after receipt by the party requiring it to be stated as required by section 149 (1) (d) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which provides:—

"The case shall set forth the facts and the determination of the Commissioners, and the party requiring it shall transmit the case, when stated and signed, to the High Court, within seven days after receiving the same."

The material facts and dates appear in the judgment.

Mr. Edwardes Jones, K.C., and Mr. Gurney G. Beagley appeared for the respondent; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT, in a considered judgment, said that an objection was taken to the Crown's appeal that it was out of time. [His Lordship read section 149 (1) (d) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and continued.] Nothing was said about the place to which, or the time within which, the case was to be sent to the party requiring it to be stated; there was nothing expressly requiring it to be sent at all. Perhaps it was assumed that he would call for it.

The hearing before the General Commissioners was on December 14, 1922, and at the close the inspector, Mr. Grainger, expressed his dissatisfaction and required a case to be stated. Ten months elapsed and nothing happened and on October 24, 1923, Mr. Grainger was moved to another district. On March 27, 1924, the draft case was sent to the respondent's solicitor, who lost it.

Two years and five months elapsed, and in August, 1926, someone woke up, found the case and returned it to the General Commissioners. On August 23, 1926, the case, stated and signed, was sent to the office where Mr. Grainger was in 1922 and it arrived there in course of post on August 24, 1926. The acting inspector happened to be away that day and some little delay occurred. It was not till September 1 that it was sent to the secretary to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and by him to the Solicitor of Inland Revenue, who filed it on September 2.

It was not disputed that the Solicitor of Inland Revenue was the agent of Mr. Grainger and that receipt by him was receipt by Mr. Grainger, but it was contended by the respondent that the case must be taken to have been received when it was delivered at the office of the inspector. If so, the appeal was out of time; if it was not received till it reached the hands of the solicitor it was in time. It was not disputed by the Crown that the requirements of the section were imperative.

The Attorney-General contended that the inspector, Mr. Grainger, was "the party requiring" the case and that it must go to him, not to his successor; and that if he died it would be, not his successor, but his executors who must continue. He (his Lordship) had never known a case where the executors of an inspector had been made parties to one of these appeals.

The question was whether the office was Mr. Grainger's agent to receive the case. There was nothing in the statute to say so; nor was it an agent by estoppel, because the person sending documents there was not a party but the tribunal itself. He must hold that it was not necessary that the inspector should actually receive the case in his hand, but that it would suffice if it were sent to the office to which he was attached.

He concluded that, when the inspector left, he took pending appeals with him. Was the authority of the old office to receive documents for him withdrawn in fact? It would be very inconvenient if it were so. The General and Special Commissioners would not know that he had gone. The office staff would not have done their duty if they had returned the document marked "Gone away." He came to the conclusion that it was their duty to receive it on Mr. Grainger's behalf and he thought that the objection succeeded, though he reached that conclusion with regret. He wished that a time limit could be fixed within which cases must be stated and signed. It was not right that this case should have taken four years in being stated.

MCCAUSLAND v. MCCAUSLAND.*

Divorce — Petition — Service — Respondent a minor—Personal service—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, r. 7.

Where the respondent to a divorce petition is a minor, personal service of the petition on the respondent is good service, and the appointment of a guardian ad litem is not necessary.

In this undefended petition Eric Marcus McCausland, described as a medical practitioner, of Wheatley, Oxfordshire, sought the dissolution of his marriage with Daisy Violet McCausland, née Campin, on the ground of her adultery with some man unknown.

Mr. Bayford, K.C., and Mr. G. Tyndale appeared for the petitioner.

MR. BAYFORD referred to a preliminary point of law with regard to the question of service of a copy of the petition on the respondent, who was a minor. Rule 7 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, provided that a petition should be served personally by delivery of a sealed copy of the petition. Rule 74 (A) provided that a minor over seven might elect a guardian ad litem, and rule 97 provided that in any matter of practice or procedure not dealt with in those rules the Rules of the Supreme Court should be deemed to apply.

By Order IX., rule 4, of the Rules of the Supreme Court service in an action had to be made on the father or guardian of an infant defendant, but the Court could order that service on the infant was good service. The case of Quinn v. Quinn (36 The Times L.R., 170; [1920] P., 65) only decided that it was not necessary for the petitioner to apply for the appointment of a guardian ad litem in respect of a minor respondent. A petition was not an action, but he submitted that service on the present respondent was good service.

MR. JUSTICE BATESON said that cases like this must have arisen before and after Quinn v. Quinn (36 The Times L.R., 170; [1920] P., 65), but probably the efficacy of the service had not been questioned. There was no such protection of a minor in this Division with regard to service of process as in the other Divisions of the High Court. He held that personal service on the wife was good service.

Evidence having been given, his LORDSHIP granted a decree nisi.

MCDOWELL v. STANDARD OIL COMPANY (NEW JERSEY).†

Trade Mark — Registration — Invented word — Similarity—Calculated to deceive.

An application by a Liverpool oil merchant to register the invented word "Nuvol" as a new mark in respect of illuminating, heating, and lubricating oils was opposed by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, who had registered the invented word "Nujol" as a trade mark in respect of medicinal preparations for human use and had for several years past sold in this country under that name a preparation of refined paraffin, and was refused by the Registrar.

Held, that the applicant had failed to discharge the onus which was upon him of showing that the proposed trade mark was not calculated to deceive.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 R.P.C., 313) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (43 R.P.C., 313) reversing a decision of Mr. Justice Astbury and restoring a decision of the Registrar of Trade Marks whereby an application by the appellant for the registration of a trade mark consisting of the invented word "Nuvol" (No. 443189 in Class 47) in respect of illuminating, heating, and lubricating oils was refused.

The application was opposed by the respondent company, who were the registered proprietors of the invented word "Nujol" in respect of medicinal and curative preparations of all kinds included in Class 3 and all being for human use, and who had for the past nine years sold under that name a highly purified oil for medicinal and curative purposes. The respondent company were also the proprietors of an extensive business in petroleum oils of all kinds.

The facts sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan, K.C., and Mr. Trevor Watson were for the appellant; Sir Duncan Kerly, K.C., and Mr. F. E. Bray, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, in the year 1923 the appellant, who is a Liverpool oil merchant, was desirous of registering the invented word "Nuvol" as a trade mark in respect of illuminating, heating, and lubricating oils. He had not at that time used the trade mark in connexion with his goods to any substantial extent. He issued the usual preliminary advertisement, and thereupon the respondents, the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, informed him that they had registered the invented word "Nujol" in respect of medicinal and curative preparations for human use, and were selling here through their agents a preparation of refined paraffin under that name, and they suggested that as the registration of the word "Nuvol" was calculated to lead to confusion between the goods sold under that name and those sold under the trade mark "Nujol" the appellant should withdraw his application. The appellant did not give way, and accordingly the respondents opposed the registration, which was refused by the Registrar on the ground that the word was calculated to deceive and, to use his language, that the two words were too much alike to be allowed independent registration by different proprietors. On appeal to the High Court that decision was reversed by Mr. Justice Astbury, who directed that the registration should proceed, but his decision was in turn reversed by the Court of Appeal, and the decision of the Registrar was restored; hence this present appeal. I should add that at one time a charge was made against the present appellant that he had purposely adopted the proposed mark "Nuvol" with the dishonest intention of appropriating some part of the goodwill which belonged to the respondents in respect of their trade mark "Nujol," but on the evidence led before Mr. Justice Astbury that suggestion was entirely displaced. The learned Judge found that there was no foundation at all for it, and that charge has since been withdrawn or not insisted upon by the other side. Therefore the only question is whether in your Lordships' judgment the adoption of the trade mark "Nuvol" would be calculated to deceive or mislead the trade or the public, and to produce confusion between the goods of these two traders.

My Lords, it has been long ago decided, and is quite clear, that the words "calculated to deceive" which are found in section 11 of the Trade Marks Act of 1905 do not mean "intended to deceive" but "likely or reasonably likely to deceive or mislead" the trade or the public. It has also been held in the case of Eno v. Dunn (6 The Times L.R., 379; 15 App. Cas., 252) decided in your Lordships' House, that the burden of proving that a proposed trade mark is not likely to deceive lies upon the applicant, and also, a proposition which I think follows upon the last, that if that proof is incomplete, and the matter is, as Lord Watson said in that case, in dubio, the application may be refused. I would add that registration under the Acts is a matter of discretion, and although the decision of the Registrar in the matter is by no means conclusive (and under and by the effect of section 8, subsection 2, of the Trade Marks Act, 1919, the question is entirely open for the Courts) yet the fact that the Registrar, an experienced official, has decided against an application on the ground that registration might lead to confusion must still carry considerable weight with any Court or Tribunal which has to review the decision.

My Lords, we start here with the fact that the two words "Nuvol" and "Nujol" are both invented and to most people meaningless words, almost identical both in spelling and in sound, for there is a difference of only one letter in the middle of the word, and unless pronunciation is very distinct it is not difficult to mistake one word when spoken for the other. The appellant therefore starts with a somewhat heavy burden if he has to displace the inference to be drawn from that fact.

The appellant has proved certain facts which are material. He says that the goods are different in the sense that his own goods are oils to be used for lighting, heating, or lubricating, while the goods of the respondents consist of a preparation to be used for medicinal purposes. He says, as I have indicated, that they are used for different purposes, and that makes a distinction. There is no doubt that that observation is quite true, and has force. He also says, and this, with me, carries less weight, that the respondents have not been in the habit of selling their preparation of oil under their own name. I do not think that that matters much, because the preparation of oil has been sold as "Nujol" by the agents who have sold it, and the real question is whether the registration of the appellant's proposed mark would interfere with the sale of "Nujol." As Lord Justice Sargant put it: "The public will be equally deceived for all practical purposes if they merely identify or confuse the producers of 'Nuvol' with the producers of 'Nujol' whether they know the actual name of the producers of 'Nujol' or not." Again, it is said that the Anglo-American Oil Company, who are the sellers of "Nujol," consented to brand the term "Nuvol" on the appellant's casks or drums. That, no doubt, is a fact, but I do not attach much weight to it, because we do not know why that was done, and upon which side the greater interest of the Anglo-American Oil Company lay.

Those are all facts which your Lordships will consider, but, on the other hand, there are these considerations: First, the similarity, amounting almost to identity, of the name, so that the matter stands almost as if the appellant proposed to write "Nujol" on his goods. Secondly, in each case the goods in question are oils, and consist of petroleum, the only difference being in the degree of refinement. The appellant's oils would, at present at all events, be sold in a somewhat raw state, while the respondents' goods are, to a great extent, refined, but the appellant, and the purchasers from him, would be free to refine the oil to any degree which they might think desirable. Here I would refer again to the judgment of Lord Justice Sargant, who says this: "But, on the other hand, if the applicant once succeeded in obtaining the registration of 'Nuvol' as his mark it could be used in respect of lubricating oil of any grade of refinement, sold in any quantity and at any price. And there might, and I think probably would, be a far smaller difference between the opponents' medicinal oil 'Nujol' and the finest grade of lubricating oil ultimately sold under the name 'Nuvol' than between that finest 'Nuvol' and the coarsest grade of 'Nuvol' sold for lubricating heavy machinery." In other words, the difference is one of degree only, namely, the degree of refinement to which the paraffin may be subjected.

Lastly, there is the fact that the Registrar, with all his experience, thought that the two words were too much alike to be allowed independent registration, and, for myself, I attach considerable weight to the opinion which he expressed.

My Lords, upon the whole, I have not been satisfied that if this mark were registered there would be no risk of confusion, and I think it is unfortunate that the appellant, having had his attention called to the respondents' trade mark, did not withdraw his application, but preferred to take the risk of a successful opposition. I think that this appeal fails, and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed, with costs.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords, I concur. I do not conceal that, to me, it is a very narrow case, and I think it is just when it is a very narrow case that real weight ought to be given to the original determination of the Registrar. It is quite true that in the recent case of Banham and Company, Limited v. Reddaway and Company, Limited (43 The Times L.R., 138; [1927] A.C., 406) the Act of 1919 was not mentioned, but I have looked carefully at section 8, subsection 2, and I do not think that that subsection really makes any difference to the remarks which I, giving the judgment of the House, made in Banham's case (supra). For these reasons I concur in the motion proposed. After all, it is not only a question of the decision of the Registrar, but in order to grant this appeal we should have to be of opinion that the Court of Appeal also was wrong.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords, I concur.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords, I concur.

Lord Carson.—My Lords, I also concur.

IN RE NATIONAL BENEFIT ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Companies—Winding-up—Proof—Contract of marine insurance—No stamped policies—Rejection of proof.

The Court held that the liquidator had rightly rejected a proof by the English Insurance Company, Limited, in the winding-up of the National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited, in that the contract between the two companies in respect of which the proof of debt was advanced was a contract of marine insurance and no stamped policy of marine insurance was issued to the English Insurance Company, Limited, as required by law, and therefore the contract was invalid.

This was a summons by the English Insurance Company, Limited (referred to as the English Company), against the Official Receiver and liquidator of the National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited (referred to as the National Company), in respect of the rejection by the liquidator of a proof of debt in the winding-up of the National Company.

Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. Andrewes-Uthwatt appeared in support of the summons; Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. L. W. Byrne were for the Official Receiver and Liquidator.

Mr. Justice Eve, in giving judgment, said:—By this summons the English Insurance Company, Limited, seek to set aside the rejection by the liquidator of the National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited, of a proof carried in by it in the winding-up of the National Company, on the ground that the debt thereby sought to be established arose out of a contract for sea insurance in respect of which no stamped policies of marine insurance were issued to the English Company.

It is not disputed that if the contract is properly described as a contract for sea insurance it is invalid, in that it does not comply with the provisions of the Stamp Act, 1891 (section 93), or the Marine Insurance Act, 1906 (sections 22 and 23). The sole question for determination is the true construction of the contract between the two companies. Is it, or is it not, a contract of marine insurance?

The contract is embodied in a document dated January 27, 1922, with a schedule and an addendum attached, but not affecting its construction. It is described as a participation agreement and it provides in article 1 that the National Company shall be entitled to, and shall accept, a quota participation equal to one-eighth share of all and every risk, excluding obligatory reinsurance agreements with other companies, arranged by the head office of the English Company upon any marine insurance or upon any war risks, whether alone or in conjunction with marine risks, accepted by the English Company (including their agencies and branches at home and abroad) through their marine department.

The expression "marine insurance" as used in the agreement means all forms of insurance, including war risk and reinsurance, transacted by the marine department of the English Company.

By article 2 the participation was fixed at 50 per cent. of the share retained by the English Company at their own risk of all marine insurances accepted on and after a date therein mentioned; the maximum limit of the National Company by any one slip was fixed at £1,875 and any special reinsurances effected by the English Company of risks within the scope of the agreement were to be for common account of the two parties. Under article 3 the liability of the two parties was to begin automatically at the same time, any cover given by the English Company becoming immediately binding on the National Company, the expressed intention being that the two companies should participate pari passu in all the marine insurances accepted by the English Company through its marine department.

Articles 4 to 7, inclusive, free the English Company from any obligation to furnish any particulars in regard to risks accepted and limit the right of the National Company to the receipt of monthly statements of premiums and losses only. It is to be entitled to a proportionate part of the net premiums, salvages, and other benefits received by the English Company, and to bear its proportionate share of all losses, including any loss due to failure on the part of the original assured to pay the premium. The whole control of the business, including the settlement of all claims and the institution or defence of legal or other proceedings, is committed to the English Company, which is to receive as consideration for the agreement and as remuneration for obtaining, managing, and supervising the business a commission of 2½ per cent. on the net premiums paid or allowed to the National Company in respect of its participation, and a commission of 10 per cent. on the profits derived by the National Company from the whole of the business under the agreement.

Such are the relevant terms of the document which I have to construe, but I must not omit to mention two passages which were relied upon as indicating some doubt on the part of the contracting parties as to the efficacy of their bargain in all circumstances. Article 10 begins with these words: "This being an agreement executed in a spirit of trust, one with the other, the participator" (that is, the National Company) "is absolutely bound in every case to follow the fortunes of the (English) Company." And in the arbitration clause it is agreed that all disputes shall be settled by an equitable and liberal interpretation of the provisions of the agreement according to the spirit thereof and that the arbitrators are relieved from all judicial formalities and may abstain from following the strict rule of the law.

The document, it has been suggested, is one whereby the English Company is appointed the agent of the National Company for effecting insurances, or, alternatively, is one in the nature of a partnership agreement. But, whatever be the particular appellation applied to it, there cannot, in my opinion, be any real doubt as to its true character. It is intended to cover marine risks: it is a contract of reinsurance under which, in return for a proportion of the premiums paid to cover marine risks, the National Company is bound to indemnify the English Company against a corresponding proportion of any loss incurred. It is, therefore, a contract for sea insurance and not being expressed in a policy it is invalid in that the only form of contract of sea insurance which the law recognizes is a duly stamped policy.

I think, therefore, that the liquidator was right, and that this summons must be dismissed, with costs.

DICKSON v. HAMPSTEAD BOROUGH COUNCIL.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Payments out of profits not brought into charge—Deduction of tax—Liability of person deducting to account to Inland Revenue Commissioners — Housing scheme—Money borrowed by borough council —Interest—Deduction of tax—Council owning profitable undertaking—Interest paid out of council's general fund—Indemnity of council against loss on scheme—Council's liability to account for sums deducted—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), All Schedules Rules, r. 21.

By Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, "(1) Upon payment of any . . . annual payment charged with tax under Schedule D, . . . not payable, or not wholly payable, out of profits or gains brought into charge, the person by or through whom any such payment is made shall deduct thereout a sum representing the amount of the tax. . . . (2) Any such person shall forthwith render an account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue of the amount so deducted, or of the amount deducted out of so much . . . as is not paid out of profits or gains brought into charge . . . and every such amount shall be a debt due from him to the Crown. . . ."

Under the Housing of the Working Classes Acts, 1890 to 1919, and the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the respondents, a metropolitan borough council, assigned to the London County Council all rates authorized to be raised by the respondents under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, or the London Government Act, 1899, to secure money advanced by the London County Council.

The money so raised was used by the respondents in connexion with the construction of flats for the working classes in pursuance of a scheme prepared by them under s. 1 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919.

In making payments of interest on the sums advanced the respondents deducted income-tax under Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The interest was paid out of the general fund in the hands of the respondents, into which fund were paid all profits or gains whether derived from a housing scheme or from elsewhere. The respondents had only one banking account, out of which all payments, including the interest, were made and into which all receipts, including the profits and gains derived from the respondents' electricity undertaking, or otherwise, were paid. No special fund in respect of any housing scheme was maintained.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It was admitted that the respondents possessed profits or gains brought into charge to income-tax sufficient for the payment of interest on the sums advanced, apart from any revenue derived under any housing scheme.

Held, that as none of the respondents' profits and gains other than the receipts of the housing scheme contributed to the payment of the interest, and as the respondents had, under the Housing Acts, an indemnity against loss on the scheme, the respondents were liable under Rule 21 to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the amount of the deductions.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The Hampstead Borough Council, the respondents, appealed against assessments to income-tax in the sums of £600, £7,681, and £7,500 for the years ending April 5, 1921, April 5, 1922, and April 5, 1923, made upon them under the provisions of the Income Tax Acts. There was no dispute as to figures. The only question was whether under Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, the respondents were liable to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the amount of the tax deducted by the respondents on paying the interest under certain indentures of mortgage. If they were liable so to account, the assessments were to stand ; if they were not, the assessments were to be discharged.

The relevant facts and the material statutory provisions were as follow :—

Under the provisions of section 1 (1) of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, it was the duty of every local authority within the meaning of Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, to prepare and submit to the Local Government Board a scheme for the exercise of its powers under Part III., i.e., its powers for, and incidental to, the provision of houses for the working classes in its area.

Section 7 (1) of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act of 1919 enacted as follows :—

"If it appears to the Local Government Board that the carrying out by a local authority . . . of any scheme . . . has resulted or is likely to result in a loss, the Board shall, if the scheme is carried out within such period after the passing of this Act as may be specified by the Board with the consent of the Treasury, pay or undertake to pay to the local authority . . . out of moneys provided by Parliament such part of the loss as may be determined to be so payable under regulations made by the Board with the approval of the Treasury, subject to such conditions as may be prescribed by those regulations."

Under the provisions of section 41 (1) (b) of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, the council of a metropolitan borough was to be the local authority for the metropolitan borough to the exclusion of any other authority so far as regarded the provision of houses within the metropolitan borough.

Section 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1900, enacted as follows :—

"(1) Any expenses incurred by the council of a metropolitan borough under Part III. of the principal Act, whether within or without the borough, shall be defrayed as part of the ordinary expenses of the council, and in that Act the expressions 'district,' 'local authority,' and 'local rate' shall, for the purposes of Part III. of the Act, include a metropolitan borough, the council of the borough, and the general rate of the borough.

"(2) Where the council of a metropolitan borough adopt Part III. of the principal Act, the power of the council to borrow for the purposes of that Part shall be exercisable in the like manner and subject to the like conditions as the power of the council to borrow for the purposes of Part II. of that Act."

By section 1 "the principal Act" meant the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. By section 10 (1) of the London Government Act, 1899, and the London (Rating) Scheme, 1901, made thereunder, all money to be raised by rates to meet the expenses of a metropolitan borough council was payable out of the general rates of the borough. Under the provisions of section 25 (1) and 46 (2) of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, a local authority might borrow such money as was required for the purposes of Part II. of that Act on the security of the local rate in the manner laid down in section 183 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.

Under the provisions of section 46 (3) the London County Council might, if they thought fit, lend to a local authority in the administrative county of London the sums borrowed in pursuance of Part II. of that Act. Under the provisions of section 183 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the sums borrowed and the interest paid were charged or might be charged on the rates authorized to be raised under that Act.

5. Section 8 (1) of the Housing Act, 1921, enacted as follows :—

"The London County Council shall, subject to such conditions as may be prescribed by regulations made by the Minister with the consent of the Treasury, repay to the council of a metropolitan borough any loss which may be incurred by that council in carrying out a scheme to which section 7 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, applies, and any payments so made by the London County Council shall be deemed to have been made as part of the expenses incurred by them in carrying out a scheme to which that section applies."

In accordance with the powers contained in section 7 (1) of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, certain regulations entitled "The Local Authorities (Assisted Housing Schemes) Regulations, 1919" (S.R. and O., 1919, No. 2,047), were made by the Minister of Health with the approval of the Treasury.

Article IV. of those Statutory Rules and Orders stated as follows :—

"(1) The local authority shall for the purposes of an assisted scheme, or a scheme which, in the opinion of the Minister, is likely to become an assisted scheme, keep separate accounts, to be called 'The Housing (Assisted Scheme) Accounts,' including a separate revenue account, to be called 'The Housing (Assisted Scheme) Revenue Account.'

"(2) They shall cause to be credited to the Housing (Assisted Scheme) Revenue Account in each financial year :—

"(a) The produce of a rate of one penny in the pound levied in the area chargeable with the expenses of the assisted scheme, or such less amount as may be necessary to meet the deficit for the financial year ; (b) the rents (inclusive of rates where rates are payable by the owner) in respect of any houses provided or acquired by them under the assisted scheme ; and (c) any other income which in the opinion of the Minister may properly be credited to the said account.

" (3) They shall cause to be debited to the Housing (Assisted Scheme) Revenue Account in each financial year :—

" (a) The sums required for interest and repayment of principal in respect of all moneys borrowed by them for the purposes of the assisted scheme (including moneys borrowed for the purchase of land which is approved by the Minister as part of the assisted scheme) which in the opinion of the Minister may properly be debited to the said account ; (b) the rates, taxes, rents or other charges payable by them in respect of any land or houses acquired, leased or provided by them under the assisted scheme, including any sums payable by way of rent, with the approval of the Minister, to any other account of the local authority in respect of land acquired by them for some other purpose and appropriated for purposes of the assisted scheme. . . ."

By Article VI. :—

" (b) During the period after any part of the assisted scheme has been carried into effect, and before the whole of the assisted scheme has been carried into effect, the Exchequer subsidy in respect of that part of the assisted scheme which has been carried into effect shall be calculated upon the basis of an estimate submitted to the Minister by the local authority and approved by the Minister, and in respect of that part of the assisted scheme which has not been carried into effect shall be an amount equivalent to the deficit under the last-mentioned part of the assisted scheme as shown by the entries relating thereto in the Housing (Assisted Scheme) Revenue Account at the conclusion of the financial year. . . .

" (g) The Exchequer subsidy in so far as it is calculated upon an estimate shall be determined on the basis of the average annual deficit to be incurred by the local authority under the assisted scheme (or under that part of the assisted scheme which has been carried into effect as the case may be) as shown by the estimate last made by the local authority under this Article, and shall be the equivalent of the amount of the said average annual deficit subject to the deduction from the said average annual deficit of the estimated produce of a rate of one penny in the pound hereinbefore referred to, provided that in the determination of the amount of the Exchequer subsidy during the period to which paragraph (b) of this Article applies there shall be added to the amount of the said average annual deficit an amount equivalent to the deficit referred to in the said paragraph (b)."

In accordance with the powers given by section 8 (1) of the Housing Act, 1921, certain further regulations, entitled " The London County Council Assisted Housing Scheme (Losses by Metropolitan Borough Councils)," were made by the Minister of Health with the approval of the Treasury and became Statutory Rules and Orders No. 874 of 1922.

Rule 3 (1) stated as follows :—

" For the purposes of the scheme of a council the loss in the carrying out of which is repayable by the London County Council under section 8 of the Housing Act, 1921, the council shall keep separate accounts to be called ' The Housing (Assisted Scheme) Accounts ' including a separate revenue account to be called ' The Housing (Assisted Scheme) Revenue Accounts ' (hereinafter referred to as ' The Revenue Account ') and the Housing Accounts Order (Local Authorities), 1920, shall so far as applicable apply to those accounts."

In accordance with the powers given to the respondents under the provisions of the Housing of the Working Classes Acts, 1890 to 1919, and the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, four indentures of mortgage were made dated February 9, 1921, March 7, 1921, July 29, 1921, and August 1, 1925, between the respondents and the London County Council under the terms whereof the respondents granted and assigned unto the London County Council, their successors and assigns, the general rate and all others (if any) the moneys or rates authorized to be raised by the respondents under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, or the London Government Act, 1899, to secure the capital and interest in respect of the following sums of money advanced by the London County Council—namely, £50,000, £50,000, £60,000, and £40,261.

The money so raised by these indentures was used by the respondents in connexion with the construction of a large block of flats for the working classes in pursuance of a scheme prepared by them under section 1 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, and known as the South End Close Housing Scheme.

In making payments of interest on the sums advanced under the indentures the respondents deducted income-tax at the rate in force at the time under the provisions of Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The interest was paid out of the general fund in the hands of the respondents, into which fund were paid all profits or gains whether derived from a housing scheme or from elsewhere. The respondents had only one banking account—namely, at Lloyds Bank, Hampstead branch—out of which all payments, including the interest, were made and into which all receipts, including the profits and gains hereinafter mentioned, were paid. No special fund in respect of any housing scheme was maintained.

It was admitted that for all years material to this appeal the respondents possessed profits or gains brought into charge to income-tax amply sufficient for the payment of interest on the sums advanced under the indentures of mortgage, apart from any revenue derived under any housing scheme.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the mortgage interest was wholly payable, and paid, out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax within the meaning of Rules 19 and 21 of the All Schedules Rules, and consequently the respondents were under no liability to account for the amount of the tax deducted by them when paying such interest ; that the respondents if they pleased could earmark for the payment of the interest as much as was necessary of the profits or gains brought into charge to tax derived by them from their electricity undertaking or otherwise, and pay the same into a separate banking account kept exclusively in respect of the interest ; that the respondents were in no worse position because in fact they paid the profits and gains into their general banking account and paid the interest therefrom ; that the interest was charged on their general rate and paid from their general funds and the profits and gains were paid into their general funds and were applicable in relief of their general rate and/or in payment of their ordinary expenses ; that it was immaterial that their losses in respect of their housing scheme (save as to certain minor items) were subsequently reimbursed to them by the London County Council.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended, inter alia, that the principal and interest of the mortgages were charged on the general rate and therefore not upon profits and gains brought into charge, and the fact that certain receipts which were profits and gains brought into charge were paid into the general fund did not entitle the respondents to say that the interest was paid out of these profits and gains; that the interest, in so far as it exceeded the revenue derived from the housing scheme, was not payable out of other profits or gains of the council brought into charge; that it was not so payable inasmuch as the interest, in so far as it exceeded the available revenue derived from the housing scheme, represented a loss the burden of which by statute could not fall upon the respondents and was, therefore, a loss which did not and could not fall to be paid out of other profits and gains belonging to the respondents; that the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, the Housing Act, 1921, and the regulations made under these Acts clearly showed the intention of the Legislature that assisted housing schemes should be kept entirely separate in matters of finance from the other undertakings of a local authority and that, therefore, such local authority could not lawfully transfer the surplus profits or gains from any of its other undertakings to the relief of loss upon its housing scheme, or to the payment of interest upon capital moneys borrowed for that scheme.

It was contended that the purpose of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919, and the Housing Act, 1921, was the provision of houses for the working classes without loss to a local authority, and the respondents' contentions, if considered in the light of that purpose, could not be sustained, inasmuch as (i) a housing scheme would, if such contentions were correct, result in profit to a local authority (although actually executed at a loss) where such local authority had other enterprises producing profit; and (ii) that a distinction for housing purposes would thus be drawn and inequality would result between local authorities with such other enterprises and those without, a distinction which could not have been intended by the Housing Acts.

"We hold that the respondents are entitled to apply the proceeds of any profits or gains brought into charge to tax to the payment of interest on the sums advanced on mortgage by the London County Council, it being admitted that such profits or gains were amply sufficient for the purpose.

"We do not consider that the payment of the interest in question should be confined to profits or gains derived solely from the housing scheme. We therefore hold that the respondents are not liable to account for the tax deducted in making payments of interest, and that the appeal succeeds.

"We have arrived at this conclusion after considering the various statutes and cases to which our attention has been drawn; in particular we are of the opinion that the provisions of section 46 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, section 3 (2) of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1900, and the case of Sugden v. Leeds Corporation (29 The Times L.R., 402; [1914] A.C., 483) support this view. We also attach considerable importance to the fact that in the various indentures of mortgage the respondents granted and assigned to the London County Council the general rate and all other moneys or rates authorized to be raised by the respondents under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, as security for the sums advanced."

The Special Commissioners discharged all the assessments in question.

Mr. R. P. Hills, with him the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), appeared for the Crown; Mr. G. R. Blanco White for the Borough Council.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment allowing the appeal, said that he thought that the conclusion was not difficult to arrive at. The borough council had made payments of interest and had deducted tax. How much were they entitled to retain on the ground that it was paid out of profits and gains already brought into charge? To meet the interest on the mortgages there was a certain income from the housing scheme itself, and to the extent of that income the interest must be treated as payable out of that income. But the income from the housing scheme was not sufficient to meet the outgoings. That deficit was made up by the London County Council at the expense partly of the Exchequer and partly of the ratepayers—anyhow by payments of money which were not profits and gains.

The borough council had other undertakings which showed a profit, such as their electricity undertaking. They kept only one banking account and they said that the interest was to be treated as paid not only out of the profits and gains of the housing scheme, but out of the profits and gains of the electricity undertaking. The consequence was that the payments of sums by the London County Council were made to make up a deficit in a fund which did not include those other profits and gains, but to which the only other contributory was the profit of the housing scheme itself.

Two London County Council cases had been cited. The present case seemed to him to differ from the first case of London County Council v. Attorney-General (17 The Times L.R., 131; [1901] A.C., 26) and to be on the same footing as Attorney-General v. London County Council (23 The Times L.R., 390; [1907] A.C., 131). In the first of these cases the interest was paid out of a fund which included the profits and gains so applied. In the present case the untaxed moneys did not go to swell the profits and gains. What was given here was such a sum as should prevent the charge of this interest upon any fund other than the housing scheme.

That was exactly the position in the second London County Council case (supra). There the London County Council had property which could not produce any money. They enjoyed its value by occupying it. If they had been allowed to retain the tax it would have meant that they were to a certain extent tax free. So in the present case there was legislation which prevented the electricity undertaking from effectively contributing to the housing scheme. If what was contended for could be done the corporation would be enjoying the profits and gains of the electricity undertaking to some extent tax free, because these profits and gains would be used to pay interest which would be immediately refunded. The corporation were indemnified from paying the interest at all except so far as they paid it out of the housing fund.

The fact that the income from the electricity undertaking had been passed through the account from which payment was made had nothing to do with it. What really paid was the receipts of the housing scheme and the subsidy and nothing else. None of the other profits and gains contributed.

The appeal must be allowed, with costs.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1927. May 27.

BEDNALL v. BEDNALL AND SHIVUSSAWA.*

Divorce—Custody of child—Legitimated child—Application for declaration of legitimation and for custody—Child not a party—Jurisdiction — Legitimacy Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 60), s. 1 ; Schedule, para. 1 (b).

The unmarried parents of an illegitimate child married one another, the father being domiciled in England at the time of the marriage. Subsequently the husband obtained a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery, and he applied that there should be inserted in the decree nisi, (1) a declaration that the child was the legitimated child of the parties, and (2) an order that he should be given the custody of the child.

Held, that although upon the evidence the conditions of s. 1 of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, had been fulfilled, yet, as the child was not a party to the suit, the Court ought not to adjudicate upon the question whether the child was legitimated by the Act, since the Court was not, unless the child was a party, a "Court of competent jurisdiction" within para. 1 (b) of the Schedule to the Act ; and that therefore the Court had, as matters stood, no power to make an order for the custody of the child.

In this petition Captain Cecil Norbury Bednall, of Lewisham Hill, an Army officer, sought the dissolution of his marriage with Doreen Alexandra Bednall, née Kennedy, on the ground of her adultery with a Japanese named Shivussawa at Queen Alexandra-mansions, Grape-street, Holborn.

Mr. H. B. D. Grazebrook, who appeared for the petitioner, submitted that if the case were proved the decree nisi order with regard to the custody of the child should contain a declaration to the effect that the child mentioned in the petition was the legitimated child of the petitioner and the respondent. The child was born on May 26, 1922, and the parents, now the petitioner and the respondent, were married on July 22, 1922. By the Legitimacy Act, 1926, section 1 (1), it was enacted that where the parents of an illegitimate person married that person should be legitimate from the date of the marriage or the commencement of the Act (January 1, 1927), whichever last happened. The schedule to the Act provided for the re-registration of the birth of a legitimated person by the Registrar-General on the application of both parents. In this case the mother was believed to be in America with the child, who had been taken out of the custody of the father, and no trace could be found of the original registration of the child. The birth certificate had been lost. The father wished if it were possible to have a declaration as to legitimation in connexion with the order for custody.

Counsel pointed out that the schedule to the Act, in paragraph 1 (b), dealt with the establishment of the paternity of a legitimated person "by an affiliation order or otherwise by a decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction," and section 6 (1) of the Act enacted : "A legitimated person shall have the same rights and shall be under the same obligations in respect of the maintenance and support of himself or of any other person as if he had been born legitimate, and, subject to the provisions of this Act, the provisions of any Act relating to claims for damages, compensation, allowance, benefit, or otherwise by or in respect of a legitimate child shall apply in like manner in the case of a legitimated person."

The petitioner, said counsel, was domiciled in England. He was unmarried at the time of the birth of the child and of the subsequent marriage, and, so far as the petitioner knew, the respondent was a spinster at the time of the marriage. This was the first case before the Court under the new Act. The child was undoubtedly legitimated by the Act, and he submitted that in the circumstances it was competent for the Court to give the petitioner an order for custody of the child drawn up in the manner suggested.

After hearing the evidence, his Lordship granted a decree nisi, but reserved his decision on the question of an order for custody of the child.

Mr. Justice Hill, in his considered judgment, said :—

I have pronounced a decree nisi of the dissolution of the marriage of the husband and wife which took place on July 22, 1922. There remains the question whether, upon the materials before me, and in the present state of the cause as to the parties, I can make an order for custody of the child. The petitioner alleged that "there is no issue of the said marriage, but there is a legitimated child—namely, Dorita Cecilia, who was born on May 26, 1922." The petitioner's prayer asked for "custody of the said legitimated child." The petition was duly served upon the respondent, and she entered an appearance.

If the child had been issue of the marriage I should have had no hesitation in giving the petitioner custody of her. In the present case, before the Legitimacy Act, 1926, I could have made no order. I have to consider whether, and in what circumstances and upon what proof, I can, since the passing of that Act, make an order in respect of a child claimed to be the legitimated child of the husband and wife whose marriage is the subject of proceedings.

I was asked on behalf of the petitioner to do two things :—(1) To make a declaration that the child was legitimated ; and (2) to give custody to the petitioner. The petitioner was bound to ask for both because until the Court found that the child was legitimated it would have no power to grant custody. But when I am asked to make a declaration that the child was legitimated I must remember that the husband and wife are not the only persons interested in the question whether the child is one to whom the Act applies. The child is interested, but she is not at present a party to the suit. In her absence I do not think that I ought to adjudicate upon the question.

I have, it is true, evidence of the husband, who says that the child was born illegitimate ; that he was the father ; that the mother always treated him as such ; that he married the mother two months after the birth of the child ; that at the date of the birth neither he nor the mother was married to a third person ; and that he was at the date of the marriage domiciled in England. This evidence, if acted upon, would show that all the conditions of section 1 of the Act were fulfilled, and the effect of the Act would be that the child was legitimated as from January 1, 1927. But I repeat that I do not think that I ought to act upon that evidence in a proceeding to which the child is not a party.

The Act, by paragraphs 1 (b) and (c) of the Schedule, contemplates that paternity may be established by a decree of a Court of competent jurisdiction, or by an affiliation order, or by a declaration of legitimacy under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, as amended by the Act of 1926. Parliament seems to have overlooked the fact that the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, has been, as to nearly all of it, repealed by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which substitutes for it section 188 of that Act.

Unless the child is a party I do not think that this Court is a "Court of competent jurisdiction." Reference was made to section 6 (1) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926. I do not think that that has any application to custody. If the child is once found to be legitimated, the powers of the Court under section 193 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as to custody, extend to her; for she is a child the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings.

His LORDSHIP said that it would be for the petitioner to consider the possibility of any further proceeding in which the child would be a party to the suit.

GRAIGOLA MERTHYR COMPANY, LIMITED v. SWANSEA CORPORATION.*

Waterworks — Liability of undertakers — Threatened injury to property—Right of owners to bring quia timet action—Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. c. 17), s. 27.

Section 27 of the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847, does not merely save the right of the owners of property injured by the authorized waterworks to bring a common law action for damages, but leaves the undertakers liable to all legal proceedings which before the Act were open to such owners for protection against damage or injury arising from the works, whether such damage or injury is actual or threatened. It is therefore open to the owners of property threatened with injury by the authorized works to bring a quia timet action to restrain the undertakers from doing an act which threatens to injure such property.

His LORDSHIP delivered judgment dismissing this action, the hearing of which had lasted for 60 days, and directed that the plaintiffs should pay to the defendants two-thirds of their costs.

The action was brought quia timet by the Graigola Merthyr Company, Limited, a colliery company, seeking to restrain the Swansea Corporation from letting water into a large reservoir belonging to them on the ground that, if filled, the water would at some later date inevitably flood out the workings of the colliery company in the neighbourhood of the reservoir and cause a great disaster.

* Reported by H. C. GARSIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Upjohn, K.C., Mr. J. G. Wood, and Mr. A. T. James appeared for the plaintiffs; and Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., Mr. Holmes, and Mr. T. Jenkin Jones for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN, in giving judgment, said that this was an action in which a colliery company sought an injunction to restrain the Swansea Corporation from filling a certain reservoir so as to cause damage to the collieries and mines of the plaintiffs under or adjacent to the reservoir. The reservoir was empty and had stood empty for some years. The plaintiffs' case was that the filling of the reservoir would result in their mine being flooded by a sudden inundation. The action was, therefore, a quia timet action and nothing else.

The reservoir in question was constructed by the corporation under the Swansea Waterworks Act, 1860, with which was incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847, excepting certain immaterial sections, and under the Swansea Waterworks Act, 1873, which incorporated the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863.

The reservoir was completed and filled in 1879 and remained filled until 1911, when it was emptied. The reservoir was kept empty under an agreement dated September 23, 1912, to enable the plaintiffs to work the seams under the reservoir. Those workings were completed in 1917 and the reservoir was then kept empty for a further three years under the agreement. On October 26, 1920, the defendants in that year having expressed their intention to refill the reservoir the present action was begun.

Before he (his Lordship) dealt with the substance of the action it would be convenient to dispose of one point in the nature of a preliminary objection made by the defendants. They said that, having regard to the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847, the action would not lie. Section 6 of that Act provided that the undertakers should make to the owners, occupiers, and all other parties interested in any lands or streams taken or used for the purpose of the special Act, or injuriously affected by the construction or maintenance of the works thereby authorized, full compensation, to be ascertained under the Act, for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other persons.

Then section 27 enacted that:—

"Nothing in this or the special Act shall prevent the undertakers from being liable to any action or other legal proceeding to which they would have been liable for any damage or injury done or occasioned to any mines by means or in consequence of the waterworks, in case the same had not been constructed or maintained by virtue of this Act or the special Act."

It was contended by the defendants that under section 27 mineowners were only put in the favoured position of being able to take proceedings to the extent that they could sue for damages for injury actually suffered, but that there was no remedy by way of a quia timet action.

He thought that it would be a narrow and unreasonable construction of the section to say that it did nothing more than save the mineowners' common law action for damages. In his judgment it left the undertakers liable to all legal proceedings which, before the Act, were open to the mineowners for protection against damage or injury arising from the works whether actual or threatened. The mineowners were not bound to wait until the blow, however inevitable or disastrous, had actually fallen, before they were entitled to move. The preliminary point, therefore, failed.

His LORDSHIP then proceeded to deal with the substantive question in the action and, after an exhaustive examination of the evidence, came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had failed to prove their case. He also held that various charges of misconduct made by either side against the other were not justified.

There was one other matter to which the case directed attention. Of late years cases involving expert evidence had increased in number and length and the overloading of those cases in their preparation was becoming not infrequent. They placed the parties with the lesser resources at a grave disadvantage and they delayed the course of general business in the Courts. In every case of that kind there were generally many irreducible and stubborn facts upon which agreement between experts should be possible. In his judgment the expert advisers of the parties, whether legal or scientific, were under a special duty to the Court to limit in every possible way the contentious matters of fact to be dealt with at the hearing. The present case began in 1920. For six years materials were amassed, experts on both sides paid numerous visits to the locus in quo, but they never met on the spot to see whether, as to physical appearances in the mine and on the surface, they could not reach a measure of accord, nor was any other step taken to reduce the issues open at the time. The consequence was that the case had become unmanageable before the trial began. He thought that all concerned in litigation of this class must in future, in the preparation of their cases, more closely address their minds to restricting the area of dispute.

He would dismiss the action, prefacing the judgment with the words, "The Court, not being satisfied upon the evidence adduced that the filling of the reservoir would cause a sudden inundation of the plaintiffs' mines as alleged by the plaintiffs." Regard being had to the time occupied by charges and to the conduct of the parties on each side in connexion with them, he thought that substantial justice would be done by directing the plaintiffs to pay to the defendants two-thirds of their costs of action, making no other order as to costs.

BUERGER AND ANOTHER v. NEW YORK LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.*

Insurance (Life)—Policies taken out in Russia—Whether existent and enforceable—Russian law—Currency in which policy moneys payable.

Between 1903 and 1909 the plaintiffs, who were Russian subjects, effected with the defendants, an American insurance company then having a branch in Russia, certain insurances in the form of four endowment life policies and paid the premiums in Russia in roubles down to 1918. The amounts secured by two of the policies were now payable if the policies were still existent and enforceable, and it was admitted by both parties that the contracts were to be governed by Russian law. In an action claiming the amount due on the policies or the return of the premiums the defendants contended that by the laws of Russia the policies had become void, as the Russian Government had in 1919 by decree cancelled all kinds of life insurance and transferred all premiums to the Government Treasury. Uncontradicted evidence was given for the plaintiffs that by a Russian law made in 1923 the People's Commissariat of Justice was charged with the "interpretation" of existing laws and that the Commissariat had interpreted the decree of 1919 as having no application to contracts of life assurance made by Russian subjects with companies having assets which were in the United States and which were not liable to confiscation in Russia.

Held (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that as the Court could not, by putting its own construction on the term "interpretation," make for Russia a law which the Russian judicial system did not recognize, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the two policies above referred to, and that judgment should be entered for the sterling equivalent of the amounts due in chervonetz roubles at the date when those amounts became due.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of Mr. Justice Greer, dated January 13, 1927, and there was a cross-appeal by the defendants.

The plaintiffs' claim was for the amount due on four policies of endowment assurance issued by the defendant company, or, alternatively, the return of premiums paid by the plaintiffs thereunder. The policies were effected between 1903 and 1909 in Russia, where the defendants were then carrying on business and where the plaintiffs then resided. All premiums due and payable to the defendants under the policies were paid to the defendants in Russia in roubles down to the year 1918. If the policies were still existent and enforceable, the amounts secured by the first two policies were payable at the time when the writ was issued. The defendants relied upon certain decrees of the Russian Government as avoiding the policies. The defences are fully set out in the judgment of Lord Justice Bankes. The plaintiffs did not dispute the decrees, but relied on an interpretation of the Commissariat of Justice to the effect that the relevant decree had no application to their case.

Mr. Justice Greer held that the Commissariat of Justice had no power to give an interpretation of the decree that would become the law of Soviet Russia; and that no interpretation of the decree in question was in fact given, but only an opinion that it should be limited to contracts by Russian companies, as otherwise it would be depriving Russian citizens of claims against foreign corporations. He further held that if the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment it should be for the sterling equivalent of the chervonetz rouble (which was the exact equivalent of the ten roubles gold piece of the pre-war currency) at the date when the respective sums became due.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. van den Berg appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. H. G. Robertson for the defendants.

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin and T. W. Morgan, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The following considered judgments were delivered :—

LORD JUSTICE BANKES.—In this action the plaintiffs' claim is to establish their right to recover the amounts alleged to be due on four policies of insurance taken out by the male plaintiff between the years 1903 and 1909. The writ in the action was issued on February 15, 1926. In the events which have happened, the amounts secured by the first two of these policies would have become payable before the issue of the writ if the policies were still in existence and enforceable. As the defendants object to this Court's expressing any opinion with regard to the last two of these policies on the ground that in no circumstances would the amounts secured by them have been payable at the time when the writ was issued, I confine my judgment to the first two policies. These two policies were taken out in Russia in the years 1903 and 1905 by the male plaintiff, who was then resident in Russia. It is not disputed that the contracts so created are to be governed by Russian law. The difficulty in the present case, as in previous cases in this Court, is to determine what the Russian law applicable to the case is. That law has to be proved as a question of fact. In previous cases the Court has been confronted by the evidence of a number of experts in Russian law who have flatly contradicted each other as to what the law applicable to the particular case was. The peculiarity of the present case is that only one witness was called. He was called for the plaintiffs. The defendants had experts in Russian law in Court, but they were not called to throw any doubt upon the correctness of the evidence of the plaintiffs' witness.

There are two points in this case : (1) Whether the policies were or were not subsisting and enforceable contracts at the date of the writ ; (2) if they were, what is the sum, expressed in British currency, for which judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs. On both points the witness's evidence, if accepted, was in the plaintiffs' favour. The learned Judge who tried the case accepted the evidence on the second point, but refused to accept it on the first point. He therefore gave judgment for the defendants. Both parties appeal.

The question for this Court is whether the learned Judge's view on either point is correct.

On the first point, the issue is clearly upon the defendants. There is no question as to the policies having been taken out or as to the moneys secured by them having become payable at the date of the writ unless something had happened to avoid the policies. What the defendants rely upon as having avoided the policies is set out in paragraphs 12 to 17 of their defence, as follows :—

12. By the laws of Russia, set out in and made part of the said policies, the defendants were obliged as a condition of carrying on business in Russia to deposit in the Russian State Bank funds and securities to secure payment of their obligations on insurances concluded in Russia which included the said four policies.

13. By a decree of the Russian Government dated December 1, 1918, (a) all kinds of insurance were declared and made the monopoly of the State ; (b) all insurance organizations in Russia, which included the defendants' branch and business therein, were ordered to be liquidated and declared to be the property of the Government or State—namely, the Russian Socialistic Federative Sovietic Republic, and such liquidation was ordered to be completed by April 1, 1919 ; and (c) the business and affairs of life insurance were transferred to a department of the State.

14. By a further order or decree of the Russian Government dated February 8, 1919, addressed to the defendants' representatives in Russia and others, it was decided by such Government and notified to such representatives that the defendants' agency or branch in Russia was subject to the terms of the said decree of December 1, 1918, and to be liquidated under the provisions thereof.

15. By a further decree of the said Government dated November 18, 1919, it was decreed (amongst other things) that all kinds of life insurance and all contracts of life insurance were cancelled and all insurance premiums transferred to the Government Treasury.

16. By section 2 of the Civil Code of the Russian Republic no litigation as to civil relations which arose prior to November 7, 1917, is accepted for hearing by judicial and other institutions of the Republic.

17. In pursuance and by virtue of the said decrees and code, which form part of the law of Russia and to which for their full terms the defendants will refer, the Russian Government has assumed and taken over the liability of the defendants under the said policies and has taken possession of and appropriated all the funds and securities deposited by the defendants in Russia to secure payment of their obligations on insurances concluded in Russia, and by such decrees and code has declared and rendered null and void the policies sued on and has determined and avoided any obligations of the defendants thereunder.

The plaintiffs do not dispute the existence of the decrees there referred to, but they assert that the decree of November 18, 1919, has been authoritatively interpreted in Russia as having no application to a case such as theirs, and that this interpretation constitutes the law of Russia applicable to the present case and must be accepted as such by the Courts of this country. That this is the result of the evidence of the only witness called to prove the law is, in my opinion, established. He founded his view upon a decree of the Pan-Russian Central Executive Committee of February 1, 1923, which, he said, had the force of law and which charged the People's Commissariat of Justice with, inter alia, "the interpretation of existing laws on requests of the Central and local authorities."

It may seem strange to our notions to entrust the interpretation of existing laws to a Government Department, but if the Soviet Government choose to do it, it is no affair of ours. Similarly, if the Soviet Government think it right to confer that duty under the elastic term of some Russian word which is translated "interpretation," again, it is no concern of ours. How elastic the term "interpretation" may be can be instanced by many illustrations from decided cases in the Courts of this country, where over and over again the Courts have felt themselves bound to put some limitation upon general language used by the Legislature. A recent instance in this Court and in the House of Lords is the case of The Ruapehu (42 The Times L.R., 708 ; [1927] P. 47 ; 43 The Times L.R., 402).

The witness called for the plaintiffs, after referring to the decree of February 1, 1923, went on to refer to a decision of the People's Commissariat of Justice dated October 16, 1924, made at the request of the Agricultural Bank, whereby they interpreted the decree of November 18, 1919, as having no application to contracts of life assurance such as those in question in this action, that is to say, contracts of life assurance made by Russian subjects with companies having assets in the United States which are not liable to confiscation in Russia.

It is easy to disagree with the policy which confiscated the defendants' deposits in Russia. It is equally easy to disagree with the reasons given for the interpretation of the law of November 18, 1919, but the fact that one may not agree with what has taken place does not justify one in refusing to accept a competent witness's uncontradicted evidence that it is the law.

I do not propose to examine the cases in which the question has been discussed as to how far, when dealing with the question of foreign law, it is competent for our Courts to put their own construction on a written document, because the question does not seem to me to arise in this case.

Assuming it to be the law in Russia that the People's Commissariat of Justice has jurisdiction to "interpret" the law, it seems to me to follow that it is also within their jurisdiction to say what comes within the term "interpretation" as used in the administration of Russian law, and that a Court in this country cannot, by putting its own construction upon the term "interpretation" as it understands it, make a law for Russia which the Russian judicial system does not recognize.

For these reasons I am unable to agree with the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer on this point, and particularly I am unable to agree with that part of his judgment which suggests that Mr. Krougliakoff's evidence did not go the length of saying that an interpretation by the Commissariat of Justice constituted part of the law of the Soviet Republic. I do not so read his evidence.

Upon the second point, I see no reason to differ from the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Justice Greer. But for the evidence of Mr. Krougliakoff, I confess that I should have felt faced upon the facts with a practically insoluble problem. The witness, however, has propounded a solution as being the Russian law on the subject, and Mr. Justice Greer has accepted his evidence. I do not think it necessary to add anything on this part of the case to the judgment of the learned Judge.

In the result the appeal will be allowed, and the cross-appeal dismissed, in each case with costs. Judgment will be entered for the plaintiffs on the two first policies for amounts calculated in accordance with the decision of the learned Judge.

If any difficulty arises as to amounts there is liberty to apply.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This appeal again raises the troublesome questions involved in the construction of the revolutionary and confiscatory legislation of the Soviet Government.

Mr. Buerger, a Russian subject resident in Russia during the years 1903 to 1909, effected in Russia four policies of life and endowment assurance with the Russian branch of the New York Life Assurance Company, a United States company. The policies were expressed to pay the assured on his death, or at the expiration of 20 years, whichever should first happen, a sum expressed in roubles. If the amount was payable on death, the amount was payable at the St. Petersburg office; it is not stated where the sum was payable if the assured lived for the 20 years. The premium was expressed in roubles. To guarantee the insured against loss a deposit was made in the Russian State Bank, and that, with all other property belonging to the company, was a guarantee for payment under the policy. The company was to be amenable to Russian laws, present and future, and in case of dispute should be bound by the decisions of the Russian judicial tribunals. Russian insurances were to be managed by a special branch of the company and a chief representative established at St. Petersburg, who could be sued as representing the company. The policy lapses on non-payment of the premium within a certain time, but if a certain number of years' premiums have been paid the assured can, at the end of the 20 years, recover an agreed amount. All claims are agreed to be subject to the jurisdiction of the St. Petersburg Courts only.

In 1913 the assured came to England, and became domiciled, but not naturalized here; this fact does not appear to have any legal relevance, the contract remaining a Russian contract. In 1917-1918 difficulties arose about payment of the premiums; Mr. Buerger was not able to hear whether his agent in Russia had paid the premiums in roubles, as Mr. Buerger, "not wanting to lose on the exchange," wished to do, and a temporary arrangement was made for deposit in sterling of the premiums at pre-war exchange, to be released if the premiums had been paid in Russia. Ultimately no premiums were paid after October, 1918, and the policies therefore lapsed some time in 1919, and the claim in the action was for the agreed sum under the provisions of the policies. Then came the series of Soviet decrees which raise the difficulty. On December 1, 1918, while the policies were still in force, a law was passed by the Council of Commissaries making all kinds of insurance a State monopoly, "liquidating" all private insurance companies, and making their property the property of the Soviet Government; in virtue of this decree it was proved that the Government had confiscated 78 million roubles deposited by the company to guarantee obligations under Russian policies amounting to 47 million roubles. Unfortunately the Government did not themselves meet the obligations under the policies, though they appropriated the funds provided to pay them. For a time the Soviet Government collected premiums on the Russian policies existing, but in November, 1919, they changed their position. By a decree, taking the force of law, which came into force on November 20, 1919, it was enacted: "(1) Life insurance of all kinds (capitals and income) in the R.S.F.S.R. is abolished. (2) All contracts made with insurance companies and savings-banks for life insurance, capitals and incomes, are annulled. (3) All insurance premiums (payments of the insured) are transferred to the revenue of the Treasury." If the matter had stopped there, I cannot doubt that this action would fail. The statute abolishes all life insurance, and all contracts made with insurance companies for life insurance, and I cannot see any way to imply an exception in favour of contracts made by Russian citizens in Russia with Russian branches of foreign companies, especially when the Soviet Government has confiscated all the funds deposited to guarantee such contracts.

The difficulty arises in this way. The Civil Code came into operation on January 1, 1923, and its second section provided: "No litigation as to civil legal relations which arose prior to November 7, 1917, is accepted for hearing by judicial and other institutions of the Republic." Neither, therefore, the judicial institution nor the other Governmental institutions of the Republic can deal with "litigation as to civil legal relations, which arose prior to November 7, 1917." It was not possible, therefore, for either class of institutions to determine controversies on pre-war policies. But on February 1, 1923, a statute establishing the Commissariat of Justice charged it, and declared it competent, to "interpret existing laws" at the request of central and local authorities; not to make new laws, but to interpret existing ones. A declaration that "the law of such a date has such a meaning" would apparently be within its powers; a declaration that, while the law of such a date says so and so, we substitute something different, would not be within its powers; this would be legislation, not interpretation. Nor is dispensing from the operation of the law interpretation.

However, it appears from a document of October 16, 1924, that the Russian Bank of Agriculture asked the Commissariat of Justice for an "interpretation," apparently of the decree of November, 1919, No. 541, already cited, on the question whether Russian holders of life insurance policies had lost their right to recover insurance compensation. The Commissariat, desiring to "avoid the enrichment of foreign debtors," expresses the opinion that the statute does not apply to claims on foreign insurance companies outside Russia. What effect it gives to the fact that these policies are Russian contracts, to be interpreted by Russian Courts in accordance with Russian law, it does not state. It does express the opinion that the confiscation by the Russian Government of the funds provided to guarantee the policies does not affect the rights of Russian assured.

The assured called Mr. Krougliakoff, a Russian barrister who left the country in 1916, to prove the Russian law, and he produced the decree of November, 1919, and the "interpretation" of 1924, and gave evidence that the Commissariat of Justice was, by Russian law, entitled to give authoritative pronouncements on the true construction of the Russian law, and that the document of 1924 was such an authoritative interpretation of the law. We are told that other Russian experts were sitting behind the defendants' counsel and were not called to contradict Mr. Krougliakoff. The learned Judge declined to accept this interpretation of the decree of November, 1919, but held that the decree, as its words say, annulled the contract of life insurance sued on, and that the plaintiffs must, therefore, fail. The plaintiffs appeal, and argue that there was before the Court only evidence one way, and that the Court was bound to accept it. This raises the question as to the powers and duties of the Court in dealing with evidence of experts in foreign law. It appears to me that, just as in other cases, the Court is not bound to accept the plaintiffs' case as true, though there is no evidence the other way. In particular when the foreign expert produces a foreign statute, and says that here is the foreign law, and that it has a certain meaning, this Court has always held itself at liberty to look at the statute and construe it, taking into account as part of the evidence the statement of the foreign expert as to its meaning. In Concha v. Murrieta; De Mora v. Concha (40 Ch.D., 543), where the Peruvian Code was referred to, and it was objected that the Court was confined to the view expressed by the foreign expert as to the meaning of the Code, Lord Justice Cotton, in whose judgment Lord Justice Lindley entirely concurred, says, at page 550: "The proper evidence of the law of any foreign country is evidence by lawyers of that country, but if in their evidence they refer to passages in the code of the country whose law we are endeavouring to ascertain, it would, as it appears to me, be most unreasonable to hold that we are not at liberty to look at those passages and consider what is their proper meaning." Lord Justice Lopes, at page 554, expresses himself thus: "I believe the rule in such a case to be that if an expert witness called to prove foreign law states that any text book, decision, code, or other legal document, truly represents that law, then the Court is at liberty to regard the legal document to which he refers, not as evidence per se, but as part of the testimony of the witness, and to deal with it, and give the same effect to it, as to any other portion of the evidence of the expert witness." The same view was taken of the effect, as evidence, of a judgment of a subordinate Court of the country whose law is in question, in the case of Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Hannay and Co. (34 The Times L.R., 427; [1918] 2 K.B., 623), where Lord Justice Pickford says, at page 638: "The witnesses for the plaintiffs have given evidence that this decision of Mr. Justice Noyes is incorrect in American law and inconsistent with other authorities. The defendants' witnesses have given evidence to the contrary, and both have cited authorities in support of their respective contentions. It seems to me that we must consider whether in our opinion this decision was correct, and must consider it as a question of fact upon the evidence. If this were not so, evidence as to foreign law would be useless wherever there was a decision of any foreign Judge on the point, and our Courts could only follow that decision as a binding authority. This is not the position of our Courts in such a matter. It may be that we have, strictly speaking, the same power to consider a decision of the ultimate Court of Appeal, but I cannot imagine that an English Court would hold a decision of the final Court of Appeal in the State of New York erroneous according to the law of that State." A similar passage appears at page 667 of that case. It is otherwise with a decision of the higher Court of the country, rather as a question of weight of evidence than absolute conclusiveness. Lord Sumner expresses the same view in Bankers and Shippers Insurance Company of New York v. Liverpool Marine and General Insurance Company, Limited (24 Ll.L., at p. 93), where he says: "I do not think that the Court of Appeal were wrong in undertaking for themselves the interpretation of that law as of any other document, public or private, produced before them. The language presented no difficulty. The law contained no novel terms of art. On the law of the State of New York existing prior to the passing of the Arbitration Act the witnesses were agreed, though otherwise their evidence was contradictory. No decision of the Court of that State was forthcoming which proceeded on facts quite similar to those in the present case; and the report of Bullard and Company v. Grace and Company (240 N.Y. 388), a case then capable of being appealed to the Court of Appeals, did not purport to cover the precise point which now arises. Though the Lords Justices were not competent to lay down the law of the State of New York, and did not assume to do so, they were well equipped to express an authoritative opinion upon the meaning of the relevant sections of the statute. In their place I venture to think that I should have formed the same view." It was said that this only applied to cases when there was conflicting evidence, and it is true that in Bremer v. Freeman (10 Moore, P.C., 306) the question of conflicting evidence is mentioned, but the Judges in Concha v. Murrieta; De Mora v. Concha (supra) do not make this limitation on their principle, and I can see no reason why a Court is bound to accept the evidence of an expert witness as to fact, when he supports it by a document the plain words of which render his opinion impossible. When the Russian legislative body enacts that "All contracts made with insurance companies for life insurance are annulled," I cannot see that it is possible to imply an exception of contracts made in Russia by Russian citizens subject to Russian law and the jurisdiction only of the Russian Courts if they are made with the Russian branch of a foreign insurance company. And to do Mr. Krougliakoff justice, I do not think he said that this was the meaning which he would put on the decree by itself. He relied on the authoritative interpretation of the decree by the Commissariat of Justice. But in my view it is not possible to treat this as an interpretation; it is a partial repeal, or dispensation, not an interpretation of the words used, and, therefore, is not within the authority conferred on the Commissariat by the decree to which we were referred. Further, it appears to me that section 2 of the Civil Code prohibiting judicial or other institutions from dealing with litigation as to civil relations, which arose before November, 1917, a statute which is interpreted by the Commissariat of Justice as preventing State institutions from dealing with controversies which arose about such relations, would prevent the Commissariat of Justice from having jurisdiction to deal with the question of pre-war insurance policies and controversies arising thereunder.

I take the view: (1) That the decree of November, 1919, clearly annuls the contract sued on; (2) that the opinion of the Commissariat of Justice that it does not is not a possible "interpretation" of that decree, but a repeal, a dispensation from it, and is therefore not within the power conferred on the Commissariat by the decree creating it. These conclusions lead to the same result as that arrived at by Mr. Justice Greer, though I think for slightly different reasons. I am not satisfied that his reasons are wrong, but I prefer my own, and think, therefore, that the main appeal should be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Greer, however, thought it right, in case his decision should be held to be wrong, to deal with the question of the principle on which the amount payable should be assessed. The cross-appeal was argued before us, and raises, in my view, a difficult question. Two, however, of the four policies, in my opinion, we cannot deal with. In the third the sum claimed became due only after the issue of the writ, and the defendants objected to our dealing with it. In the fourth the sum would not be due till 1929, and it is quite impossible for this Court to speculate what will be the law on currency in Russia at that date.

The question is in what currency is a valid claim for so many roubles under a contract made before the war to be satisfied, when the currency has depreciated enormously, and changes said to be stabilization have been made in it, either by creating a coin with a new name, such as "Belga" in Belgium, or "Schelling" in Austria, having the same nominal value as the old Belgian franc, or Austrian krone, but alleged to be worth many of those old coins, or by creating a coin with the same name as the old coin, but said to represent a number of the old coins? We have some guidance from decisions of this Court in In re Chesterman's Trusts—Mott v. Browning ([1923] 2 Ch. 466), and Anderson v. Equitable Assurance Society of the United States (42 The Times L.R., 302), that where the pre-war contract was to pay marks, at the time when paper was interchangeable with gold, but above a certain amount only payable in gold, and war legislation abolished their gold value, and the war enormously depreciated their exchange value in paper, the debtor could still satisfy the debt when payable in England by paying an amount of sterling, representing the exchange value at the time, of the contract number of paper marks, though the result was of infinitely less value than the contract amount of pre-war marks. These decisions, however, do not cover the case of a change in currency.

The facts in Russia are as follow, and that they are difficult to interpret is shown by Mr. Krougliakoff's answer to the question: "In August of 1923, and thereafter, what was the rouble? (Answer) That is a very difficult question to answer." The two material policies are a policy of 5,000 roubles dated August 4, 1903, repayable August 1, 1923, with a yearly premium of 255 roubles, and a policy dated February 10, 1905, payable February 7, 1925, with a yearly premium of 256 roubles. At the dates of the policies there were gold coins of 15 roubles (Imperial), 10 roubles (popularly, though not by law, called chervontzy), 7½ and 5 roubles, smaller silver and copper values, and paper notes; paper was freely interchangeable with gold, and the ratio to sterling was fairly steady, 9.45 roubles to the £ sterling. At the outbreak of war the interchangeability with gold was abolished, and the paper rouble depreciated in sterling value. In 1916 it was about 15 roubles to the £; in 1917 as high as 40 roubles to the £. It was at this stage that the plaintiffs were anxious to pay their premium in paper roubles, as "they did not want to lose on the exchange." After the Revolution there were in circulation pre-war paper roubles, Kerensky roubles, and Bolshevist or Soviet roubles. There was no exchange with Europe, and the currency was very much depreciated. On November 3, 1921, came the first Soviet currency law establishing "State currency notes of the 1922 model," one of such roubles of 1922 being equivalent to 10,000 roubles of all the old issues. It is difficult to be sure what a Russian Court would have done with a claim for a pre-war obligation of 10,000 roubles, for all Courts were forbidden to entertain such a claim. But it seems pretty clear that if the New York State deposit in Russia had included 100,000 paper pre-war roubles that deposit would only have been worth 10 roubles of 1922, and when all the old issues were called in on October 31, 1922, the deposit could only be exchanged for 10 roubles of 1922. I do not think that at this stage any pre-war creditor for 100 roubles could have demanded 100 roubles of the 1922 pattern. He would have been referred to the law of November, 1921. The administrative decree of April 6, 1922 (which as applied (section 7) to payments by private undertakings and persons was only repeating the provision of the law of November, 1921, as to ratio), would also seem to point this way. The currency continued to depreciate, and on October 24, 1922, another law authorized notes of the 1923 model, one rouble of which was to be equal to 100 roubles of the 1922 model, or one million of roubles of the model which had been taken out of circulation. The New York Life Assurance Company's supposititious deposit would now be reduced to one-tenth of a 1923 rouble, and again I do not think that a pre-war creditor for 100 roubles could have demanded 100 roubles of 1923. At the same time, in October, 1922, the State Bank was authorized to issue notes based on chervontzy, the chervonetz being taken as equal to the same weight and fineness of gold as the pre-war ten-rouble piece. These were to be backed by one-fourth of their value in gold, but were not interchangeable with gold. All private gold had long ago been confiscated, its possession being illegal. The 1923 rouble continued in force side by side with the chervonetz bank-note, but at a rate of interchange fixed each month by the Government. It appears to me that the debtor owing roubles would have a right to pay in either currency, in chervonetz notes or in roubles of 1923, and would have a right to choose the most favourable to himself. As I have said, I do not think that the debtor who had promised before the war to pay roubles, could be required to pay roubles of 1923; but still less could he be required to pay chervontzy, which seem to me to be new legal coins, though bearing the old popular, not legal, name of a ten-rouble piece. I do not see how such a debtor could ask for more than an equivalent number of roubles of 1923; I do not think, as above explained, that he could even ask for them.

Lastly, from February 15, 1924, no new 1923 rouble notes were printed, and by a decree of March 25, 1924, they were to be withdrawn at the rate of one rouble in gold to 50,000 roubles in 1923 notes. The New York Life Assurance Company's deposit would now have got to a ridiculously small sum, 1/500,000ths of a 1923 rouble, or 1/500,000,000,000th of a new chervonetz. But the plaintiffs contend, and the Judge has found, that the New York Life Assurance Company must pay the amount of the claim in chervontzy, which now have the same value in gold as the pre-war rouble had in 1903 and 1905.

The amount to be paid in England under the English judgment must be obtained by turning the amount which would be payable by Russian law in roubles at the date of the same becoming due into English money, at the exchange of the date of payment. It appears to me, though it is not necessary to decide it, in view of the earlier part of my judgment, that at that date the chervonetz and the pre-war rouble were different currency of different values, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to turn pre-war roubles into chervontzy, which by Russian law were only exchangeable for a great many pre-war roubles, on the basis that a post-war chervonetz was equivalent to a pre-war rouble. In my opinion, it was a different coin. But as I have held that the contract of insurance was entirely annulled and unenforceable, this part of my judgment is not effective.

I appreciate that both the plaintiffs and the defendants have suffered great losses by the Russian legislation, but I do not see that either can recoup his losses at the expense of the other; they are common sufferers.

The effective judgment of Mr. Justice Greer must, in my opinion, be affirmed, though I differ from him in his alternative view as to currency.

Lord Justice Atkin.—I need not repeat the facts of this case. It is plain that unless the contract is somehow displaced the defendants came under a contractual obligation to pay to the plaintiffs certain sums in roubles at periods from 1923 onwards. The defendants claim that the contract has been annulled by Russian law. The onus of proof of this fact is upon them. They further say, that even if their liability upon the contract still exists their liability in terms of British currency is infinitesimal, as the roubles which they were under an obligation to pay are only worth one fifty-thousand millionth of the rouble upon which the present exchange is based. The onus of proving the value of the obligation in terms of sterling is, I think, upon the plaintiffs.

The first issue is one of Russian law, for the policies, it is admitted, were made subject to the provisions of the Russian law. The issue is, therefore, an issue of fact, the burden of proof being upon the defendants. A significant feature of this case is that the defendants, though subject to the onus of proof, called no evidence, and rested on the evidence called by the plaintiffs, a Russian advocate, Mr. Krougliakoff. We are informed that the defendants had expert witnesses available in Court; and the result is that we have to deal with the uncontradicted evidence of an expert whose skill and integrity are not sought to be impugned. Mr. Krougliakoff produced, amongst other decrees, a decree dated November 18, 1919, signed by the President of the Council of the Commissaries of the People, and the Superintendent of Affairs of such council, and countersigned by the Secretary, which ordered that life insurance of all kinds in the R.S.F.S.R. is abolished, and all contracts made with insurance companies for life insurance are annulled. Mr. Krougliakoff went on, however, to say that by Russian law this decree did not operate so as to destroy the rights of the insured under it to claim on insurance policies made with foreign insurance companies. He supported his statement by production of a decree, dated February 1, 1923, of the Pan-Russian Central Executive constituting the People's Commissariat of Justice, providing that the Commissariat of Justice was charged, amongst other duties, with the interpretation of existing laws on requests of the central and local authorities. He then produced an official publication of the Commissariat of Justice which showed that on October 16, 1924, the Commissariat, in answer to a request of the Agricultural Bank, had interpreted the law in the sense that he had stated. I shall not read the whole decree. The last words are "Russian holders of insurance policies have preserved the right to claim from foreign insurance companies the payment of insurance compensation." It is, I think, also noteworthy that the present policies, as no doubt all similar policies with foreign companies, contain a clause (28) providing for assignment and endorsement, and stipulating that the signatures under the endorsement must be attested by, amongst others, a notary. On September 26, 1924, that is, three weeks before the formal interpretation, the Commissariat of Justice had ordered all notarial offices not to refuse to certify transfer endorsements of policies of foreign insurance companies. It seems probable that the request of the Agricultural Bank which elicited the pronouncement of the law in October was occasioned by the direction to notaries given in September. The position, therefore, is that Mr. Krougliakoff says that by Russian law Russian holders have preserved the right to claim from foreign insurance companies on their policies; and that the Commissariat of Justice specially charged with the duty to interpret the law have so interpreted it; and that, according to Mr. Krougliakoff, such interpretation is authoritative; and that the defendants have called no evidence to contradict these statements of fact, though if contradiction were possible witnesses were available. As I have said, the uncontradicted evidence is that the departmental interpretation is authoritative; but the question whether it is authoritative or not seems, in the circumstances, not to be of much importance. The statement of the law by the Department of Justice must be of the highest value, and, uncontradicted, would appear to become for practical purposes authoritative.

Now this being the uncontradicted evidence of a Russian lawyer, and the Russian Department of Justice, as to what the law is in Russia to-day, the defendants, without calling any evidence, ask us to say that the lawyer and the department are mistaken; that the Russian law is something different and that the law in Russia really is that Russian subjects cannot claim against foreign insurance companies. They say that we are bound to come to this conclusion on the interpretation of the decree of November 18, 1919, on which we are to put our own construction. Such a result would appear to me to go far beyond the law and practice relating to the proof of foreign law. It is not sufficient to prove a foreign statute or code by a translation, and then leave the Court to place its own construction on it. The code must be interpreted by an expert in the foreign law. It is, of course, true that when he vouches a statute to support his evidence the statute forms part of his evidence, and must be considered in the consideration of his evidence as a whole. And it is also true that where experts on the foreign law differ amongst themselves the Court will often have to resolve the conflict by looking at the statutes or documents and deciding for themselves the more probable contention. And this course will be more readily undertaken where the dispute is as to the effect of legislation, as in the United States of America, expressed in English in respect of a jurisprudence which is known to the English Judges. And it may also happen occasionally that a foreign expert may arrive at results so extravagant and involving such a misunderstanding of conceptions familiar to lawyers of all countries that an English Court may have to reject his evidence, and eventually come to the conclusion that they can safely interpret the words for themselves, or fall back upon the presumption that the proper methods of construction coincide with the English. But in the first instance the English Courts must rely on the evidence of competent foreign lawyers. I need only cite two authorities of great weight. In Baron De Bode's case (8 Q.B., 208), a petition of right involving an issue as to the law in France in 1789, the question arose as to whether the witness who cited a French decree in the nature of a statute must produce the written document. Lord Denman, C.J., at p. 250, said: "The form of the question is, I think, immaterial; in effect, the witness is asked to speak to the decree. It is objected that this is a violation of the general principle, that the contents of a written instrument can be shown only by producing the instrument or accounting for the non-production. But there is another general rule: that the opinions of persons of science must be received as to the facts of their science. That rule applies to the evidence of legal men; and I think it is not confined to unwritten law, but extends also to the written laws which such men are bound to know. Properly speaking, the nature of such evidence is, not to set forth the contents of the written law, but its effect and the state of law resulting from it. The mere contents, indeed, might often mislead persons not familiar with the particular system of law; the witness is called upon to state what law does result from the instrument. I do not think that the case of treaties is applicable; there no class of persons are so peculiarly conversant with the subject-matter as to invest it with the character of a science. The cases which have been cited raise much less doubt in my mind than the opinion of one of my learned brothers, who differs from me. In Boehtlinck v. Schneider (3 Esp., 58) Lord Kenyon, according to the report, declined to receive proof of the unwritten law of Russia from 'a person conversant with the law of that country,' and asked, Can the laws of a foreign country be proved by a person picked up in the street? And he added: 'I shall expect it to be made out to me, not by such loose evidence, but by proof from the country, whose laws you propose to give in evidence, properly authenticated.' The question is: What is such evidence? And I think the decision can hardly be justified except upon the supposition that the person produced was not scientifically conversant with the law of Russia." Mr. Justice Coleridge, in the same case, at page 265, says this: "What, in truth, is it that we ask the witness? Not to tell us what the written law states, but, generally, what the law is. The question is not as to the language of the written law. For, when that language is before us, we have no means by which we are to construe it. Let me put this case. Suppose a gentleman who, like the Vice-Consul in Lacon v. Higgins (3 Stark. N.P.C., 178) (a case which I think admits the distinction I shall presently point out), was not professionally connected with the law should tell us: 'I went to the proper office, and made an examined copy of this section of the Code Napoléon, and here it is.' Would that be evidence for this Court what the law of France is? In point of authority, I apprehend it would not be so; certainly it would not be so in point of convenience; for, after all, if we were to attempt extra-judicially to expound that law, we should be liable to the most serious errors. The question for us is, not what the language of the written law is, but what the law is altogether, as shown by exposition, interpretation and adjudication. How many errors might result if a foreign Court attempted to collect the law from the language of some of our statutes which declare instruments in particular cases to be 'null and void to all intents and purposes,' while an English lawyer would state that they were good against the grantor, and that the Courts have so expounded the statutes." I call attention to the last passage as being specially appropriate to the present case.

In the Sussex Peerage case (11 Cl. and Fin., 85) the issue was as to the law at Rome at the date of a marriage, and the opinions of Lord Brougham and Lord Denman are valuable, especially as they follow an expression of opinion by Lord Campbell, who had not then held judicial office in England, that the most authoritative form of getting at foreign law is to have the book which lays down the law, an opinion which, after hearing Lord Brougham and Lord Denman, he appears to have withdrawn. Lord Campbell says, at page 114: "The most authoritative form of getting at foreign law is to have the book which lays down the law. Thus we have had the Code Napoléon in our Courts. It is better than to examine a witness, whose memory may be defective, and who may have a bias influencing his mind upon the law." Then Lord Brougham says: "My opinion entirely concurs with that of the Lord Chancellor"—that is, Lord Lyndhurst, not Lord Campbell—"The witness may refer to the sources of his knowledge; but it is perfectly clear that the proper mode of proving a foreign law is not by showing to the House the book of the law; for the House has not organs to know and to deal with the text of that law, and therefore requires the assistance of a lawyer who knows how to interpret it. If the Code Napoléon was before a French Court, that Court would know how to deal with and construe its provisions; but in England we have no such knowledge, and the English Judges must, therefore, have the assistance of foreign lawyers. This was fully considered in Dalrymple v. Dalrymple (2 Hagg. Consist., 54), in which the opinion of the Scotch lawyers was taken as a matter of fact, they being examined upon oath. In those opinions, they referred to Scotch statutes and Scotch law books. It was agreed on all hands, that that which was there in evidence were not the mere statements of foreign text-writers, but the opinions of skilful and scientific men who were examined on oath." Lord Denman says: "There does not appear to be, in fact, any real difference of opinion upon this point. There is no question raised here as to any exclusive mode of getting at this evidence, for we have both the materials of knowledge offered to us. We have the witness, and he states the law, which he says is correctly laid down in these books. The books are produced, but the witness describes them as authoritative, and explains them by his knowledge of the actual practice of the law. A skilful and scientific man must state what the law is, but may refer to books and statutes to assist him in doing so. That was decided, after full argument, on Friday last, in the Court of Queen's Bench"—that is the decision in the case which I have just cited. "There was a difference of opinion, but the majority of the Judges clearly held, on an examination of all the cases and after full discussion, that proof of the law itself, in a case of foreign law, could not be taken from the book of the law, but from the witness who described the law. If the witness says: 'I know the law, and this book truly states the law,' then you have the authority of the witness and of the book. You may have to open the question on the knowledge or means of knowledge of the witness, and other witnesses may give a different interpretation to the same matter, in which case you must decide as well as you can on the conflicting testimony; but you must take the evidence from the witnesses." Lord Campbell then says: "I entirely concur with the law as laid down by the noble and learned Lord who has just spoken." Concha v. Murrieta; De Mora v. Concha (40 Ch.D., 543) appears to me to decide nothing inconsistent with the above, but to lay down the incontrovertible proposition that if experts refer to passages in the Code the Court is to be at liberty to look at those passages, and consider their proper meaning. The decision was based on a passage in the judgment of the Privy Council in Bremer v. Freeman (10 Moore, P.C., 306), and was given in a case where there were conflicting statements as to the law of Peru given by two Peruvian lawyers. Lord Justice Cotton, at page 550, says this: "Now, as I have said, the proper evidence of the law of any foreign country is evidence by lawyers of that country, but if in their evidence they refer to passages in the Code of the country whose law we are endeavouring to ascertain, it would, as it appears to me, be most unreasonable to hold that we are not at liberty to look at those passages and consider what is their proper meaning. The case of Bremer v. Freeman (supra) lays down a rule as to dealing with evidence of foreign law which goes further than we are asked to go here. The Privy Council in that case was not sitting as a Court of foreign law, as in cases of appeals from a colony in which a foreign law prevails; the appeal was from the decision of the Prerogative Court on the question whether a will was admissible to probate. The Judges said that the evidence of the experts was not satisfactory, and they laid down a rule which is correctly stated in the marginal note: 'Foreign law is a matter of fact to be ascertained by the evidence of experts skilled in such law; but where the evidence of the experts is unsatisfactory and conflicting, the appellate Court, not having an opportunity of personally examining the witnesses to ascertain the weight due to each of their opinions, will examine for itself the decisions of the foreign Courts and the text-writers, in order to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion upon the question of foreign law.' The Privy Council there examined decisions of the foreign Courts, which to them were merely evidence of matters of fact; a fortiori may we refer to the provisions of the code to which both witnesses refer in support of their opinions. We have here only two witnesses, Zevallos and Perla. I should be sorry to say anything wanting in courtesy to Zevallos, but if the two come into conflict, I cannot but attach greater weight to the evidence of Perla, and that for several reasons," which his Lordship then proceeds to give.

Applying those principles, I might content myself with saying that the defendants have not discharged the onus of proving that by Russian law the defendants are discharged, in the circumstances, from performing their contract. But I think that the uncontradicted evidence of Mr. Krougliakoff and the pronouncement by the Commissariat of Justice make it clear that the Russian law is that the defendants are not discharged. I am quite unable to accept the view that the Commissariat of Justice, in answering the question put to them by the Agricultural Bank, were not acting in discharge of their duty by interpreting, but were rather violating their duty by dispensing. I can well imagine cases where the construction of statutes in this country by the Courts may have been considered to have confused interpretation with dispensation; but no one would presume that the Courts had in fact no intention of interpreting; and I see no reason for making that presumption in the case of the Commissariat of Justice. I think the presumption is, as the fact is, that the department was performing its statutory duty, and no more. When a competent Russian lawyer and the Russian equivalent of the Ministry of Justice say, without contradiction, what the law in Russia is, I, personally, do not feel qualified, or inclined, to dispute their statement. The construction put on the original decree may be right or wrong; it seems to me not to be so unreasonable as to be impossible, or even improbable. It clearly restricts the effect of the confiscation otherwise produced. I see no reason why these Courts should out-Herod Herod and chastise Russian policy-holders with scorpions when the Russians only chastise them with whips. That an injustice has been done to the foreign insurance companies may be very true. They have had their assets in Russia confiscated by decree or executive act before the decree in question. But it is plain that the policy-holder was not confined to recourse against the Russian assets, and I see nothing absurd or improbable in the statement that the Russians confiscated only the Russian assets of foreign insurance companies, and did not entirely confiscate the policy rights of the policy-holders. I think, therefore, that the defendants did not discharge themselves from their liability on the contracts.

The question of the currency appears to me to be more difficult, and I have had considerable doubt about it. Nevertheless, I have come to the conclusion that the Judge's decision on this point must be upheld. This question, like the former, is one of Russian law, and I think Mr. Krougliakoff's evidence, again uncontradicted, is that the Russian law maintained throughout the pre-war rouble based on gold and has now reverted to it. In these circumstances, I think that the learned Judge was justified in coming to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were entitled, if at all, to judgment for the amount of sterling based upon the exchange with the Russian gold rouble at the material date.

I think, therefore, that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs for the appropriate sum on the first two policies, but that no declaration should be made on the remaining policies.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P., and Bateson, J.) 1927. Apr. 27.

Husband and Wife—Wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance—Limit of time for proceeding not applicable—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict., c. 43), s. 11—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 39), ss. 4, 8—Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 51), s. 1 (1).

A complaint by a wife against her husband for wilful neglect to maintain her or her infant child need not, under s. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, be brought within six months from the time when by such neglect he caused her to live separately and apart from him, inasmuch as by s. 1 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, the complaint may now be made notwithstanding that the neglect has not caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him. The decision in Ellis v. Ellis (12 The Times L.R., 514; [1896] P. 251) has therefore now no application.

This was an appeal from an order made by the Birmingham justices on January 26, 1927, adjudging a husband to have been guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife and an infant child, and ordering him to pay £1 a week for their maintenance. In the notice of appeal it was alleged (inter alia) that the justices were wrong in law and in fact in holding that the husband was guilty of wilful neglect.

Mr. Talbot-Ponsonby, for the appellant, said that the husband in his affidavit swore that his wife left him in May, 1920, for no valid reason. In January, 1927, he was summoned for wilful neglect. Counsel referred to Ellis v Ellis (12 The Times L.R., 514; [1896] P. 251), in which Sir Francis Jeune and Sir Gorell Barnes held that persistent cruelty by a husband to a wife, and wilful neglect by him to provide reasonable maintenance for her, in consequence of which he caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him, within the meaning of section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, were not continuing offences. Therefore the time limit imposed by the reference in section 8 to section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, applied, and a complaint must be within six calendar months of the offence.

Mr. Clifford Mortimer, for the respondent, submitted that the decision in Ellis v. Ellis (supra) was no longer applicable since section 1 (1) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, became law. That subsection read:—

"An application by a married woman for an order . . . under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 . . . on the ground of cruelty or neglect by her husband may be made notwithstanding that the cruelty or neglect complained of has not caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him, and accordingly the words 'and shall by such cruelty or neglect have caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him' in section 4 of that Act are hereby repealed."

Counsel referred to the judgment of the learned President in Diggins v. Diggins (43 The Times L.R., 37; [1927] P. 88), discussing the amendment made in the law by the Act of 1925.

Lord Merrivale, after reviewing the facts, held that there was evidence upon which the justices were entitled to make the order which they had made. The gist of the matter in Ellis v. Ellis (12 The Times L.R., 514; [1896] P. 251) was that the point of time was fixed as the law then stood in pursuance of the Act of 1895. No such point of time was fixed by the Act of 1925. The matter was at large when there was desertion, and it must equally be at large when there was failure to maintain. The decision in Ellis v. Ellis (supra) therefore had no application to proceedings under the Act of 1895 as amended by the Act of 1925. The appeal would be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Justice Bateson agreed.

SALVESEN OR VON LORANG v. ADMINISTRATOR OF AUSTRIAN PROPERTY.*

Divorce — Marriage — Invalidity — Nullity — Want of formalities—French marriage—Subsequent domicile of both parties in Germany—Decree of nullity by Court of domicile—Whether conclusive.

Where a man and woman have married in a foreign country and have afterwards become domiciled in another foreign country, and the Court of their domicile has pronounced their marriage to be invalid on the ground of nullity for want of formalities, a Court of this country where they are not domiciled cannot, in the absence of proof of substantial injustice, review the decision of the Court of the domicile.

This was an appeal from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland recalling an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, Lord Morison, in an action of multiplepoinding.

On June 15, 1897, the appellant, formerly Miss Kate Salvesen, a British subject, domiciled in Scotland, went through a form of marriage in Paris to Herr Franz Ferdinand Sigismond von Lorang, an Austrian subject. In the year 1898 the parties settled in Wiesbaden, in Germany, where they lived together as man and wife until 1914. From 1914 until 1918 Herr von Lorang served with the Austrian Army and the appellant lived in Switzerland. In 1919 they returned Wiesbaden and lived there as man and wife until the end of the year 1923. In that year the Administrator of Austrian Property claimed the movable property of the appellant in Scotland on the ground that she became an Austrian national by her marriage, and that in consequence her property in that country fell to be paid to him under the Treaty of Peace (Austria) Order, 1920, and the Treaty of Peace (Austria) (No. 2) Amendment Order, 1921.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The holders of the movable property brought an action of multiplepoinding on December 21, 1923, to have it determined who was entitled to the property and to obtain their own discharge. The Administrator repeated his claim. The appellant also claimed the property. She averred that she met Herr von Lorang at Wiesbaden in 1896 and they became engaged to be married. Had they been married by a religious ceremony in Austria they would have been required to undertake to bring up in the Roman Catholic faith any children of the marriage. This both parties desired to avoid. Herr von Lorang also objected to a civil marriage in Austria. Accordingly it was agreed that the marriage should take place in Paris.

The appellant further averred that she had only recently discovered that her marriage in Paris was null and void, because the parties had not observed the formalities of residence and publication which the French law required, and because the Registrar in Paris had been induced to perform the marriage ceremony upon the faith of a certificate under the hands of Herr von Lorang and the then jurisconsult of the Austrian Embassy, which falsely stated that Herr von Lorang was domiciled in France and was not obliged to publish the marriage in Austria. On the present action being brought the appellant intimated that it was her intention to bring a suit in the Civil Court of Wiesbaden, the Court of the domicile and residence of both Herr von Lorang and herself, to have the marriage declared null and void. The action of multiplepoinding in Scotland was continued to allow her to take proceedings in Wiesbaden. The suit was brought in Wiesbaden, and the Administrator made no attempt to intervene in the proceedings.

By decree published on March 28, 1924, which became final on May 4, 1924, the Court at Wiesbaden declared the marriage null and void.

Herr von Lorang was legally represented in the suit and moved for the dismissal of the petition. The jurisdiction of the German Court to pronounce a decree of nullity of marriage in the present case was admitted. The final decree of the German Court was produced by the appellant in the action of multiplepoinding in Scotland, and the Court was asked to give effect to it. Thereupon the Administrator made averments against the validity of the decree of the German Court to the following effect :—

The alleged grounds of nullity pleaded by the appellant were not by French law effective to invalidate the marriage, but merely conferred upon the French Courts a power to annul it on a full consideration of all the circumstances, including the interests of morality and of any children that might have been born of the union between the parties. In the present case one child, who was still alive, was born of the union, and the parties intended to remarry hereafter. The French Courts would, if the question came before them, hold the marriage to be valid. The alleged defects in the celebration of the marriage, which formed the basis of the German decree of nullity, had by the law of France been purged by the prolonged cohabitation of the parties as man and wife publicly and to the knowledge of their friends and neighbours. The Administrator alleged that the proceedings in the nullity suit at Wiesbaden were instituted under a collusive arrangement between the parties for the express purpose of defeating the Administrator's claim in this action, and were uncontested, and resulted in the German Court being misled as to the French law applicable to the case, and pronouncing a decree which was null and void.

The Administrator maintained that he was entitled to have an opportunity of proving those averments with the view of establishing his contention that the Paris marriage was valid, and that Mrs. von Lorang was accordingly an Austrian national on July 16, 1920.

The substantial question for determination was whether the decree of the German Court, pronounced in a suit between the appellant and her alleged husband and declaring her Paris marriage null and void according to French law, should be held binding on Scottish Courts for the purpose of excluding the respondent's averments from inquiry.

Lord Morison repelled the respondent's claim for a proof and preferred the appellant to the property in question.

The First Division, by a majority (the Lord President, Lord Blackburn, and Lord Ashmore, Lord Sands dissenting), recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and remitted the case to him to allow the parties a proof of their respective averments.

Mr. Macmillan, K.C., Mr. Normand, K.C., and Mr. W. D. Patrick (all of the Scottish Bar) appeared for the appellant ; the Lord Advocate (the Hon. William Watson, K.C.), the Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. MacRobert, K.C.), and Mr. Albert Russell (of the Scottish Bar) for the respondent.

The following considered judgments were delivered.

Viscount Haldane.—My Lords : This is an appeal from the First Division of the Court of Session. The interlocutor questioned recalled an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, Lord Morison, in an action of multiplepoinding. The subject-matter was a fund consisting of moneys and shares in movable property held by the real raisers as bankers or agents. This fund was claimed by the appellant on the one hand and by the respondent on the other. The latter alleged that the fund was payable to him as being subject to a charge created by the Treaty of Peace (Austria) Order, 1920, on the footing that the appellant was then, in virtue of her marriage with Herr von Lorang, an Austrian national. The appellant replied that she had ascertained that her marriage was null and void, and that, therefore, she was never an Austrian national, and she obtained a sist or continuation of the proceedings in the multiplepoinding which would give her time to bring a suit in Germany, the country of the domicile of Herr von Lorang and herself, to have the validity of the marriage ascertained.

In 1924 the Court at Wiesbaden gave judgment declaring the marriage to have been null and void. This decree was then produced by the appellant in the multiplepoinding proceedings in the Scottish action. The Lord Ordinary gave effect to it, and dismissed the claim of the respondent. The First Division on appeal, by a majority, Lord Sands dissenting, recalled his interlocutor, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow a proof before answer. The question before your Lordships is whether the judgment of the German Court was conclusive, or whether the invalidity of the marriage was still open to question by the Courts here at the instance of the Administrator who had not been a party in the German proceedings.

The history of the case may be stated briefly. The marriage with Herr von Lorang, who was then an Austrian subject, to the appellant, who was a British subject domiciled in Scotland, took place in June, 1897. In 1898 the pair settled in Germany, at Wiesbaden, and lived there as man and wife with a brief interruption of residence, due to the war, until the end of 1923. Undoubtedly Wiesbaden had become the place of their domicile. The respondent claimed the fund, and the action of multiplepoinding was instituted in December, 1923. The appellant resisted the claim of the respondent and took proceedings in the German Court of their domicile, traversing the validity of her marriage. She averred that she met Herr von Lorang at Wiesbaden in 1896 and became engaged to him. Had they been married by a religious ceremony in Austria, the country of his nationality, they would have had to undertake to bring up any children in the Roman Catholic faith. This they both desired to avoid. On the other hand, merely civil marriage in Austria would not have been agreeable to Herr von Lorang's friends there. Consequently they decided that their marriage should take place in Paris. The appellant pleads, in the present action, that she had only recently discovered that her marriage in Paris was null and void, for the reason that the parties had not observed the formalities of residence and publication which the French law required, and because the registrar in Paris had been induced to perform the marriage ceremony upon the faith of a certificate to which she was no party, under the hands of Herr von Lorang and the jurisconsult of the Austrian Embassy, which stated, what was untrue, that Herr von Lorang was domiciled in France and was not obliged to publish the marriage in Austria. It made no difference according to her that the marriage was also celebrated at the English Church in Paris, according to the rites of the Church of England. The proceeding in the Court at Wiesbaden was commenced by petition of the appellant against Herr von Lorang. The latter appeared and was represented by an advocate, but he took no active part in the proceedings. In the result the Court, acting on the principle locus regit actum, declared the marriage null and void. The evidence of Professor Brunet, a qualified French jurist, was taken. The Court satisfied itself that the marriage had been constituted, neither in accordance with the conditions required by French law, nor in accordance with those required by the law of domicile. No later French law which would apply nor any circumstances had cured the invalidity thus brought about. The respondent Administrator was not a party to these Wiesbaden proceedings.

The final decree of the German Court of the domicile was produced in the Scottish action, in which the Court was asked to give effect to it. The present respondent, as I have just stated, did not appear in the German proceedings. But in the Court of Session he claimed that he was entitled to have their validity, as against himself at least, investigated, notwithstanding that the parties to them, Herr von Lorang and his wife, were domiciled in Germany and not in Scotland.

My Lords, I do not think that there are any materials before us on which exception can be taken to the judgment in Germany as having been obtained by what amounts in law to collusion. I will assume that both the husband and his wife had as their main motive to obtain that judgment in order, if possible, to avoid the application of the Austrian Administrator's title to claim. But I think that on the grounds assigned by the Lord Ordinary and Lord Sands, if they had the legal right to do this, the motive for which they exercised it could make no difference in a case in which fraud practised on the German Tribunal is not now alleged, and no collusion in any attempt to deceive that tribunal is established. The real question is simply whether the Court of the domicile was competent to dispose conclusively and finally of the question before it. If so it does not matter in law whether it had an exclusive jurisdiction. Had the question been one of divorce for adultery there could to-day have been no controversy as to the binding effect of the German decree. The status of married persons as dependent on divorce is a matter for which the Court of their domicile is the appropriate Court, and its decision is treated by our Courts as being not only valid but conclusive. The case before us is, however, not one of dissolving an existing marriage but of deciding that no valid marriage ever took place. The marriage was declared by the Court of the domicile to have been void by reason of non-compliance with the formalities required by the law of France, when it was celebrated. If this was a judgment determining the status of the supposed husband and wife it may well be that it should be regarded as having been binding on third parties as having been a judgment in rem. For what does status mean in this connexion? Something more than a mere contractual relation between the parties to the contract of marriage. Status may result from such a contractual relationship, but only when the contract has passed into something which private international law recognizes as having been superadded to it by the authority of the State, something which the jurisprudence of that State under its law imposes when within its boundaries the ceremony has taken place. This juridical result is more than any mere outcome of the agreement inter se to marry. It is due to a result which concerns the public generally and which the State where the ceremony took place superadds; something which may or may not be capable of being got rid of subsequently by proceedings before a competent public authority, but which meantime carries with it rights and obligations as regards the general community until so got rid of. There is nothing unusual in this doctrine.

I cannot see how, for instance, a husband could plead as a good answer to a claim for necessaries supplied to his wife that the marriage which had been publicly celebrated was one which he was entitled, if he took proceedings, to have declared void either for impotency or for want of compliance with formalities which the public authority which had celebrated the marriage had assumed to have been complied with. For the marriage gives the husband and wife a new legal position from which flow both rights and obligations with regard to the rest of the public. The status so acquired may vary according to the laws of different communities. The disability of monastic celibacy, for example, or that of a minor, or that of consanguinity, may be binding by the law of one country so as to invalidate the married status, while not binding by that of another. When, therefore, it is necessary to determine what married status implies and how far rights or acts are affected by it, it is necessary to determine the law by which they are fixed. It may be going too far to assert that these are all recognized in this country as referable only to the law of the domicile. But at least it is now established, since the decisions in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (11 The Times L.R., 481; [1895] A.C., 517), Lord Advocate v. Jaffrey (36 The Times L.R., 820; [1921] 1 A.C., 146), and Attorney-General for Alberta v. Cook (42 The Times L.R., 317; [1926] A.C., 444), that for a decree of dissolution of a marriage the Court of the domicile is the true Court of jurisdiction. That jurisdiction ought on principle to be regarded as exclusive. But for the purposes of the present case it is not necessary to refer to the point, for if the German Court was competent to pronounce the judgment it did in the case before us the judgment, being that of the Court of the domicile, was conclusive in our Courts here, so far as competency is concerned, unless there is something in the decree of dissolution for nullity which distinguishes such a proceeding from one for divorce for adultery. In Niboyet v. Niboyet (4 P.D., 1), in which the judgment of the majority of the Court is no longer law, Lord Justice Brett, in the dissenting judgment which he delivered, observed that the Court of the domicile was the only Court that was entitled to alter the status of married people, but he went on to indicate that the principle, while it applies so as to include suits for judicial separation and for restitution of conjugal rights, did not apply to suits for a declaration of nullity. He gives no reasons for saying this. Whether there cannot be jurisdiction which is not that of the domicile in restricted instances to entertain a suit for nullity is a question we have not before us for determination. For, as I have pointed out, the only relevant issue is whether the German Court was competent as against all other Courts conclusively to declare the marriage in the present case void. I am unable as matter of principle to see how its competence as the Court of the domicile can be successfully challenged, and if it was competent the decree brought the claim, even of the respondent who was not a party before it, to an end. For the decree did undoubtedly alter the status of the husband and wife. They ceased retrospectively to have been married people in the community of their country. For the purpose of the question raised that status must be taken to have been a res and the judgment was therefore one in rem.

My Lords, if the status in question was a res within the meaning of the principle, the duty of our Courts is clear. In Castrique v. Imrie (L.R., 4 H.L., 414) this House, adopting the language of Mr. Justice Blackburn, who was one of the Judges who advised it, laid down that the inquiry is, first, whether the subject-matter was so situated as to be within the lawful control of the State under the authority of which the Court sits; and, secondly, whether the sovereign authority of that State has conferred on the Court jurisdiction to decide on the disposition of the thing, and the Court has acted within its jurisdiction.

In the careful judgment which he delivered in the First Division the Lord President held that the principle so laid down applies to a decree of divorce, making it conclusive of the dissolution of the marriage, at all events if the ground of the divorce was one or other of those recognized by the law of Scotland, namely, adultery or desertion. But he limits the application of the principle. It applies, in his view, to a decree of judicial separation, for this alters the married status; it applies also to a decree of declaration of marriage. He thinks, too, that a decree of nullity founded on the impediment of impotency also falls within the principle. This is, indeed, in his view, not a bar to the constitution of marriage, but only a resolutive condition of the contract, invalidating by non-performance a marriage that was complete, and assimilating the case to divorce. But the Lord President goes on to say that, as in other instances nullity proceedings on certain grounds may be instituted by third parties having interest, the principle under discussion cannot be one of universal application. He therefore thinks that a sentence of nullity on the ground of insanity, propinquity, prior marriage, or non-compliance with the lex loci, is not a judgment disposing of married status and so a judgment in rem, notwithstanding that the sentence, if obtained in an action in which the pretended spouses are the parties, may be res judicata as between themselves. It seems, he says, plain that the competency of such actions by third parties having interest, such as the respondent here, cannot spring from the intention of the persons who were parties to the pretended marriage; nor does the force of the decree pronounced in them necessarily depend on its being given by the Court of the pretended husband's domicile. Even accepting this, I do not think that the proposition is at all conclusive on the particular question before us.

My Lords, I do not find even the judgment of the Lord President convincing, and am compelled to prefer the other view worked out by Lord Sands. There does not appear to be any reason why a judgment of nullity, even on such restricted grounds as the Lord President mentions, should not be regarded as disposing of the status of married persons. It does not do so the less because third parties may have it open to them to litigate elsewhere questions of validity in certain restricted instances before such questions have been disposed of in the Court of the domicile. Such status is not dependent only on the contract of the parties to the marriage. Before Lord Lyndhurst's Act, for example, a man and woman in England standing in an affinity within the prohibited degrees could marry, and the marriage, though voidable, could only be got rid of by the sentence of an Ecclesiastical Court pronounced within the lifetime of the parties. But the status though voidable was not the less a status, a res with which the Court could deal. That shows that, though voidable and not void, it was that as to which the sentence of the appropriate Court was essential for its dissolution.

My Lords, for these reasons I am unable to agree with the view of the Lord President that the foreign judgment in the case before us did not as soon as given establish conclusively against the respondent and every one else that the appellant, at the relevant date in the multiplepoinding proceedings, was not an Austrian national quâ wife of an Austrian subject. If so, the claim of the Administrator in the multiplepoinding became inept on March 28, 1924, the date of the decree of the Wiesbaden Court, which was made final on May 4 in that year. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary repelling the claim for the Administrator was not pronounced until April 21, 1925, and ought accordingly to receive effect.

There were cited numerous authorities for the contention of the respondent in the Court of Session. These I have examined, but they do not appear to me to modify the conclusion at which I have arrived as to the principle which must be applied. In considering them it should be borne in mind that some of the dicta in the older cases have been affected by the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857, which for the first time enabled divorce a vinculo to be granted by a Court of general law in England. Before that year it was the prevalent view that a marriage duly celebrated in England could not be got rid of (except by Act of Parliament) validly so far as England was concerned, even by a foreign decree, at least when the domicile at the time of the marriage was English. In the report of Warrender v. Warrender (2 Cl. and Fin., 488), Lolley's case (2 Cl. and Fin., 567), which had been decided by eminent English Judges, is explained, and it is yet more precisely explained by Lord Westbury in Shaw v. Gould (L.R., 3; H.L., 55, at p. 85), and by Lord Selborne in Harvey v. Farnie (8 App. Cas., 43, at p. 54). Lolley's case (supra) appears in reality to have turned on domicile as much as on the indissoluble character of an "English marriage." After 1857 the indissoluble character of an English marriage disappeared, and the effect of this disappearance is noticeable in the later decisions. In the judgment in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (supra) the modern doctrine of domicile as the true test prevails unrestrainedly.

Turning to some of the authorities cited, a beginning may be made with a case in which the only question was as to the jurisdiction of the Consistorial Court in England to inquire into the validity of a sentence of a foreign Court declaring a marriage to have been illegal by reason of non-compliance with the lex loci contractus of the foreign country where it was celebrated. There is very little in the judgment there which even touches the point before us. Scrimshire v. Scrimshire (2 Hagg. Consist., 395) was a suit in which the validity of a foreign marriage was denied on the ground that it had not been celebrated according to the law of the country in which it was celebrated. This was held to have been proved by a sentence to that effect of nullity in France, and by the evidence. As the marriage appeared to have been illegal by the lex loci contractus, the decree here was against the validity. But inquiry in the Consistorial Court in England was admitted. Scrimshire v. Scrimshire (supra) is a relevant authority, but the result was not based on principles relating to domicile, which in 1752 were obscure but to-day are well established.

In Sinclair v. Sinclair (1 Hagg. Consist., 294) before Lord Stowell, at that time Sir William Scott, the respondent pleaded, as an answer to a suit by his wife for separation on the ground of cruelty and adultery, that the marriage had been celebrated at Paris, and had been dissolved by a sentence of the Court at Brussels on the ground of nullity. The parties were not domiciled at Brussels. The marriage appears to have been really celebrated in England. As the parties were within the English jurisdiction Sir William Scott considered that the Consistorial Court could examine the validity of the marriage. He thought that it was to go too far to hold that a sentence of nullity (the reasons for the nullity do not appear) would not carry great weight if sentence were pronounced in the country where the marriage was solemnized. But he was not prepared to say that a judgment of a third country on the validity of a marriage not within its own territories nor had between subjects of that country would be universally binding. He decided that there was no foreign sentence which would prevent the Consistorial Court from entertaining the suit.

In Kennedy v. Earl of Cassillis (2 Swanston, 313) a note is quoted (at p. 326) extracted from the MSS. of Lord Chancellor Nottingham. He says, referring to the case of Cottington (2 Swanston, 326), that where a woman, although she was said to have already a husband living in Turin, claimed to be a lawful wife here, on the ground that she had been divorced from that husband by the Archbishop of Turin, he, Lord Nottingham, had held that it was against the law of nations not to give credit to the judgment and sentences of foreign countries. For what right had one kingdom to reverse the judgment of another? What confusion would follow in Christendom if they should serve us so abroad, and give no credit to our sentences!

This is an authority, so far as it goes, which supports the contention of the appellant here. Simonin v. Mallac (2 Sw. and Tr., 67) was a petition for nullity. The petitioner (the wife) was married to her husband in England. Both were of French domicile, and they had come here only to be married. She obtained a decree of nullity in France on the ground of want of parental consent and of publication. She then came to reside in England and petitioned for a declaration of nullity here. Sir Cresswell Cresswell held that as her marriage had been solemnized in England, the parties had contracted with reference to the law of this country as to validity. He decided that he had jurisdiction. This decision was given in 1860, but the marriage took place before the Divorce Act of 1857.

In considering the application of other authorities cited to us it is essential to bear in mind the limited scope of the only question before us. It is simply whether, when the Court of the domicile of both the parties has pronounced their marriage to be invalid on the ground of nullity for want of formalities, a Court here where they are not domiciled can review that decision. The reasons given by Sir Nathaniel Lindley, M.R., in Pemberton v. Hughes (15 The Times L.R., 211; [1899] 1 Ch., 781) are, in my opinion, conclusive against any attempt to reopen any such case on the footing of supposed irregularity of procedure. Our Courts, as he says, never inquire whether a competent foreign Court has exercised its jurisdiction improperly, provided that no substantial injustice according to our notions has been committed. In the present case the question was not divorce by way of dissolution for any offence, but because of nullity for want of essentials required for the contract. It is said that this makes a difference, inasmuch as the marriage, if a nullity, could not change the domicile of the supposed wife. That is possibly true, on the grounds assigned by the then President of the Divorce Court, Sir Gorell Barnes, in his elaborate judgment in Ogden v. Ogden (24 The Times L.R., 94; [1908] P. 46, at p. 78). But it does not affect the litigation before us, in which the decree of nullity in the Court of the husband's domicile was pronounced with retrospective effect before the claim of the Administrator of Austrian Property could be established. None of the cases cited to us seem to me to affect this simple point.

My Lords, for the reason that the judgment of the Wiesbaden Court was both competent and binding upon us, I think that we ought to recall the interlocutor of the First Division and to restore that of the Lord Ordinary. The appellant should have her costs in the Inner House and here. I move accordingly.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords: Although I had made up my mind as to what, according to my opinion, the judgment of the House ought to be in this case, yet before I had penned a single sentence of the opinion which I should deliver, I had the advantage of reading the opinions of the noble Viscount on the Woolsack and of Lord Phillimore. Agreeing as I do with these opinions and also with every word of what I may without offence term the exceedingly able judgment of Lord Sands, if this were an ordinary case I should simply announce my concurrence. But the case is so important to the law that I need not apologize for adding some remarks of my own; only, as it would be useless to retrace the ground so thoroughly explored in the opinions mentioned, these remarks will be necessarily discursive, but I hope may serve some purpose.

First I would like to say that I thoroughly endorse the view of Lord Phillimore that the outlook of the English Courts was necessarily different before and after 1857. I would like to add that I think there is another date of great moment, viz., the date of the decision of Warrender v. Warrender in this House (2 Cl. & F., 488), viz., 1835. I may add that besides the citation given by the noble Viscount the case is also very fully reported in 2 Shaw and MacLean, p. 154. Now I venture to say this : that before that judgment, without my considering whether it really was the law or not, any English lawyer would have said that the law of England is that an English marriage is indissoluble by any Court ; it is something that cannot be broken, indissoluble in essence, and looking to Lolley's case (Russell and Ryan, 237) who could say that he was wrong ? I think satisfactory proof of this may be found in the argument of Attorney-General Campbell, afterwards Lord Chancellor, in the Warrender case (supra), wherein he says (2 S. & MacL., at p. 170) : " It may be considered as absolutely certain that the Bar of England could not have furnished a single counsel who would have set his name to the opinion, that judicial indissolubility was not a legal quality of every English marriage." But when Warrender's case (supra) was decided, that, as an abstract proposition, could no longer hold, though I doubt whether the majority of English lawyers appreciated it. They did not in those days pay much attention to Scotch cases. Besides, as a decision it did not necessarily say that Lolley's case (supra) was wrong, because Lolley was an Englishman and went to Scotland only for the purpose of obtaining a divorce, while Warrender was a Scotchman. In other words, if the law of Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (supra) had then been fully known, Lolley's divorce in Scotland was no divorce at all. No one can read Lord Brougham's judgment without coming to the conclusion that he thought that Lolley's case (supra) was wrong in what it laid down, and when Lord Lyndhurst twitted him with having gone out of his way to approve Lolley's case (supra) in M'Carthy v. De Caix (2 Cl. & F., 568) when he was Chancellor, Lord Brougham retorted that he was then only sitting in Chancery, and was bound by Lolley's case (supra), but now he was in the House of Lords and was not. My Lords, I do not think it necessary to consider whether I should follow the iconoclastic tendencies of my fellow-countryman. All I want to point out is that in my view all early English decisions, certainly up to 1835, and I think up to 1857, must be read in the light of the general opinion of the indissolubility of an English marriage.

The other point on which I want to say a few words is the question what is a judgment in rem. All are agreed that a judgment of divorce is a judgment in rem, but the whole argument of the majority of the Judges in the Court of Session turns on the distinction between divorce and nullity. The first remark to be made is that neither marriage nor the status of marriage is, in the strict sense of the word, a " res," as that word is used when we speak of a judgment in rem. A res is a tangible thing within the jurisdiction of the Court, such as a ship or other chattel. A metaphysical idea, which is what the status of marriage is, is not strictly a res, but it, to borrow a phrase, savours of a res, and has all along been treated as such. Now the learned Judges make this distinction. They say that in an action of divorce you have to do with a res, to wit, the status of marriage, but that in an action of nullity there is no status of marriage to be dealt with, and therefore no res. Now it seems to me that celibacy is just as much a status as marriage. I notice that in the Oxford Dictionary the word " status " is defined, inter alia, as " The legal standing of a person ; condition in respect of, e.g., liberty or servitude, marriage or celibacy, infancy or majority." The judgment in a nullity case decrees either a status of marriage or a status of celibacy.

The learned Judges rest strongly on what was said on the subject in Ogden v. Ogden (24 The Times L.R., 94 ; [1908] P. 46), but, first, I am not bound by Ogden v. Ogden (supra), and so far as the dicta contradict what I have just said, I do not agree with them. And, further, a close perusal of the judgment in Ogden v. Ogden (supra) will show that it is very much wrapped up with the question of jurisdiction, and, if the first marriage was null, there was no jurisdiction in the French Court against the so-called wife defending. But here the jurisdiction is undoubted. On this point I would cite the words of Sir James Hannen in the case of Turner (or Thompson) v. Thompson (4 The Times L.R., 243 ; 13 P.D., 37, at p. 41) : " A woman when she marries a man, not only by construction of law, but absolutely as a matter of fact, does acquire the domicil of her husband if she lives with him in the country of his domicil. There is no ground here for contending that she did not take up that domicil. She had the intention of taking up her permanent abode with him and of making his country her permanent home." These words exactly fit this case. I am therefore of opinion that a decree of nullity savours of a res just as much as a decree of divorce. I accept the conditions laid down by Lord Lindley when he was Master of the Rolls in Pemberton v. Hughes (15 The Times L.R., 211 ; [1899] 1 Ch., 781, at p. 790). In order that a foreign decree may be immune from disturbance by an English Court—and in my opinion " Scottish " may with perfect justice be substituted for " English "—it must be pronounced between persons subject to the foreign jurisdiction, and deal with a matter with which the Court is competent to deal, and it must not offend against English ideas of substantial justice.

Although, as I said before, these remarks are discursive, and I do not wish to retrace traversed ground, yet I would put in the form of short propositions the points that I hold proved, the proof of several of them being worked out, not by me, but by the opinions of my noble and learned friends.

1. The German Court had jurisdiction over the parties, they being domiciled in Germany equally whether there was marriage or no marriage.

2. This was a genuine action, and there was no collusion or fraud used to deceive the German Court.

3. The validity of the marriage depended on French law, that being the law of the locus celebrationis.

4. The German Court took proper steps to inform itself of the French law, and gave judgment according to the law proved before it.

5. That judgment is a judgment which is equivalent to a judgment in rem, and is therefore binding on the Scotch Court without further inquiry.

It follows that I agree with the motion made from the Woolsack.

Lord Phillimore.—My Lords : I have read and I concur in the opinions of Viscount Haldane and Viscount Dunedin.

With regard to the respect to be paid to the judgment of a Court having jurisdiction over the place where the parties are domiciled, it is suggested that the English decisions, though not strictly authoritative, may, in the comparative dearth of Scots authorities, be looked upon as declaring common British law, or that at any rate they may be regarded as authorities on international law ; and the Administrator of Austrian Property contends that they show that the Court before which a matrimonial suit is tried will not regard a previous decision of the Court of the domicil as conclusive. Counsel for the lady appears to concede that this may be the result of the English decisions, but they say that this is a special English view applying only to English marriages. Whether this means putative marriages solemnized in England, or such marriages solemnized elsewhere between two English persons, or applies to both cases, did not clearly appear in the argument. I think that this matter requires a further analysis.

There are two classes of decisions affecting the matrimonial status: those which decide that a putative marriage is or is not valid, judgments of declarator or nullity, and those which put an end to an unquestioned marriage, judgments of dissolution of marriage or, in popular language, divorce. With regard to these latter, English Courts before 1857 would, from their nature, be inclined to refuse to recognize a decree of dissolution of marriage because in their view of the law marriage (matrimonium verum et ratum) was indissoluble. They were Church Courts and the law of the Church so taught them. Neither they nor foreign Courts, in their view, could break the indissoluble chain. It was only in obedience to the so-to-speak brute force of a private Act of Parliament that they submitted to recognize a dissolution. And this law of the Church was the marriage law of England. Hence the decision in Lolley's case (Russell and Ryan, 237). It was perhaps conceivable, if people got into a strange country where non-Christian views or different views of Christianity prevailed, and became domiciled there, that the sentence of dissolution by the appropriate Court of the country might be accepted.

Lords Brougham and Lyndhurst in Warrender v. Warrender (2 Cl. and F., 488) thought that this would not be so and that Lolley's case (supra), which was that of a domiciled Englishman making a temporary stay in Scotland in order to give the Scots Courts jurisdiction, would have been decided in the same manner even if Lolley had become domiciled in Scotland. It is, however, the fact, as Lord Cranworth points out in Dolphin v. Robins (7 H.L.C., 390), that Lolley certainly had not a Scotch domicil.

However this may have been before 1857, circumstances entirely changed, when instead of a number of Church Courts there was established one statutory civil Court empowered and instructed to grant decrees of dissolution of marriage in certain cases.

Since 1857 there was no reason why the English High Court of Justice in its Matrimonial Division should refuse to recognize a decree of dissolution of marriage made by the Court of the matrimonial domicil, at least on any ground which would be deemed sufficient by the present English law and possibly upon any ground deemed sufficient by the law of the domicil. (See Phillimore's "Commentaries upon International Law," Vol. 4, section 507.)

Indeed, this matter is now set at rest. Since the opinions expressed in the cases of Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (11 The Times L.R., 481; [1895] A.C., 517) and Lord Advocate v. Jaffery (36 The Times L.R., 820; [1921], A.C., 146), and the decision of the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Alberta v. Cook (42 The Times L.R., 317; [1926] A.C., 444), it is established that the law of England recognizes the competence and the exclusive competence of the Court of the domicil to decree dissolution of a marriage. The last case, though in form a decision upon the law of the Province of Alberta in Canada, is authoritative as a decision upon the law of England, because it had been previously determined in the case of Board v. Board (35 The Times L.R., 635; [1919] A.C., 956) that the matrimonial law of Alberta is that of England.

It may now be taken that the decision in Niboyet v. Niboyet (3 P.D., 52, and 4 P.D., 1), where the Court of Appeal by a majority reversed the decision of Sir Robert Phillimore, is not sound.

I pass from executive decrees to deliberate pronouncements—decrees of declarator or of nullity. The first authorities to be considered are those of Scrimshire v. Scrimshire (2 Hagg. Consist., 395) and Sinclair v. Sinclair (1 Hagg. Consist., 294). In both cases a ceremony of marriage was gone through in France between English subjects domiciled in England. In both the parties continued so domiciled. In both there was a decree of nullity by a foreign Court, which was set up by the man as a defence to matrimonial relief claimed by the woman.

In Scrimshire v. Scrimshire (supra) the man did not rely upon the decree of nullity as conclusive. He pleaded facts and the law of France, the lex loci celebrationis, according to which the marriage was null, and (it being a course of procedure in the Ecclesiastical Courts to plead evidence) he pleaded the French decision as the best evidence of the French law (it was so done later in Simonin v. Mallac, 2 Sw. and Tr., 67) and upon the whole matter the Court decided in his favour.

In Sinclair v. Sinclair (supra) the woman relied not merely upon the French ceremony but also upon a subsequent marriage which she said had been solemnized in England, and she claimed a divorce a mensa et toro by reason of her alleged husband's adultery, no doubt expecting to get alimony. The case, so far as it is reported, was tried upon the preliminary objection of the man that the Court had no jurisdiction because the woman was disentitled by reason of a decree of a Court in Flanders given against her, both in respect of nullity and in respect of her adultery.

This latter finding, though not an objection to the jurisdiction and therefore improperly relied upon at this stage, would have been a good defence to the woman's claim for relief. But the Judge, Sir William Scott, after commenting upon the grotesqueness of such a joinder of causes of suit, came to the conclusion that it was not proved, at any rate at that stage, that there had been a decree against the woman for adultery. The historical circumstances of the condition of Flanders at that moment rendered certainty in these matters difficult of attainment.

If the alleged decree against the woman for adultery was not proved, the decree, if that were a real one, of nullity would be at this stage of no avail to the man because the woman was relying upon the double ceremony and the man did not suggest that the Flanders decree had been given upon anything but the French ceremony. There could be no doubt, therefore, that the man's protest to the jurisdiction had to be overruled and that he must be put to answer in the usual way the case that was made against him. We do not know what followed. However, in the course of his judgment, Sir William Scott made use of language which, owing to the great respect always paid to that eminent Judge, has been treated as weighty. He does seem to speak as if, in matrimonial cases where the validity of the marriage was in dispute, the Court would not consider itself concluded by any previous decision of any other Court even when rendered between the same parties, but would look at such decisions merely as helps or guides or adminicula of proof. If and so far as it was a matter of the law of France as the place of the alleged celebration, he would have regarded, it would appear, the decree of a French Court as valuable evidence of French law, in the same way that Sir Edward Simpson treated the French decision in Scrimshire v. Scrimshire (supra). But it would seem as if this was all the weight that Sir William Scott could attach to it even if it were the Court of the domicil of the parties.

When, however, one remembers that in the case with which he was dealing, as in the case of Scrimshire v. Scrimshire (supra) (which he probably had in his recollection), there was no question of a sentence by the Court of the domicil, one can see that it may well be a mistake to apply his language generally.

At that time there was no one matrimonial Court in England. There were as many Courts as there were dioceses, and indeed more, because there were some special jurisdictions; and he cannot have thought, if there had been a decree of nullity procured by a man living in the Diocese of London who afterwards removed and made his domicil in Southwark, that the Court of the Bishop of Winchester would not, if the question were raised either by the same woman or by another woman relying upon a subsequent marriage, be concluded by the decree of the Chancellor of London.

The next case, occurring after a long interval, which bears upon this matter seems to be Simonin v. Mallac (supra). Rightly understood this case does not seem to be an authority for the proposition that an English Court in the case of a putative English marriage will not treat the decision of the Court of the domicil of the parties as conclusive.

These were two French people who came over to Dover to celebrate an English marriage and returned to France where they were both always domiciled, and where, as the man refused to ratify the marriage by a French ceremony, the woman sued in the French Court and got a decree of nullity, and then, not content with that decree, sued also in the English matrimonial Court for a similar decree. It was an unusual proceeding. It was not like the usual suit on a foreign judgment where execution is sought in this country, nor was it a case like those which I have mentioned, in which a foreign decree of nullity was set up as a bar to application for matrimonial relief.

When the petition is looked at it will be seen that the lady did not rely on the foreign decree as conclusive. She set out facts, including the French law, and the French decree as evidence of the French law, just as it had been used in Scrimshire v. Scrimshire (supra), and then proceeded to submit that the law governing the validity of marriage was the law of the domicil of the parties and not the lex loci celebrationis. Thereupon the decision of the Court, right or wrong, was upon this issue only. The Judges held that, at any rate in respect of the particular defect alleged (impedimentum impeditivum) the law of the place of celebration prevailed over the law of the domicil. It may be said that the Court ought to have guarded itself in respect of the French sentence of nullity, but inasmuch as it was not invited to hold this sentence as conclusive but to examine the matter for itself, it is not to be wondered at that the Court did not take this point.

The English decision which goes furthest in support of the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Session is Ogden v. Ogden (24 The Times L.R., 94; [1908] P., 46), in which case the Court of Appeal disregarded the sentence of the French Court, which was the Court of the man's domicil, and proceeded to hold that a marriage celebrated in England between a competent English woman and a Frenchman who was capable of marrying her but could not validly marry her at the moment according to the law of France for want of the necessary consents was a valid marriage, notwithstanding that the French Court had pronounced it null. The impediment was, it is to be noted, an impedimentum impeditivum and not an impedimentum dirimens, such as incest or a colour bar.

This authority looks at first sight as if an English Court would not in the case of an English marriage hold itself concluded by the decision of a foreign Court though the latter was the Court of the domicil. But in truth the problem in Ogden v. Ogden (supra) was almost insoluble. The short cohabitation between the parties which followed the ceremony of marriage did indeed take place in England, but after this very temporary residence the man returned to his home in France and never lost his French domicil. On the other hand the woman did not follow the man to France and, if she were not married to him, never acquired a French domicil. To treat her as domiciled in France would be to treat her as a wife, who takes her necessary domicil from her husband. But the French Court proceeded to say that she was not a wife, and when the suit of Ogden v. Ogden (supra) came on, that was, and necessarily was, her contention.

The President, Sir Gorell Barnes, insists upon this point at page 78 of the report, and therefore took the French decree, as he expressed it, as only a declaration of the status of the parties in France. The French decision could not be relied upon as res inter partes judicata, for it was being questioned by the second putative husband, and the woman could not set it up as a judgment in rem by the Court of her domicil. Moreover it was clear that the Court of her own domicil never would have held the marriage null.

To these observations upon Ogden v. Ogden (supra) I should add that the case was unfavourably commented upon in the judgment of the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Alberta v. Cook (supra), and that whether it was a right or a wrong decision upon the very peculiar facts of the case I cannot regard it as an authority that English law would not recognize the decision of a competent Court having jurisdiction over the place where the parties are domiciled as final and conclusive.

As to the general principles of international law upon this subject as viewed by British Courts it seems to me pretty clear that for the purpose of pronouncing upon the status of parties as well as for the purpose of affecting that status the Court of the law which regulates or determines the personal status of the parties, if they are both subject to the same law, decides conclusively. I have used the expression "the law which determines the personal status" because there are countries which would refer to nationality rather than to domicil; but the principle is the same.

The text first quoted in Shaw v. Gould (L.R., 3 H.L., 55) and then cited in Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (supra, at p. 538), and in Lord Advocate v. Jaffrey (supra, at p. 152) was not, I apprehend, intended to be confined to decrees which effect something, but deals also, if not primarily, with decrees which decide upon the existing status: Unicum hoc ipsa rei natura ac necessitas invexit, ut cum de statu et conditione hominum quaeritur, uni solummodo judici, et quidem domicilii, universum in illa jus sit attributum.

My Lords, there is no reason for supposing that the law of Scotland differs in this respect from general international law. The passage in Longworth v. Yelverton (5 Rettie (H.L.), 144, at p. 147), where the reason given for refusing to put in force the special Scotch process of referring an issue to the conscience of the other party was because a judgment of declarator of marriage would thus be obtained on a personal admission and yet nevertheless as a judgment in rem or a judgment upon personal status would be binding on a new wife, indicates sufficiently the trend of Scottish law.

I do not think that the case of Smith or Murison v. Murison ([1923] S.C., 624) or even the obiter observations which occur in the judgments affect this conclusion.

Finally, my Lords, if the Court is a competent Court, still more if it is the only competent Court—and in my opinion the Wiesbaden Court was the only competent Court for these parties—its judgment must, for the very reason of the thing, be, as such a judgment as that described in A. v. B. (L.R., 1 P. and D., 559), a "definitive decree declaring a marriage void, which should be universally binding and which should ascertain and determine the status of the parties once for all."

My Lords, I cannot conclude this delivery of my opinion without one cautela or reservation. If it could be said on behalf of the Administrator that this was a collusive suit and a judgment procured by collusion, it would, in my view, be unavailing. As the Solicitor-General said in the Duchess of Kingston's case (20 St. Tr., at p. 479): "Fabula, non judicium, hoc est; in scena, non in foro, res agitur." I should lay such a judgment aside. But I agree with the Lord Ordinary and the Lord President that no such collusion is suggested in this case as amounts to a case of fraud upon the German Court. No doubt the parties desired that the German Court should pronounce the marriage null. But it is not suggested that any false evidence was given or that any material evidence was designedly excluded, or that the opinion of the advocate on the French law was not the honest opinion of a competent person, though it may or may not have been correct.

For these reasons I concur with your Lordships in holding that the interlocutor of the Court of Session should be set aside and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary restored.

LORD BLANESBURGH.—My Lords: The difficulty in this appeal, as I see it, has been not so much to determine whether in ordinary circumstances a decree of nullity pronounced by the Court of the domicil of the parties is conclusive everywhere as it has been to determine whether in the unusual circumstances and reactions of the nullity suit in the present case the Wiesbaden decree made in it is outside the general rule, at least so far as the Court of Session in this action of multiplepoinding and at the instance of the Administrator of Austrian Property is concerned. My Lords, I confess that if it had not been for the complete exposition of the case in all its aspects and from all points of view which is to be found in the weighty judgments of the Lord President and Lord Sands, the difficulty I have experienced in reaching a decision entirely satisfactory to myself might, in the special circumstances here existing, still have remained unresolved.

But, having examined and re-examined these judgments with all the care of which I am capable, and being assisted to a conclusion also by the fuller examination of the English authorities which has been made in this House, I now see no effective answer to the conclusions reached by Lord Sands or to the reasoning by which he supports them.

Accordingly, I concur in the motion which has been made by the noble Viscount on the Woolsack.

LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE.—My Lords: I have had the advantage of reading the opinions pronounced by the noble Viscount on the Woolsack and by Viscount Dunedin and Lord Phillimore. I agree with their reasoning and conclusions and I have nothing to add.

BHAGCHAND DAGDUSA GUJRATHI AND OTHERS v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL.*

India—Action against public officer—Requirement of two months' notice—Whether subject to exception—Case of hardship or irreparable damage—Action for injunction—Question of ultra vires—Government of India Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict., c. 106), s. 65—Code of Civil Procedure (Act. V. of 1908) (Indian statute), s. 80.

By s. 80 of the Indian Code of Civil Procedure, "No suit shall be instituted against the Secretary of State for India in Council, or against a public officer in respect of any act purporting to be done by such public officer in his official capacity, until the expiration of two months next after notice in writing has been, in the case of the Secretary of State in Council, delivered to, or left at the office of, a secretary to the Local Government or the Collector of the District, and, in the case of a public officer, delivered to him or left at his office, stating the cause of action, the name, description, and place of residence of the plaintiff and the relief which he claims; and the plaint shall contain a statement that such notice has been so delivered or left."

Held, that the above provision is not ultra vires, as the regulation of civil procedure is not subject to s. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1858, and that it is applicable to all forms of action and to all kinds of relief, and is not subject to any exception in an action where an injunction is prayed or in cases where hardship or injury not reparable by money compensation may arise; and that therefore, where a plaint, such as is referred to, is issued before the expiration of two months from the notice required, the action is unsustainable in limine.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Bombay of August 15, 1923, affirming a decree of the District Judge of Nasik.

Mr. J. M. Parikh appeared for the appellants; Sir George Lowndes, K.C., and Mr. Kenworthy Brown for the Secretary of State for India in Council.

VISCOUNT SUMNER, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—In this action 48 plaintiffs joined in suing the Secretary of State for India and the Collector and District Magistrate of Nasik for two kinds of relief, (a) a declaration that certain official notices and orders were ultra vires and invalid, and (b) an injunction permanently restraining all executive action thereunder. Unless the right to the first relief was made out, the prayer for the second necessarily failed. The suit was begun less than two months after notice of the intention to bring it had been given to the respondents. It was dismissed by the District Judge on all grounds, and by the High Court of Bombay as well, but, as to one of the learned Judges, not altogether on the same grounds. The plaintiffs now appeal.

In April, 1921, serious disorder occurred at Malegaon, in the district of Nasik, Bombay, connected with the Khilafat agitation, and in the consequent unlawful assemblies and riots there was loss of life and much damage to property. The Mahomedan weavers, who formed the large majority of the male inhabitants of the place, were the chief culprits, though it is not likely that they acted without instigation from other parties. Some persons were punished criminally, but the question remained how the injured parties were to be compensated and how order was to be maintained in the future. An inquiry was accordingly held, and amounts were fixed, by way of compensation to persons who had suffered in the riots. The Government decided to put in force the provisions of the Bombay District Police Act No. IV. of 1890, and orders were duly made for the employment of additional police at the expense of the inhabitants and for payment of compensation for the injuries sustained. Under these orders the income-tax payers, a small class, and the great body of the weavers were designated as the parties to pay the sums required. No question as to the correctness of these proceedings now arises.

Under the Act it was for the Collector to get in the amount of the compensation and for the Municipality of Malegaon to enforce payment of the police rate. Both were unable to do so. Coercion of the weavers generally, who had few belongings and lived in the main from hand to mouth, proved to be impracticable. As to the ratepayers, the Municipality lacked means of enforcing a general payment, and were openly set at defiance. By the spring of the following year the position had become exceedingly unsatisfactory. Some small sums had been collected from the income-tax payers but, in spite of much patience on the part of the executive and a lapse of time sufficient to have allayed the original turbulence, the measures taken under the Police Act had practically come to nothing.

Accordingly, in March, 1922, the District Magistrate of Nasik, who was Collector as well, proposed to the Commissioner for the Central Division that, instead of seeking to recover the amounts due for compensation from the weavers directly, a tax should be imposed personally on the merchants at Malegaon, who sold to the weavers the yarn for the saris, which they made, and bought from them their finished product. The amount of the tax in each merchant's case was to be measured by the amount of his dealings with the weavers during a period indicated. These merchants constituted a small class, likely to be easy to deal with, and many of them were weavers themselves. In the ordinary course, whatever they paid they would pass on to their customers by charging more for their yarn and giving less for the saris. It was unlikely that the weavers as a body could resist this readjustment, having no capital of their own and no means of quitting Malegaon to carry on their industry elsewhere. The magistrate was careful to point out that, if his suggestion was adopted, a modification would be required in the order of August 16, 1921, under which payment of the compensation had been imposed in terms on the Mahomedan weavers. The Commissioner passed this proposal to the Home Department, expressing his approval, and forwarding a copy of this approval to the Collector of Nasik. In April, 1922, the Government also approved the proposal and directed that the District Magistrate should be so informed, and, having thus dealt with the question of compensation, took up that of the expense of the extra police force. Here, too, it was decided to adopt the same plan, namely, to recover the sums outstanding from the shopkeepers, both Mahomedan and Hindu, who dealt in saris and yarn.

A notification, No. 152, dated June 6, 1922, was then published in the Bombay Government Gazette. This is the document which, with demand notices issued thereunder, the appellants by their prayer in this suit seek to have declared to be invalid and unlawful. It purports to be made by the Governor in Council and to direct, under section 25, that "the cost of the additional police shall be defrayed wholly by a tax imposed on the Mohammedan income-tax payers, who are inhabitants of the said town, and by a rate, assessed on the property of such other inhabitants as are" notified in manner set forth, and under section 25A that the above cost and the total amount of compensation awarded by the District Magistrate of Nasik should be assessed and recovered, first from payers of income-tax in certain amounts and instalments, and secondly :—

"The balance of the combined charges, after the amount recoverable from persons of Class I. has been deducted, shall be recovered on behalf of the Momin adult weavers of Malegaon from both Mohammedan and Hindu shopkeepers of Malegaon dealing in saris and yarn, who shall pay every year up to May 31, 1923, beginning from July 1, 1921, a rate calculated by the District Magistrate, Nasik, at a sum not exceeding six annas, multiplied by the average number of saris hitherto purchased by them from Momin weavers of Malegaon annually, or a sum not exceeding Rs.5, multiplied by the average number of bales of yarn hitherto sold by them to Momin weavers of Malegaon annually, as the case may be.

"And, whereas the Municipality of Malegaon has made a default in the recovery of the charges on account of the said additional police, the Governor in Council is pleased to direct, under the proviso to section 26 (1) of the said Act, that the recovery of the said charges shall be made by the Collector of the District along with the compensation money as an arrear of land revenue. . . ."

The employment of additional police in consequence of the rioting, which caused the damage, and the compensation for the damage thus done are respectively dealt with in section 25 and section 25A of the Act. It will be seen that the Act prescribes no forms and few formalities. The District Magistrate, with the Commissioner's previous sanction, fixes the proportions in which individuals are to make payments towards the compensation, which he has ascertained, for damage done and decides whether all the inhabitants of the local area affected or only particular sections or classes, and if so which, are to pay, and he then directs and requires the Collector to recover the amounts accordingly. How the Commissioner's previous sanction is to be given and how the decision of the magistrate and his direction and requisition to the collector are to be formulated the section does not say. So with the additional police, though their employment in the first instance has to be directed by notification, the mode in which the cost is to be defrayed is to be simply directed by Government in accordance with subsection 2 (A) and (B), and notification at this stage is not prescribed. Furthermore, in regard to each section, it is to be noticed that the determination of the incidence of the tax in question is an executive and not a judicial act. It is a function of the Government in the one case, and of the District Magistrate in the other, but in both cases its character is the same. Whatever may be said of the inquiry under section 25A (1) A into claims to be compensated for the damage sustained, the magistrate's action under section 25A (1) B is not a judicial proceeding, and there is nothing in the Act which requires that his action in this matter should be taken wholly on his own initiative or without instructions or recommendations from his superiors. (Cf. Ezra v. Secretary of State, 30 Calc., 36, at pp. 83 to 85.) Even the Commissioner's sanction is only stated to be previous; it is not required to be given once for all. Nothing prevents it from being given from time to time or after consultation, nor is there anything about it which confines it to starting the magistrate on a course of action, which he is thereafter to pursue independently and alone.

There is, furthermore, nothing in either section to restrict the exercise of this taxing function to one occasion and one only. The powers which they give are not spent by a single exercise. The finality referred to in section 25A (4) relates exclusively to the Commissioner's function of review. The directions of the District Magistrate are not capable of being challenged otherwise than is thereby provided, but it is quite a different thing to say that the giving of one direction exhausts all the magistrate's powers and leaves him thereafter incapable of any substituted or amending action. Such a provision would be appropriate only to the judgment of a Court and not to administrative action such as this. Such a construction would tend to deprive the enactment of its practical utility.

On the Government Notification, No. 152, the appellants' contentions may be summarized thus. The notification includes in one document without distinction two separate matters—compensation for damage and the cost of additional police. In respect of the former it passes over the District Magistrate altogether, ousts his jurisdiction, and determines the incidence of the compensation tax by direct Government decree. Without discharging the orders previously made, it requires the collection of tax from Hindus and from shopkeepers, which under those prior orders had been imposed only on Mahomedans and weavers, a thing without legal warrant. Either the Government is making a new order, which is bad because it trespasses on the exclusive functions of the District Magistrate, or it is applying to his old order a new method of exacting the tax from persons who are in terms outside the ambit of the old order as it stands. In the alternative, it constituted the shopkeepers agents for the weavers, contrary alike to fact and to law, and, under the strongest personal penalties in case of failure it called on them to pay on behalf of principals, who had neither authorized payment nor put them in funds to make it. The obvious explanation of the real intent of the notification, which is furnished by the previous reports and communications, is brushed aside by the appellants on the singular plea that this written instrument, unlike others, is to be looked at in isolation from the circumstances in which it was promulgated, and as a matter of construction is so drawn as to contain on its face two plain transgressions of the very Act, in pursuance of which it is expressed to be published.

It is, of course, easy to be wise after the event. It may be admitted that the notification would have been improved (a) by a statement that the new mode of raising the money was directed in lieu of the old one, the orders for which were pro tanto discharged, and (b) by the complete omission of any reference to the mode in which the shopkeepers might recoup themselves by adjustments of the prices of yarn and saris respectively. Probably the draughtsman could find ample excuse in the circumstances of a harassing period of office. At any rate, although the same notification includes both the cost of the police and the payment of compensation, the two matters are clearly severable, and the exercise of the powers of the Government under section 25 is not prejudiced by the additional notification of the course which the District Magistrate was about to take under section 25A.

The short answer, however, to all this is to be found in construing the document reasonably in the light of the existing circumstances, and by referring for the rest to section 79 of the Act:—

"No . . . order, direction . . . or notification, made or published, and no act done under any provision herein contained, or in substantial conformity to the same, shall be deemed illegal, void, invalid or insufficient for any defect of form or publication, or any irregularity of procedure."

In the circumstances the meaning of the notification is obvious. As regards the cost of the additional police, the Government direction is actually expressed to be in supersession of those previous notifications dealing with the incidence of the payments, and the substituted incidence, which is in other words a new tax, is described alike for the police and for the compensation payments. Being, in fact, a substitution for the previous tax and sufficiently so described in the case of the police charges, it is, in their Lordships' opinion, a mere defect of form not to have reiterated the words showing expressly, as to the compensation charge also, that the taxing part of the notification is new. The same consideration applies to the fact that the notification speaks of the total amount of the compensation having been awarded by the District Magistrate under section 25A and then goes on to speak of the mode of recovery as having been directed by the Governor-in-Council. Nothing in section 25A prescribes this part of the notification at all, and to this extent it may be needless to refer to section 79. The fact was that the Commissioner's previous sanction having been given (none the less regularly that he expressed it in two lines endorsed on the District Magistrate's letter to himself, of which he caused a copy to be sent to that official), the District Magistrate proceeded on June 12, 1922, to send to himself as Collector a requirement to recover payments from persons named, with particulars for calculating the amounts, which had been originally suggested by himself in principle and had now been determined by himself in detail. After this substantial conformity with the provisions of section 25A, their Lordships think that the errors in the Notification, if errors there were, do not matter.

The appellants, however, have contended that the whole proceeding was invalid because it involved the fundamental injustice of requiring a class of persons, not shown by any evidence to have been implicated in the riots, to bear a penalty, which ought rightly to have fallen only on those who were, and because agents were taxed instead of principals, for which the Police Act affords no warrant. The expression used in the Notification—"on behalf of the Momin adult weavers of Malegaon"—is made to play a large part in this contention.

It may be readily admitted that the words were not felicitous. They lend themselves to misunderstanding. On April 21, 1922, the subdivisional magistrate of Nasik had issued a notice to the people of Malegaon in which he stated that "the shopkeepers, who sell yarn to the Momins . . . are to be considered as agents for the purposes of recovery of these amounts." In itself this action was insignificant, and it may not have been known to the Government when the Notification was issued, but the use of words which seemed to support this notice instead of words clearly negativing it was unfortunate. What was meant, however, was that the shopkeepers were to be substituted for the weavers, as the section of the inhabitants to be charged with payment of the levy under the Act, with an addition, well-meant but probably unnecessary, that they might and would find means of passing on the burden to the weavers. In any case, these words were outside the requirements of the Police Act. They do not contravene it, though they do not correctly describe what was being done.

As for the rest of this branch of the complaint, the Act does not require proof of the active complicity of a section of the inhabitants before such an order as the Act contemplates can be made. To imply such a requirement would defeat the objects of the Act. It is the essence of measures of this kind, which in one form or another are not uncommon, that one class has to pay for the misdeeds of another, but this in itself constitutes no objection to the course that was taken. There is no issue before their Lordships with regard to the propriety of applying these provisions of the Police Act under the circumstances which had arisen, and they express no opinion about it, but they are not to be taken as suggesting that any question could be raised as to the action of the Government and District Magistrate in itself. Those who are called on to apply such an Act as this have not only the power but the duty of enforcing it when, in their judgment, a case has arisen which calls for its application. They are the best and the only judges in that matter.

Some minor objections were taken, which are either complete misapprehensions or are sufficiently met by section 79. It will suffice to mention two. In writing to the Commissioner on March 7, 1922, the District Magistrate had said :—

"To prevent any injustice being done to the Hindus, I would propose that the Deputy Collector in charge of Malegaon Subdivision should hold a summary inquiry at which the Hindu shopkeepers . . . should be called upon to be present, and that they should be given an opportunity of furnishing proof that, before, during and after the riots, they were actively and publicly on the side of Government. . . . When, after this inquiry is finished, these lists of merchants are fixed, the Deputy Collector should estimate approximately the number of saris and the bales of yarn that actually pass through each man's hands . . . The Deputy Collector would make this assessment very much in the way in which income-tax assessments are made. . . . The assessment would be rough and ready, but . . . it would be on very liberal lines."

Subsequently, on April 21, 1922, the District Magistrate instructed the subdivisional magistrate to take this summary inquiry in hand, adding directions which show that what was further required was an administrative measure to furnish information, on which he himself would proceed to make definitive orders, simultaneous with the expected Government notification. Founding on this, the appellants say that the Hindu shopkeepers ought to have had the opportunity of criticizing and refuting the information obtained by the Deputy Collector and that, failing such opportunity, the assessment, which was made on the footing of his report, cannot be enforced against them. This argument overlooks the fact that the first proposed inquiry was to enable the shopkeepers to show that they had at some time been on the side of the Government and of law and order, which at no time have any of them attempted to show ; that the inquiries actually made, as to the trade which the different merchants did, appear to have been such as would have been admissible for income-tax purposes ; that in any case the District Magistrate's suggestions formed no part of the order made under section 25A, or constituted a condition precedent to its validity ; and that the Act is silent as to any such inquiry, though, when an inquiry is desired, it is named expressly, and that the implication of such an inquiry—dilatory and often inconclusive as it would be—would tend to defeat the operation of the Act itself. No substantial injustice appears to have been done, for, although the notices issued to individual merchants, dated April 25, 1922, invited them to show cause against the proposed assessments of the amount of the tax falling severally on them, they do not appear to have adopted this remedy, but preferred to try the effect of this collective suit for an injunction as a total discomfiture of the Government.

The other contention is this. When the District Magistrate issued his requirement to the Collector on June 12, 1922, he named dates for payment of the instalments prescribed, which appear to make the first year for the recoveries begin on January 1, 1922. In the notice served by the Collector on shopkeepers individually under the same date, the first year of liability is stated as beginning on July 1, 1921. It is said that this constitutes in form a retrospective imposition of tax, not warranted by the Act, which, in fact, bars the exercise of the contemplated relief by way of passing on the charge to customers, since, in 1922-1923, a shopkeeper could not make deductions or additions from or to his purchases or sales which had been made in 1921. The answer is that the discrepancy as to the date of commencement of the first year is a mere irregularity, and that there is nothing retrospective about the matter. The payment imposed is imposed de futuro and the dates are mere elements in a calculation of the amounts and dates of the instalments. As to passing on the burden to the weavers at all, that was purely optional and formed no part of the order.

In one matter, however, not relatively important in itself, their Lordships think that the prescriptions of the Police Act were not observed. In regard to the cost of additional police, the Act provides as follows :—

"25 (4). If the local area, in which any such tax is to be imposed, or any such rate is to be assessed, is a municipal district, the amount of the charge shall be paid by the Municipality from the municipal fund, or the rate shall be assessed by the Municipality conformably to the direction given by Government."

"26 (1). Every tax imposed or rate assessed under the last two preceding sections . . . by a Municipality shall be recovered by such Municipality from each person assessable therefor in the same manner as a municipal tax due by him: Provided always that, in default of such recovery, it shall be lawful for the Government to direct the Collector to recover such tax or rate. . . ."

Now on December 1, 1921, before the plan of direct collection from the weavers had been given up, the President of the Municipality of Malegaon had reported to the Collector of Nasik on the position as it then was. He recalled that, soon after the disturbances, when it was contemplated that the cost of the additional police should be recovered by the Municipality, he had represented to the Collector that it was totally unable to undertake the work in question. He stated that the weavers had become increasingly recalcitrant, that they flatly refused to pay and abused the officials employed. He quoted them as saying openly that the Municipality had no business to undertake the work, when the majority of ratepayers were thoroughly opposed to payment, and he added that even the income-tax payers (only 26 in number) paid nothing but passively awaited the issue of warrants of distress under section 183 of the District Municipal Act. His report concluded thus:—

"Irregular recovery of municipal taxes and large outstandings every year are due to the same reason. I may add that not a single pie of additional police charges has been recovered up to now. The situation, therefore, is very delicate, and it must be handled with great tact and circumspection. I, therefore, seek your advice as to how I should proceed in the matter. I should also be enlightened on the point whether the work of executing warrants of distress against income-tax payers should be taken in hand."

The proviso to section 26 (1) of the Police Act speaks of "in default of recovery" by the Municipality, not "in case of wilful default," and, if the Government read this report under the circumstances as a simple confession of failure so far, there can be no question that the interpretation was justified. The Municipality had never desired to be charged with this recovery: they had sufficient experience of the difficulty of getting any money out of the weavers to desire no more of such responsibilities, and they had come as near as they respectfully could to inviting the Government to collect its money for itself. Accordingly, the recovery of the costs of the additional police was placed in the Collector's hands.

It appears, however, to have been overlooked that the object and effect of what was done in June, 1922, were to supersede the old levy by a new one, to be made on different persons and to be measured in a different manner. It was a new exercise of the powers given to the Government by section 25 (2), to which, therefore, the mandatory provisions of subsection (4) at once attached. The report made by the President of the Municipality dealt only with the superseded method of recovery, and could not be said to amount to a refusal to try to recover anything, old or new, or to an anticipatory declaration of default under all circumstances. The appellants, accordingly, urge that the Municipality ought to have had the opportunity of making their own assessments, pursuant to section 25 (4), and of seeing what they could do with a body of shopkeepers, men of substance and probably men of peace, who at any rate had a good deal to lose by defying the law, for the chances of success in dealing with them were greater than those attending on a conflict with a numerous body of turbulent workmen, who had little or nothing to lose. They say that the conditions had not been fulfilled, which the Act fixes as precedent to the Collector's right to get in the police rate from them. The point is legally open to them now, little as it can be supposed that they actually desired at the time to have had any demands made by the Municipality on them.

The provision that, when Government decrees integrally a levy for the recovery of the cost of additional police, its execution must be put into and left in the hands of the Municipality, when there is one, until default is made, appears to their Lordships to be more than a form which might be waived, or a matter in which irregularity is excused. It cannot be a mere irregularity to disregard an express statutory prescription, however honestly or excusably, nor is a short cut permissible because the prescribed course promises little advantage. The Police Act interposes between the punitive action of the Government and the incidence of the burden on the individual the executive action of a Municipality which may be supposed to feel a responsibility towards its ratepayers and to mitigate, from their point of view, the severity of the chastisement. It has, therefore, a constitutional importance, which must be recognized, whether the practical moment of this arrangement is really considerable or not. On this point only and on this ground alone their Lordships are of opinion that the demand made by the Collector for payments in recovery of the costs of the additional police was premature, and not in accordance with the Act.

It accordingly becomes necessary to consider the answer which section 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure affords to the appellants' claim. This answer, if it is applicable at all, applies to the whole suit, but, in view of the numerous and precise attacks which have been made throughout the proceedings on all the Government officials concerned, and of the differences of opinion which have been expressed in India upon them, it did not seem to their Lordships either right or wise not to examine them, with the object of seeing whether they had any foundation.

This section and its predecessor, section 424 of the Code of 1882, have stood for over 40 years, substantially in the same form, as a protection to officials in precise terms against personal responsibility for official action. How far-reaching such protection ought to be is a matter of policy; how far it actually extends is a question of judicial construction.

That this suit is one to which section 80 applies is common ground; the contest is as to its effect when applied. The plaint avers (para. 17) that "Notice, as required under section 80 of the Civil Procedure Code, has been given to the Collector." This was given on June 26, 1922, and the act, purporting to have been done by him in his official capacity, which was relied on, was the issue of notices for the recovery from the plaintiffs in the suit of the tax referred to in Notification 152. It does not appear that any notice was served on the Secretary of State, though the section requires it, but no independent ground of defence has been raised on this. The plaint proceeds in the same paragraph, "As the suit is for an injunction, and as the defendants are about to recover the amount demanded in the notices soon, the suit is filed before the completion of the period of two months." No particulars were given to show that the Collector intended to enforce the orders before August 15, 1922, nor was any satisfactory evidence given to this effect. The plaintiffs appear to have relied simply on the fact that part of the relief claimed in the suit was an injunction.

For many years there has been a marked difference of opinion between the High Court of Bombay, on the one hand, and all the other High Courts in India, on the other, as to the true application of section 80 of the Civil Procedure Code (Act V.) of 1908 and of section 424 of the Code (Act X.) of 1877, which it superseded, in the case of suits against officials for acts purporting to be done in discharge of their duties, when part or the whole of the relief claimed is a perpetual injunction. After some differences of opinion among their subordinate Courts, the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Allahabad have now agreed in deciding that these sections are to be strictly complied with and are applicable to all forms of action and all kinds of relief. See the cases of Rajlucki Debi (25 Calc., 239) and Dakshina (50 Calc., 992) ; of Kalekhan (37 Mad., 113) and Koti Reddi (41 Mad., 792) ; of Bachchu Singh (25 All., 187) and Abdul Rahim (46 All., 884). In Bombay, on the other hand, in the cases of Gajanan Krishnarao (35 Bomb., 362), Naginlal (37 Bomb., 243), and Gulam Rosul (40 Bomb., 392), which were suits to restrain by injunction the commission of some official act prejudicial to the plaintiff, it has been intimated or held that, if the immediate result of the Act would be to inflict irremediable harm, section 80 does not compel the plaintiff to wait two months before bringing his suit, though, if nothing is to be apprehended beyond what payment of damages would compensate, the rule is otherwise and the section applies.

As the Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to all the High Courts in India, and as section 80 is intended to afford a protection (whatever exactly it may be) to all officials, high and low, it is certainly undesirable that a difference of opinion such as this should be left unresolved. What appears to have influenced the learned Judges is, first, their assumption as to the practical objects with which it was framed (see Shahebzadee's case (7 Calc., 499) ; Peary Mohan Das (16 C.W.N., 145), and Raghubans' cases (32 Calc., 1130)) ; and, secondly, is the fact that this protection takes the form of providing for a fixed and obligatory interval of two months between the required notice and the commencement of any suit in respect of the officials' action. It is only right to observe in this connexion that, under section 80 (2) of the Bombay Police Act, at any rate, and it may be under other similar provisions, damages would not be recoverable from a public servant who gave effect in good faith to orders issued with apparent authority. It appears, therefore, to have been due to anxiety not to expose a plaintiff to the risk of the execution of an invalid order without practical redress that they adopted a construction which is not in accord with that accepted generally. The point has been put in this way. Section 80 is but a part of a Procedure Code, passed to provide the regulations and machinery, by means of which the Courts may do justice between the parties. A construction which may lead to injustice is one which ought not to be adopted, since it would be repugnant to the whole tenor and purpose of the Act, and the implication of a suitable exception or qualification is, therefore, justifiable and even necessary. In effect, however, their decisions are not altogether reconcilable with one another, either as to the extent to which they go, or as to the reasoning on which they are based. Whether the section should be read as if it ran "no suit other than a suit in which an injunction is claimed," or as if it ran "no suit shall be instituted except when serious or irreparable damage might be occasioned to the plaintiff, if not prevented by the previous grant of an injunction," does not appear to have been settled. In the one case all suits falling within the section could safely anticipate the prescribed delay by the simple device of adding a claim for an injunction at the end of the plaint. In the other it would depend on the view which a Judge might take of the elastic and indefinite expression "serious or irreparable damage," whether the official should have or should lose the benefit of the statutory interval of two months, nor can this difficulty in the least depend on the intention which may be speculatively attributed to the Legislature in prescribing any interval at all. To some extent the Bombay decisions purport to rest on the authority of English cases, of which the principal are : Attorney-General v. Hackney Local Board (L.R., 20 Eq., 626) and Flower v. Low Leyton Local Board (5 Ch. D., 347). These were decided respectively upon the Metropolis Management Act Amendment Act, 1862, and on the Public Health Act, 1875, and turned on the construction then put on the Public Authorities' protection clauses therein contained. The Public Authorities' Protection Act, 1893, has now repealed these clauses, and has adopted another form, to which the authority of Flower's case (supra) has not been considered applicable (Harrop v. Ossett Corporation, 14 The Times L.R., 308 ; [1898] 1 Ch., 525 ; Fielden v. Morley Corporation, 14 The Times L.R., 566, 576 ; [1899] 1 Ch., 1 ; 16 The Times L.R., 219 ; [1900] A.C., 133). In the Hackney case (supra), Vice-Chancellor Bacon held that the words "any act done or intended to be done under their Parliamentary powers" could not apply to a nuisance, to which such powers could not in any case extend. The difficulties of this construction are shown in the judgment of Lord Justice Bowen in Chapman, Morsons and Co. v. Auckland Union (23 Q.B.D., 294, at p. 302), where he endeavours, but without much confidence, to find a less unsatisfactory basis in the words "writ or process," within which a bill for an injunction might not fall. In Flower's case (supra) the Court of Appeal held that the Public Health Act, 1875, section 264, did not extend to a bill in Chancery, but only to an action at law, a consideration inapplicable to section 80 of the Civil Procedure Code, and assumed that the object of the delay provided by the section was to give time for a tender of amends. It is to be noted that the Public Health Act, 1875, the previous Act of 1848, and the Metropolis Management Act were cases where a subordinate statutory authority had been entrusted with specific and limited powers, and it would seem from Davis v. Swansea Corporation (22 L.J., Ex. 297) that the profession had long taken section 139 of the Act of 1848 to be applicable only to actions of tort. Similarly in Flower's case (supra), counsel hardly contested that an exception of "cases of necessity," as mentioned in the Court below by Vice-Chancellor Malins, must be understood. A view, therefore, about a bill for an injunction "against serious and irreparable damages requiring the intervention of the Court," almost undisputed in the Court of Appeal, would not be any guide to the meaning of the Civil Procedure Code, where the clause applies to all officers of Government and to all their official acts, and where the words "in respect of," a form going beyond "for anything done or intended to be done," show it to be wider than the statutes on which the English authorities were decided.

On the other hand, the view which has been taken in the other High Courts may be shortly summarized thus. The argument that a statutory provision as to procedure is subject to some exception of cases where hardship or even irremediable harm might be caused, if it were strictly applied, might be used with equal cogency in connexion with a code fixing the admissibility of evidence or with a limitation section, recognizing rights but barring remedies. For this, however, there is no authority. The Act, albeit a Procedure Code, must be read in accordance with the natural meaning of its words. Section 80 is express, explicit, and mandatory, and it admits of no implications or exceptions. A suit in which, inter alia, an injunction is prayed is still "a suit" within the words of the section, and to read any qualification into it is an encroachment on the function of legislation. Considering how long these and similar words have been read throughout most of the Courts in India in their literal sense, it is reasonable to suppose that the section has not been found to work injustice, but, if this is not so, it is a matter to be rectified by an amending Act. Their Lordships think that this reasoning is right. To argue, as the appellants did, that the plaintiffs had a right urgently calling for a remedy, while section 80 is mere procedure, is fallacious, for section 80 imposes a statutory and unqualified obligation upon the Court. So, too, the contention, that the "act purporting to be done by the Collector in his official capacity, in respect of which" the suit was begun, was his threatened enforcement of payment, is fallacious also, since the illegality, if any, is in the order for recovery of the tax. If that was valid, there was nothing to be restrained. Hence, though the act to be restrained is something apprehended in the future, the act alone "in respect of which" the suit lies, if at all, is the order already completed and issued.

As for the suggestion that section 80, in such a case as this, is itself ultra vires, it arises from a misapprehension of Moment's case (29 The Times L.R., 140; 40 Ind. Ap., 48). The regulation of civil procedure has nothing to do with the obligations formerly vesting in the East India Company as a trading corporation, for it is incidental to the duties of the ruling power, and cannot be said to be subject to the Government of India Act, 1858, section 65.

An attempt was made to distinguish between the effect of section 80 in the case of the Secretary of State and in the case of the Collector, and to argue that, even if it defeated the action as against the first-named defendant, it would fail to protect the second. Their Lordships cannot accept this. Not only has the suit been throughout a joint proceeding against the officials concerned, for the purpose of getting a joint declaration that the Government Notification was bad as the foundation of everything subsequently done, but, without the presence of the Secretary of State before the Court, the Notification could not be assailed, and, if it stands as valid, the Collector's own action could not be successfully impugned.

The consequence is that the appellants' present position in regard to the taxes imposed on them is as if their action had never been brought. It was unsustainable in limine. They commenced their suit before the law allowed them to sue, and can get no relief in it either by declaration or otherwise. Whatever may be the case between other parties, as against the respondents, they must fail. They have taken their own course and have brought this result on themselves. The suit was begun and prosecuted as a joint suit to challenge the official action as soon and as completely as possible. The evidence did not prove risk of serious or irremediable damage to anybody, and was not directed to doing so. The sums payable were in many cases very small, and were throughout far from being oppressive. Any sums paid under the Collector's demand would be returnable if that demand was proved to have been bad, and no one of the plaintiffs was shown to have been unable to make the first payment, the only one falling due within the two months. There was no reason for not complying with the words of the section, except over-confidence in what may be called the Bombay view of it. Accordingly, their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1927. June 2.

Revenue—Income-tax—Professional footballer —Transfer to different club—Payment of a sum as accrued benefit—Assessability.

The respondent was employed to play football for a club in return for payment, and, on his being transferred in accordance with the rules of the Football Association to another club, he was given by the first-named club a sum of £650 as accrued benefit.

Held, that the payment was neither a gift nor compensation for loss of employment, but was really remuneration for services and was therefore assessable to income-tax.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the Division of Prescot, Lancashire.

On January 26, 1925, George Harrison (the present respondent) appealed against an additional assessment to income-tax under Schedule E in the sum of £650 made upon him for the year ending April 5, 1924, in respect of a sum of £650 paid to him as a professional football player by the Everton Football Club Company Limited.

The following facts were proved or admitted :—

By an agreement dated April 28, 1913, made between the Everton Football Club Company, Limited, of the one part and the respondent of the other part, the respondent agreed to play football for the Everton Club upon the terms and conditions therein mentioned.

The Everton Club was a member of the Football Association, Limited, which was an association consisting of clubs and associations playing association football and being otherwise qualified according to the laws of the game as settled by the International Football Association Board and the rules, regulations, and by-laws of the association.

The Everton Club was also a member of the Football League, Limited, which was a combination of 44 football clubs.

The agreement of April 28, 1913, provided, inter alia :—

"4. The player shall observe and be subject to all the rules, regulations and by-laws of the Football Association, the Football League, the Southern League, the Inter-League Board, the English League Board, and any other association or combination of which the club shall be a member.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

" 6. In consideration of the observance by the said player of the terms and conditions of this agreement the said W. C. Cuff on behalf of the club hereby agrees that the said club shall pay to the said player the sum of £4 0s. 0d. per week from April 30, 1913, to April 30, 1914, with a bonus of ten pounds on signing, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged."

In accordance with the rules of the association the respondent was duly registered by the association as a professional player for the Everton Club on May 6, 1913.

On April 20, 1920, the Everton Club passed the following resolution :—

" The secretary is instructed to apply for permission to pay the following players the sum of £500 each in lieu of benefits :—

" . . . , G. Harrison, . . ."

The permission was given and the sum of £500 was paid to the respondent.

On May 4, 1922, the Everton Club gave a written undertaking to the respondent agreeing to his having a second benefit, if still engaged by the club, in the season following his having completed ten consecutive seasons with the club, subject to the consent of the League Management Committee being obtained.

On April 19, 1923, a fresh agreement was entered into between the Everton Club and the respondent whereby the respondent agreed to play for the club upon the terms and conditions therein mentioned.

The agreement provided, inter alia :—

" 4. The player shall observe and be subject to all the rules, regulations, and by-laws of the Football Association and of any other association, league, or combination of which the club shall be a member.

" 8. In consideration of the observance by the said player of the terms, provisions, and conditions of this agreement the said Thomas H. McIntosh, on behalf of the said club, shall pay to the said player the sum of £6 per week from May 7, 1923, to August 18, 1923, and £8 per week from August 20, 1923, to May 3, 1924.

" 10. Bonuses to be paid in accordance with League rules."

In accordance with the rules of the association hereinafter referred to the respondent was again registered by the association as a professional player for the Everton Club on April 20, 1923.

During October and November, 1923, negotiations were entered into for the transfer of the respondent from the Everton Club to the Preston North End Football Club, and on November 30, 1923, the respondent was transferred to the Preston North End Club.

On December 4, 1923, the Everton Club passed the following resolution :—

" The action of Mr. A. Coffey and secretary in transferring this player [i.e., the respondent] to Preston North End at a fee of £2,000, payable, half on December 31 and balance on or before December 31, 1924—action confirmed—and it was decided to apply to the League for permission to pay him £650 as accrued benefit."

At a meeting of the committee of the league held on or about December 30, 1923, permission was given to the Everton Club to pay the sum of £650 to the respondent.

A cheque for that amount was accordingly drawn by the Everton Club, and before April 5, 1924, the respondent was informed that the cheque was waiting at the office of the club to be taken up. It was actually handed to the respondent on May 3, 1924.

The rules of the Football Association provided, inter alia, for the registration of professional players by the association, and also that players might be transferred from one club to another.

Rule 9 of the Football League provided :—

" Clubs may enter into agreements with players after three playing seasons' continuous service providing for a benefit after five playing seasons' continuous service. All benefit must be sanctioned by the management committee, but shall not exceed £650. Players shall be qualified for a second benefit after ten playing seasons' continuous service. All benefit moneys must be paid over to players within 14 days, or, if left in the hands of the club, a definite and written agreement must be entered into and a copy furnished to the League within 14 days of the benefit becoming due and sanctioned. The service referred to in this rule must be substantially with the first team. Benefits to other players must be proportionately smaller and sanctioned by the management committee before promised."

Rule 10 provided :—

" When a player is transferred the club transferring him may, with the consent of the management committee, as a reward for loyal and meritorious service, pay to such player in lieu of presumed accrued share of benefit a percentage of the amount which the club has guaranteed, or would have been likely to guarantee, such player for a benefit reckoned upon the playing seasons of service in proportion to the qualifying period for a benefit with such club."

The General Commissioners were of opinion that the payment of £650 was, as a fact, a payment made on account of compensation for loss of office and was not assessable to income-tax, and they allowed the appeal.

The Crown appealed.

Mr. R. P. Hills (with him the Attorney-General, Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) appeared for the appellant.

The respondent was not represented and did not appear.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt said that he was a little embarrassed by the fact that he had only heard arguments on one side, though Mr. Hills, as always, had presented the contentions of the Crown with great fairness. His Lordship thought that the Crown was entitled to succeed. This was a case of a professional footballer who had received what was called a benefit, but it seemed to be a payment, not as the result of direct subscriptions by the public and indirect subscriptions in the form of gate money, but simply a sum given by the club to one of its professionals.

This professional had had one sum of £500, and was then promised another £650 at the end of ten years. At the end of nine years he was transferred and was given the £650 as part of the arrangement. He (his Lordship) had to decide whether income-tax was chargeable under Schedule E on that sum. In Reed v. Seymour, in the House of Lords (43 The Times L.R., 584), there was, in the judgment of Lord Phillimore, one sentence which had to be considered carefully, because the learned Lord said that a sum of money handed by an employer to his employee even during the term of his employment, and even for meritorious services, might be a gift. But the word " might " left open the question whether the payment for long and meritorious service was really remuneration or merely an expression of good will, though the good will was engendered by the service. It must be a question of fact in each case.

There was a very large element of business in this case. The club was a member of the league, and over the league was the association. [His Lordship referred to the rules set out in the case, especially rules 9 and 10 of the league rules.] Before he was transferred the club had given the respondent a written guarantee. The rules contemplated a power to grant benefits, and it must have been regarded as a power which was likely to be exercised if funds permitted. It seemed to him (his Lordship) a businesslike arrangement all through, the payment not only arising out of the player's services, but for his services.

But the General Commissioners had decided in the player's favour on quite a different ground. They had said that it was a payment of compensation for loss of employment. The words authorizing payment "for loyal and meritorious service" were against the respondent on this point; it was still payment for his services. Really, he was not losing his employment at all. He was being transferred by arrangement with the two clubs and was passing out of the employment of one of them, but was not being turned adrift. It was not compensation for loss of employment, like damages for dismissal without notice. He was merely receiving in advance what he would surely have had the next year, and he had earned it as income as much as anything else.

The appeal must be allowed.

BOARD OF TRADE v. CAYZER, IRVINE AND COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Arbitration—Statute of Limitations—Award a condition precedent to an action—Cause of action not arising till after award—Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. I., c. 16), s. 3.

A steamship belonging to the claimants was requisitioned in 1917 on behalf of the Admiralty on the terms of charterparty T.99. Clause 18 provided that the Admiralty should not be liable for ordinary marine risks, and clause 19 that the war risks should be undertaken by the Admiralty. Clause 31 provided for arbitration as follows:—"Any dispute arising under this charter shall be referred, under the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, or any amendment thereof, to the arbitration of two persons, one to be nominated by the owners and the other by the Admiralty, and should such arbitrators be unable to agree, the decision of an umpire whom they must elect shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto, and it is further mutually agreed that such arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action at law." The steamship was sunk by collision in July, 1917, and in November, 1923, the claimants began arbitration proceedings against the Crown in respect of the war risk. The Admiralty set up the defence of the Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. I., c. 16. The arbitrator made his award in 1925 in the form of a special case, finding that the ship was lost in consequence of warlike operations.

Held, that as the words of clause 31 of the charterparty contemplated that an action at law could not be brought until the result of an arbitration had been obtained, no cause of action arose until after the award, and therefore the period of six years, fixed by 21 Jac. I., c. 16, did not begin to run till the making of the award, and no question of the Statute of Limitations arose.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 731; [1927] 1 K.B., 269) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 731; [1927] 1 K.B., 269) reversing an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (42 The Times L.R., 163) upon an award made in the form of a special case.

The question raised by the appeal was whether a claim by the respondents to compensation for the loss of their steamship Clan Maclachlan, which was requisitioned for use on Government service on the terms of a T.99 charterparty was barred by the Statute of Limitations. Charterparty T.99 provided that the owners should be liable for marine risks, but that the Admiralty should be liable for war risks. It contained an arbitration clause whereby it was mutually agreed that the arbitration should be "a condition precedent to the commencement of any action at law."

In July, 1917, the Clan Maclachlan came into collision with the Italian steamship Europa off the Straits of Gibraltar and was sunk.

On August 21, 1917, the respondents gave notice to the Ministry of Shipping that it was possible that the responsibility for the loss would fall to be dealt with as a war risk. On August 24, 1917, the Director of Transport replied that the Ministry admitted no liability at that time. On August 27, 1917, the respondents wrote that as soon as the position had been fully considered they would notify the Ministry if a claim for a war risk was likely to be made.

At that time the boundary line between war and marine risks was a matter of doubt and difficulty, but it had since been defined by a series of decisions in the House of Lords, Britain Steamship Company, Limited v. The King (36 The Times L.R., 791; [1921] 1 A.C., 99); Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service (39 The Times L.R., 133; [1923] A.C., 191); and Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292)—the last of which was not decided until March, 1923. The claim of the respondents here was postponed until the position had been thus clarified. Notwithstanding these decisions of the House of Lords, the appellants, the Board of Trade, who had succeeded the Shipping Controller, still denied liability and, ultimately, on November 29, 1923, the respondents appointed Mr. Claughton Scott their arbitrator, and on the failure of the appellants to appoint an arbitrator he became sole arbitrator.

The appellants, who appeared under protest, contended at the hearing that inasmuch as the arbitration proceedings were not taken within six years after the date of the loss of the ship, the respondents' claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I., c. 16). The arbitrator held that the respondents' claim was not barred by that statute and that the collision was a consequence of warlike operations.

At the hearing before Mr. Justice Rowlatt the sole point taken by the appellants was whether the claim was statute-barred. Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that the Statute of Limitations applied and gave judgment for the appellants.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Mr. Justice Romer), on the contrary, decided that, having regard to the form of submission to arbitration, which made the obtaining of an award a condition precedent to the commencement of any action at law, time did not begin to run until the date of the award and that the respondents' claim was not barred by the statute.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Russell Davies (the Attorney-General, Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C., with them) appeared for the appellants; Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. A. T. James, and Mr. James MacMillan for the respondents.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords: In the month of May, 1917, the Admiralty requisitioned the respondents' steamship Clan Maclachlan upon the terms of the well-known form of charterparty T.99. Under the terms of that document the Admiralty took the risk of loss by warlike operations; and the charterparty contained the following arbitration clause:—

"Clause 31. Any dispute arising under this charter shall be referred, under the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, or any amendment thereof, to the arbitration of two persons, one to be nominated by the owners and the other by the Admiralty, and should such arbitrators be unable to agree, the decision of an umpire whom they must elect shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto, and it is further mutually agreed that such arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action at law."

On July 19, 1917, the Clan Maclachlan, while on a voyage from Cardiff to Malta with a cargo which included coal for His Majesty's ships and dockyards and other naval stores, came into collision with an Italian steamship off the Straits of Gibraltar, and became a total loss. The respondents forthwith gave notice to the Ministry of Shipping that the loss might fall to be dealt with as a war risk; but they did not at once take steps to enforce their claim, as certain cases raising questions as to the meaning of the expression "warlike operations" were then before the Courts. Those cases were finally decided in this House in or before November, 1923; and on November 29, 1923, the respondents appointed Mr. Claughton Scott their arbitrator under clause 31 of the charterparty, to determine the question of the liability of the Crown, and gave notice to the Board of Trade (which had taken the place of the Ministry of Shipping) of that appointment. The Board of Trade made no appointment, and accordingly Mr. Claughton Scott was appointed sole arbitrator.

The arbitrator made his award in the form of a special case raising a number of questions; but the only question which survives for your Lordships' determination to-day is whether the arbitrator should have found that the claim of the respondents was barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I., c. 16) by reason of the fact that the first step in the arbitration, namely, the appointment of the arbitrator, was not taken within six years after the date of the loss of the steamship. That question has been answered by the Court of Appeal in the negative, and the Board of Trade now appeals to this House.

My Lords, I am far from wishing to throw doubt upon the view which has been commonly held, and which was affirmed by the decision of a Divisional Court in the case of In re Astley and Tyldesley Coal Company (15 The Times L.R., 154), that an arbitrator acting under an ordinary submission to arbitration is bound to give effect to all legal defences, including a defence under any statute of limitations. A decision against that view might seriously prejudice the practice o referring disputes to arbitration, and, while I am unwilling to pronounce a final opinion upon a question which does not really arise in this case, I certainly say nothing which is adverse to the view to which I have referred. But this is not the case of an ordinary submission to arbitration, nor is it the case of a dispute arising under the common clause in a contract providing for the submission to arbitration of all disputes arising under the contract. The arbitration clause contained in the charterparty known as T.99 is in a special form, and provides that an arbitration under the clause shall be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action at law. The effect of that condition, as interpreted in Scott v. Avery (5 H.L.C., 811) and other cases, is that, until the arbitrator has performed his duty and has found whether any and what liability exists, or on the making of his award will exist, the claimant cannot even commence to enforce his claim at law, or, in other words, that until an award is made he has no complete cause of action. Mr. Justice Crowder, in advising the House in the case of Scott v. Avery (supra), said that it appeared to him that under the contract in that case, which contained a similar provision, "no cause of action can arise before the sum to be paid is ascertained and settled by the arbitrator." Lord Cranworth, in accepting that view, said that "the right of action should be, not for what a jury should say was the amount of the loss, but for what the persons designated in that particular form of agreement should so say." And Lord Campbell was of opinion that, "upon a just construction of this instrument, until those questions had been determined by the arbitrators no right of action could have accrued to the insured."

My Lords, it appears to me that the decision given in Scott v. Avery (supra) disposes of the present appeal. Under the statute of James, which applies to this case, time runs from the cause of action; and it seems to me to follow beyond question that under the clause which we are considering, and having regard to the case cited, time runs not from the date of the loss of the steamship but only from the making of the award. If this be so, then the arbitrator, however willing he may have been to give effect to all legal defences, could not properly have found that time had run against the claimants.

It is argued that on this view of the law claimants under a document containing an arbitration clause in the Scott v. Avery (supra) form might delay their proceedings indefinitely, and a claim might be made 10 or 20 years after the damage had arisen. This may be so, but if so it is a feature which results from the form of contract which the parties have chosen to adopt; and it may be noted that it is at any time open to either party to expedite a decision of the matter by himself instituting proceedings for arbitration.

I should add, in order to prevent misapprehension, that the question as to the right of the Crown to take advantage of the Statute of Limitations, which was referred to in the Court of Appeal, has not been argued in this House and, on the view which I have taken of the matter, does not arise.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed with costs.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords: The Lord Chancellor has narrated the facts and has quoted the clause on which the question turns. I need not, therefore, either recapitulate or requote.

It has, I think, to be kept steadily in view that the liability which is here in question is not a liability in respect of tort. If a ship were sunk by a collision occasioned by the fault of another ship there is an immediate liability which springs into existence when the collision occurs. But here there was not any liability arising from the collision as against the Government, except the liability that sprang from contract. One goes, therefore, to the contract, and then one finds that there is not undertaken by the Government any liability unless there has been found to be such a liability by the award of an arbitrator. It cannot be more forcibly put than it was by Lord Chancellor Cranworth in Scott v. Avery (5 H.L.C., at p. 848): "If I covenant with A. B. that if I do or omit to do a certain act, then I will pay to him such a sum as J. S. shall award as the amount of damage sustained by him, then, until J. S. has made his award, and I have omitted to pay the sum awarded, my covenant has not been broken and no right of action has arisen"; or again by Lord Herschell, in Caledonian Insurance Company v. Gilmour (9 The Times L.R., 146; [1893] A.C., 85, at p. 90): "Under the policy the only contract on the part of the appellants to make any payment at all is a contract to pay the sum ascertained in a particular manner, viz., by the arbitration provided for by . . . the policy."

The Solicitor-General made a strenuous effort to distinguish the clause in Scott v. Avery (supra) from the present clause. In that I think he was quite unsuccessful. The two clauses are practically the same. The arbitrator in each is to be the judge, both of the existence of the liability and of the sum to be paid if he finds liability established; and it is that sum, and that sum alone, that the Government has contracted to pay.

The question here raised is, What is the application to these facts of the expression "cause of action" in the statute of James? Now Lord Campbell, in Scott v. Avery (supra), said—and it is the sentence of his judgment which Lord Watson quotes in Caledonian Insurance Company v. Gilmour (supra) stating that it is the main reason of judgment: "In this contract it is stipulated, in the most express terms, that until the arbitrators have determined, no action shall lie in any Court whatever. That is not ousting the Courts of their jurisdiction, because they have no jurisdiction whatsoever, and no cause of action accrues until the arbitrators have determined."

The Solicitor-General contended that "cause of action" in this sentence was not the same thing as "cause of action" in the statute of James, but really only meant "right of action," which he would differentiate from "cause of action." Here, again, I think his contention fails. The expression is, I think, deliberately chosen, and it may not be out of place to remark that the same expression is used by two of the consulted Judges whose opinion was upheld—viz., Mr. Justice Crowder and Mr. Justice Coleridge (Scott v. Avery, supra, at pp. 823, 824, 845). "Cause of action" in the statute of James means that which makes action possible; and in the present case that is the award of the arbitrator; for, until it is in being, no action is possible.

It was urged that the claimants might indefinitely postpone moving in the arbitration. This is not likely in fact, for people do not generally indefinitely stand out of money which they conceive to be due to them. But, besides that, there were certainly means available to the defendants to get the arbitration started if the plaintiffs unduly delayed.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right.

LORD ATKINSON.—My Lords: This is an appeal by the Board of Trade, acting in the capacity of Shipping Controller by virtue of the statute 11 and 12 Geo V., c. 8, section 1, and under an Order in Council of March 24, 1921, No. 447, made thereunder, from an order of the Court of Appeal, dated July 19, 1926, which reversed an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, dated December 8, 1925, upon an award dated February 9, 1925, stated in the form of a special case by H. Claughton Scott, Esq., one of His Majesty's counsel.

The question for decision in the appeal is whether, in the circumstances appearing, Messrs. Cayzer, Irvine and Company, Limited, the respondents, at all material dates the owners of a steamship named the Clan Maclachlan, and the claimants in the above-mentioned arbitration, are entitled to recover from the appellants a sum of money to be ascertained as compensation for the loss of the above-mentioned ship.

The facts of the case have already been fully stated. It is unnecessary to re-state them beyond what is required to make my judgment intelligible.

It is not disputed that on May 14, 1917, this vessel was requisitioned for the use of the Government on the terms of a pro forma charterparty marked T.99. No formal charterparty was ever signed, but it is not disputed that the vessel entered the Government service on the terms of this pro forma charterparty and continued to be employed in that service up to the date of her loss. It was provided by this charterparty by clause 18 that the marine risk to which this vessel might, in the Government's service, be exposed should be for the account of the owners, and that risk of war as therein defined or described should be taken by the Admiralty on the ascertained value of the steamer, if she should be totally lost, at the time of such loss, and that should any dispute as to the value of the steamer arise the same should be settled as laid down in clause 31 of the charter.

Clause 31 runs as follows:—

"Any dispute arising under this charter shall be referred, under the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, or any amendment thereof, to the arbitration of two persons, one to be nominated by the owners and the other by the Admiralty, and should such arbitrators be unable to agree, the decision of an umpire whom they must elect shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto, and it is further mutually agreed that such arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action at law."

On July 19, 1917, the steamship Clan Maclachlan came into collision with the Italian steamer Europa off the Straits of Gibraltar, and was sunk, becoming a total loss. The dividing lines between war risks and marine risk were about this period not accurately defined or described. It was only after several cases decided in the House of Lords from 1920 onwards that these dividing lines and these respective risks were with some accuracy defined. At the time of the loss the Clan Maclachlan was insured against marine risks with various underwriters.

No notice of claim was ever made by the owners of this ship to the Ministry of Shipping or other Government Department until August 14, 1923, when the solicitors for the respondent company wrote to the solicitor to the Board of Trade a letter dated August 14, 1923. This letter, after referring to the litigation in the House of Lords in Britain Steamship Company v. The King (36 The Times L.R., 791; [1921] 1 A.C., 99) and other cases of that kind, winds up with this following paragraph: "The result of the decisions is that marine underwriters are entitled to say that this risk falls on the Government as bearing the war risk under T.99 charter. We shall be much obliged if you will kindly look into the matter accordingly and let us know that liability is admitted. Failing an admission of liability, our clients will, of course, proceed with arbitration under the terms of the charter."

The Admiralty did not appoint any arbitrator under the appropriate clause in the Arbitration Act of 1889, and consequently, on December 10, 1923, Mr. Claughton Scott was, under the provisions of the sixth section of the above-mentioned Act, empowered to act as sole arbitrator. The proceedings before him included the liability of the Admiralty to the claim made against them, as well as the quantum of the amount of the claim. The arbitrator, at the request of both parties, consented to make his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court on questions of law, and on February 9, 1925, he made and published his award in the form of a special case. It contained the following recitals amongst others :—

" And whereas the said vessel whilst on such requisitioned service was lost in collision in the month of July 1917 and whereas the claimants allege and the respondents deny that the said vessel was lost by risks of war which were taken by the Admiralty under the terms of the said pro forma charterparty and whereas the said pro forma charterparty T.99 provides that any dispute under the charter shall be referred under the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to the arbitration of two persons one to be nominated by the owners and the other by the Admiralty and whereas certain disputes and differences have in consequence arisen between the claimants and the respondents as in the following case are more particularly mentioned and described and whereas the claimants allege and the respondents deny that the said arbitration clause in the said pro forma charterparty amounts to a valid submission of the said disputes and differences to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the said clause." The following are in it stated to have been the contentions put forward before the arbitrator by the Board of Trade :—

" 19. It was contended before me on behalf of the respondents—

" (a) That there was no submission to arbitration within the meaning of the Arbitration Act, 1889, inasmuch as (according to the respondents' contention) there was no written agreement to submit present or future differences to arbitration.

" (b) That assuming that there was a valid submission to arbitration, any right which the claimants might have had to proceed by way of arbitration was taken away by the provisions of the Indemnity Act, 1920.

" (c) That proceedings in the arbitration were not taken within six years after the date of the loss of the said steamship, and that by reason thereof the claimants' claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I., c. 16).

" (d) That at the time of her loss the Clan Maclachlan was not engaged upon any warlike operation.

" (e) That both vessels were to blame for the said collision, and that in consequence thereof it could not be held that the said collision was a consequence of warlike operations within clause 19 of the said pro forma charterparty.

" (f) That the payments made by the marine underwriters and the conduct of the said underwriters and the claimants with regard to the said proceedings against the owners of the steamship Europa constituted a good defence to the claimants' claim upon the facts found by me in clauses 1 to 17 hereof inclusive."

The following are the arbitrator's actual findings :—

" In so far as it is a question of fact, I find, and in so far as it is a question of law and subject to the opinion of the Court, I hold and declare :—

" (19) (a) That there was a valid submission to arbitration within the meaning of the Arbitration Act, 1889 ; and that I had jurisdiction in the matters referred to me.

" (b) That the claimants' right to proceed by way of arbitration under the said submission has not been taken away by the provisions of the Indemnity Act, 1920.

" (c) That the claimants' claim was not barred by the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I., c. 16) by reason of the fact that these proceedings were not taken within six years after the date of the loss of the said steamship.

" (d) That at the time of the said loss Malta was a war base and the Clan Maclachlan was engaged in a warlike operation within the meaning of clause 19 of the said pro forma charterparty, namely, in carrying war stores to a war base.

" (e) That the said collision was a consequence of warlike operations within the meaning of the said clause 19.

" (f) That neither the payments made by the marine underwriters nor the conduct of the said underwriters or of the claimants with regard to the proceedings against the owners of the steamship Europa and the settlement thereof constitute any defence to the claimants' claim.

" (g) That the claimants are entitled to an award in their favour in these proceedings against the respondents under clause 19 of the said pro forma charterparty.

" The question for the opinion of the Court is whether in respect of the contentions mentioned in paragraph 19 hereof I have come to a right determination in point of law.

" If the Court should be of opinion that I have come to a right determination in point of law in respect of each of the said contentions, then my award shall stand and I direct that the respondents shall pay to the claimants the costs of this my award and their costs of the reference to be taxed if not agreed.

" If the Court should be of opinion that I have come to a wrong determination in point of law as to the validity of the submission or as to my jurisdiction, then I award that the respondents are under no liability in these proceedings and I direct that the claimants shall pay to the respondents the costs of this my award and their costs of the reference to be taxed if not agreed."

The important question at once arises what would be the effect of clause 31 of the charterparty on any action at law which might be brought by the owner of the Clan Maclachlan, based on the pro forma charter T. 99, to recover damages from the Board of Admiralty or its successors, in this matter the Board of Trade, for the loss of their ship. In my view, if the case of Scott v. Avery (5 H.L.C., 811) was rightly decided—as it has been many times held to have been, and that by the most distinguished Judges—such an action would not be maintainable until the condition precedent, i.e., the holding of the arbitration, had been performed, if even then. It is necessary, however, to examine closely the language used by the noble Lords in the House of Lords who delivered judgment in that case, in order to appreciate the meaning and reach of the words they used. The head-note states with sufficient fullness and accuracy what were the points raised and the decision upon them. The action was brought upon a policy of insurance to recover damage for the loss of a ship. One of the conditions of the policy was that the sum to be paid to any insurer for the loss should in the first instance be ascertained by the committee, but if any difference should arise between the insurer and the committee relative to the settling of any loss, or to a claim for average or any other matter relating to the insurance, the difference was to be referred to arbitration in the way pointed out in the condition. Then comes the vital provision, namely, that " no insurer who refuses to accept the amount settled by the committee shall be entitled to maintain any action at law or suit in equity on his policy until the matter has been decided by the arbitrators, and then only for such sum as the arbitrators shall award, and the obtaining of the decision of the arbitrators was declared to be a condition precedent to the maintaining of any action. It was held that these conditions were lawful, and that even should the difference relate to other matters than those of mere amount, no action was maintainable till the award was made. From the fifth and sixth pleas filed by the defendants it is obvious that the matter to be referred to arbitration was not merely the quantum of the damages. The Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, in giving judgment, at page 849, said :—

" It appears to me perfectly clear that the language used indicates this to have been their intention, that, supposing there was a difference between the person who had suffered loss or damage and the committee as to what amount he should recover, that was to be ascertained in a particular mode, and that until that mode had been adopted and the amount ascertained according to that mode, no right of action should exist. In other words, that the right of action should be, not for what a jury should say was the amount of the loss, but for what the persons designated in that particular form of agreement should so say. . . . It appears to me perfectly clear, that until the award was made, no right of action accrued."

Lord Campbell, at page 851, said : " In the first place, I think that the contract between the shipowner and the underwriters in this case is as clear as the English language could make it, that no action should be brought against the insurers until the arbitrators had disposed of any dispute that might arise between them. It is declared to be a condition precedent to the bringing of any action. There is no doubt that such was the intention of the parties ; and, upon a deliberate view of the policy, I am of opinion, that it embraced not only the assessment of damage, the contemplation of quantum, but also any dispute that might arise between the underwriters and the insured respecting the liability of the insurers as well as the amount to be paid. If there had been any question about want of seaworthiness, or deviation, or breach of blockade, I am clearly of opinion that, upon a just construction of this instrument, until those questions had been determined by the arbitrators, no right of action could have accrued to the insured. That being the intention of the parties, about which I believe there is no dispute, is the contract illegal ? There is an express undertaking that no action shall be brought until the arbitrators have decided, and there is abundant consideration for that in the mutual contract into which the parties have entered ; therefore, unless there is some illegality in the contract, the Courts are bound to give it effect. There is no statute against such a contract : then on what ground is it to be declared illegal ? '

He then ridicules the notion that it is void as against public policy, and at the bottom of page 854, after referring to Thompson v. Charnock (8 Term Rep., 139), he says : " There is no case that goes the length of saying, that where the contract is as it is here, that no right of action shall accrue until there has been an arbitration ; then an action may be brought, although there has been no arbitration. Now in this contract of insurance it is stipulated, in the most express terms, that until the arbitrators have determined, no action shall lie in any Court whatsoever. That is not ousting the Courts of their jurisdiction, because they have no jurisdiction whatsoever and no cause of action accrues until the arbitrators have determined. Therefore, without overturning the case of Thompson v. Charnock (supra) and the other cases to the same effect, your Lordships may hold that, in this case, where it is expressly, directly, and unequivocally agreed upon between the parties that there shall be no right of action whatever till the arbitrators have decided, it is a bar to the action that there has been no such arbitration."

This judgment of Lord Campbell's has been many times approved of. In Caledonian Insurance Company v. Gilmour (9 The Times L.R., 146 ; [1893] A.C., 85) the action out of which the appeal in that case arose, was brought by Gilmour, the respondent, against the appellant company to recover on a policy against loss by fire of a sum of £1,700, or the amount that he might prove to be payable to him by the company as insurers. The policy had a condition endorsed upon it in these words : " Where the company does not claim to avoid its liability under the policy, on the ground of fraud or non-fulfilment of any of the conditions hereinbefore set forth, but a difference at any time arises between the company and the insured, or any claimant under this policy, as to the amount payable in respect of any alleged loss or damage by fire, every such difference, when and as the same arises, shall be referred to the arbitration of one person to be chosen by both parties or of two independent persons . . . who should choose an umpire. And it is hereby expressly declared to be a condition of the making of this policy, and part of the contract between the company and the insured, that where the company does not claim to avoid its liability under the policy on the ground of fraud or non-fulfilment, as aforesaid, the party insured or claimant shall not be entitled to commence or maintain any action at law or suit in equity on this policy till the amount due to the insured shall have been awarded as hereinbefore provided, and then only for the sum so awarded, and the obtaining of such award shall be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action or suit upon the policy." A point was made by the insured, that as the arbitrators were not named in the clause referring to arbitration, it was void. This point was held to be irrelevant to the suit. It was held by the House that the condition as to ascertaining the amount of the damage by arbitration was incorporated into, and formed an integral part of, the contract of indemnity, and was a condition precedent to the bringing of an action upon the policy, and secondly that the contract, being one upon which no cause of action accrued until the amount of damage had been determined by arbitration, was excepted from the rule of Scotch law that a reference to arbitrators not named could not be enforced.

The case of Scott v. Avery (supra) was followed. Lord Herschell, in delivering judgment, said (page 90): "I may add that the reasoning of the noble and learned Lords who took part in the decision of Scott v. Avery (supra) appears to me completely applicable to the present case. Its cogency is not affected by any of the distinctions which then existed between the law of England and that of Scotland in relation to arbitration clauses."

Lord Watson, in delivering his judgment, referred at length (page 96) to Scott v. Avery (supra). He pointed out that it was held by the House affirming the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, that until an award was made no action was maintainable, and quoted apparently with approval the passage from Lord Campbell's judgment at pages 851 and 854 of the report which I have already quoted.

In the cases of Trainor v. Phœnix Fire Insurance Company (8 The Times L.R., 37) and Scott v. Mercantile Accident and Guarantee Insurance Company (66 L.T., 811), the decision in Scott v. Avery (supra), was followed and approved of. In Spurrier v. La Cloche (18 The Times L.R., 606; [1902] A.C., 446) the respondent sued the appellants, as agents in Jersey of the Sun Fire Office, to recover a sum of £1,000 insured by a fire policy dated January 4, 1897, effected by the respondent on his collection of foreign stamps. The appellants pleaded that the policy was made subject to a condition (No. 12) in which it was expressly agreed and declared to be a condition precedent to the liability of the company that the claimant should have no right of action against it except for the amount of the claim, if admitted, or the amount of any award of the arbitrator or arbitrators or umpire, and that the respondent had appointed one arbitrator and the company another, that the arbitrators had not agreed upon an umpire, and that the condition had not been fulfilled, and the appellants prayed that the action might be dismissed. The respondent pleaded that this condition was contrary to the law of Jersey, and of no force or effect. The Committee of the Privy Council which heard the case was composed of Lords Macnaghten, Davey, Robertson and Lindley, and Sir Ford North. Lord Lindley delivered the judgment of the Board. At page 450 of the report he said: "It follows from these observations that no action could be sustained in Jersey any more than in this country for any money payable under the policy unless and until the amount so payable had been settled by arbitration pursuant to the 12th condition: See Scott v. Avery (supra) and Caledonian Insurance Company v. Gilmour (supra). The contract is one on which no cause of action could accrue until the amount to be paid had been determined by arbitration, and by arbitration as provided by the contract. Mr. Deans contended that the arbitration clause was invalid by the law of Jersey, because not only the amount payable, but also the liability to pay was to be decided by arbitration; and that this was an illegal attempt to oust the jurisdiction of the Court, and went further than Scott v. Avery (supra). But if a contract is so framed as to give no cause of action unless a certain condition is performed, no question arises as to ousting the jurisdiction of any Court. It was by not observing the difference between no cause of action and a defence which assumes a cause of action, but is based on the incompetence of a particular Court to enforce it, that the Court of Exchequer went wrong in Scott v. Avery (supra). The oversight was pointed out and corrected in the Exchequer Chamber, and again in the House of Lords."

I think clause 31 of T.99 brings this case within the authority of Scott v. Avery (supra) and the cases which followed it. I think the condition in its last three lines is as effectual for that purpose as are the more lengthy provisions upon the subject to be found in these authorities. Moreover, I am unable to see how a provision to the effect that an arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action does not as effectually secure that no action at law can be brought on the matters referred until this arbitration has been held as any of the lengthy conditions found in the authorities I have cited.

With regard to the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. I., c. 16), it has no application, I think, to actions or suits which, by the contracts of the parties to them, are placed in such a position that they cannot be commenced, begun, or enforced. The whole purpose of this Limitation Act as to persons who have good causes of action which they could, if so disposed, enforce, is to deprive them of the power of enforcing them after they have lain by for the number of years respectively and omitted to enforce them. They are thus deprived of the remedy which they have omitted to use. I think it is obvious that the Act cannot apply to a cause of action which the person entitled to it cannot, because of his own contract, enforce against anyone.

I think the appeal fails, and should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Phillimore.—My Lords: When an action in progress is referred to arbitrators for disposal, and no special directions are given limiting or conditioning the functions of the arbitrators, as, for instance, directing them, as I have known it happen, to take account of moral or social considerations, the arbitrators must decide the case as a Judge would, or as an official referee would, and give effect to all legal defences such as the Statute of Limitations.

But when there is no action in progress, and the parties agree to refer their disputes to arbitration, it will depend upon the terms of the agreement to refer, or the submission to arbitration, whichever phrase you use, whether the arbitrators are in deciding to give effect to this class of legal defence or not.

It may be, as the Judges thought in the case of In re Astley and Tyldesley Coal Company (15 The Times L.R., 154), that in the absence of special direction it is to be inferred that the parties intended the arbitrators to do precisely what a Judge would.

It is not necessary, in my view, to decide whether this is so, but for the purpose of the present case I can assume it. I can assume it, because the clause in this charterparty which provides for the submission of disputes arising under it is not, in my judgment, such a submission to arbitration.

I cannot better express my view than by adopting the language of Mr. Justice Cresswell when advising this House in Scott v. Avery (5 H.L.C., 811) and calling this reference one which makes the arbitration "ancillary to an action or suit."

The arbitration is not to take the place of an action at law, but is a necessary step towards an action at law.

It is true that an award in such an arbitration may decide all questions in dispute concerning the rights of the parties, so that nothing be left but an action to enforce it to which action there can be no defence, or that without action an order of the Court may be obtained for enforcing the award.

But it is also true that the award of the arbitrators may not completely determine the rights, let alone the remedies, of the parties.

Your Lordships are dealing with a common form of charterparty in use by the Admiralty. It may happen not infrequently that some clause may be varied by the parties by express agreement, and it may well be that the dispute will take this form. First of all, was the shipowner bound to do so and so without extra remuneration under the terms of the charterparty; and secondly, if he was so bound, was there a subsequent agreement of some particular date which released him from his obligation or varied it?

Questions of release or set-off would be outside the jurisdiction of the arbitrators. I doubt whether any adjudication on figures other than such as would be derived from pure calculation would be within the province of the arbitrators.

For the purposes of this case, I should introduce another consideration. The authority of the arbitrators extends to deciding upon questions of right and not upon questions of remedy. If there is any question of the latter class, it is to be raised and decided in the subsequent and consequential action at law.

So far as this matter came under consideration in the great case of Scott v. Avery (supra), the language of the learned and noble Lords who decided that case is to this effect.

The Lord Chancellor speaks "of no right of action accruing," until after the award. Lord Campbell says "no cause of action accrues until the arbitrators have determined."

The same point is very clearly expounded in Caledonian Insurance Company v. Gilmour (9 The Times L.R., 146; [1893] A.C., 85)—see especially per Lord Field at p. 102.

But if this be so there is no action or suit to which the Statute of Limitations can apply until the arbitrator has found in favour of the claimant.

These are sufficient grounds for holding that the appeal by the Board of Trade fails, but the matter may—as it was put in the course of the argument—be put in another way equally fatal to the appeal.

Assuming that the arbitrator is to consider remedy as well as right and to give effect to legal defences, and that he does, as indeed the arbitrator did in this case, take into account the Statute of Limitations. He would ask himself whether a cause of action accrued to the claimants more than six years ago, and he would have to answer in the language of Scott v. Avery (supra), "No." A claim which might have ripened into a cause of action did accrue; but it cannot ripen till after his decision.

One word more. It is said that this construction of the clause in the charterparty would enable a shipowner to bring, after many years' delay, the stalest of claims. To this there are other answers, but one is sufficient. It would be easy to amend the form of charterparty and introduce a clause such as one finds in a number of similar commercial instruments, making it incumbent upon a claimant to make his claim in writing within some brief defined period after the occurrence of the event which gives rise to the claim.

I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD CARSON.—My Lords, I agree and I am unable to add anything to what has been already said by the noble Viscount on the Woolsack.

RICHARDSON v. RICHARDSON AND THE NATIONAL BANK OF INDIA, LIMITED.*

Bankers — Garnishee order — Bank balance of debtor in foreign branch of English bank — Banker's duty to customer — Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XLV., r. 1.

Money held by an English bank to the credit of a judgment debtor at a foreign branch cannot be made the subject of a garnishee order by an English Court, as such money is not recoverable within the jurisdiction.

A decree nisi of dissolution of marriage was granted on November 15, 1925, to Mrs. Mary Sidey Richardson, and the respondent, Edward George Richardson, was condemned in the costs, taxed at £182 10s. 2d. Orders for the payment of this amount were served on the respondent, but were not complied with, and the wife became a judgment creditor in respect of this sum. On March 9, 1927, a garnishee order absolute was made by the learned Registrar in respect of the sum of £12 2s. 1d. admitted by the bank to be held to the husband's credit in their head office in London. In affidavits filed in the garnishee proceedings it was stated that the judgment debtor had a considerable amount to his credit at either one or both of the bank's branches at Dar-es-Salaam (Tanganyika) and Mombasa (Kenya Colony). The bank maintained that the head office had no knowledge of such accounts. If there were any such moneys they were foreign currency, namely, shillings of Kenya Colony or Tanganyika, and only payable in such currency at the branches of the bank where the accounts were open and not elsewhere. No sterling accounts were kept there, and any payment by the London office to the judgment creditor would still leave their branches at Mombasa or Dar-es-Salaam liable for any action brought by the judgment creditor in the local courts. The Registrar did not make subject to the garnishee order any sums to the credit of the judgment debtor at the bank's branches in Africa.

The judgment creditor appealed on summons from the Registrar's order to the Judge in Chambers, who adjourned the summons for argument in Court.

MR. ROBERT FORTUNE, for the judgment creditor, submitted that for this purpose a banking company registered in London and its foreign branches were one and the same legal entity, and if it did not pay on a garnishee order in respect of moneys held in foreign branches to the credit of the judgment debtor it could be sued.

SIR ROBERT ASKE, for the bank, submitted that if this argument were right a bank receiving a garnishee order would be obliged to telegraph notice of it to all its foreign branches. In effect the debt, in so far as the credits in Africa were concerned, was a foreign debt payable in a foreign country, but the judgment creditor had her remedy. The judgment could be registered under the Kenya ordinance and she could then proceed to execution in that colony.

MR. JUSTICE HILL delivered a written judgment as follows:—

The petitioner wife is a judgment creditor of the respondent husband for costs amounting to

* Reported by WILLIAM LATEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£182 10s. 2d. On January 28, 1927, the judgment creditor obtained a garnishee order nisi directed to the National Bank of India, Limited. The Bank appeared to the summons. The Bank is a company registered in England. Its head office is in London. It has branches at many places abroad, including Mombasa in Kenya Colony, and Dar-es-Salaam in the Tanganyika mandated territory. The judgment debtor was formerly employed in Mombasa, and in January, 1927, was employed in Dar-es-Salaam. The affidavit in support of the garnishee proceedings deposed to a belief that the judgment debtor had an account with the bank at Mombasa or at Dar-es-Salaam. A copy produced by the bank of the judgment debtor's account at the head office in London showed transfers in 1926 from his account at Mombasa to his account at London and showed a credit balance of £12 2s. 1d. on the London account. The bank does not dispute that that amount is subject to the garnishee order.

The judgment creditor, however, seeks to make subject to the garnishee order any amounts to the credit of the judgment debtor at the branches in Africa on January 28, 1927. As to that the bank, by the affidavit of its London sub-manager, says that the head office does not know whether the judgment debtor had in January, 1927, an account at either of the branches. The bank takes up the position that if there are any moneys to his credit at either branch, they cannot be made the subject of a garnishee order here, and that, even if they could, they ought not to be made the subject of a garnishee order here because payment under the order here would not be a good discharge in the Courts of Kenya Colony or Tanganyika. The bank further says that any account at the African branches is kept in a foreign currency, namely, Kenya or Tanganyika shillings, which is a different currency from the English currency.

The questions so raised, especially the first, are obviously of great and general importance to banks with foreign branches. I have come to the conclusion that the bank is in the right. For the purposes of the judgment, I assume that on January 28, 1927, there were moneys to the credit of the judgment debtor at one of the African branches. Certain contractual obligations of a bank and its customers, in the absence of special agreement, are well ascertained. They include these implied terms as stated by Lord Justice Atkin in Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corporation (37 The Times L.R., 534 ; [1921] 3 K.B., 100, at p. 127), two of which are : (1) the promise of the bank to repay is to repay at the branch of the bank where the account is kept, and (2) the bank is not liable to pay until payment is demanded at the branch at which the account is kept. The Court was there dealing with a current account, and the actual decision was that, in the absence of a special agreement, a demand by the customer is a necessary ingredient in the cause of action against the banker for money lent.

The same principle underlies the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Rex v. Lovitt and Others (28 The Times L.R., 41 ; [1912] A.C., 212), which related to a deposit account at the New Brunswick branch of the Bank of British North America. The judgment refers to older cases and says :—

"In each of these cases the Courts, having regard to the necessary course of business between the parties, held that the bank had in some measure localized its obligation to its customer or creditor, so as to confine it, primarily at all events, to a particular branch. The present case comes well within the principles thus laid down, and their Lordships are of opinion that these debts were 'property situate within the province' of New Brunswick."

In another part of the judgment are these words, which are in point :—

"According to the defendant's contention the bank in London might be called on at any time by a person of whom it would probably know nothing, and with only a very limited time in which to obtain the detailed information that would be necessary from the St. John's branch, to pay $90,351 in London without any deduction for cost of transmission or any agreement as to the rate of exchange. No such obligation appears by express words or necessary implication in the contract of the parties, and it is very improbable that it was ever contemplated or intended by them. It is true that the money was to be 'accounted for by the Bank of British North America,' but when the circumstances are considered it is seen that those words mean only that the bank is to account for the money as being money payable by them or their agents at St. John. Thus, if the manager of the St. John's branch refused payment, or if the branch itself were closed, the bank in London would, of course, be liable as a principal, but that fact does not affect the locality of the debt as originally fixed by the parties."

So in Republica de Guatemala v. Nunez (43 The Times L.R., 187 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 669, at p. 687) Lord Justice Scrutton speaks of a person who "deposited in an English bank in England a sum of money, thus creating a debt due by an English debtor, which must be demanded in England," and as to current account, in Clare and Co. v. Dresdner Bank (31 The Times L.R., 278 ; [1915] 2 K.B., 576) Mr. Justice Rowlatt said : "There is no obligation on a bank to pay in one country a debt due to a customer on current account in another country."

It will be noted that in Rex v. Lovitt and Others (supra) the words are "primarily at all events." If a demand is made at the branch where the account is kept and payment is refused, the position is altered. Undoubtedly the bank is then liable to be sued wherever it can be served. Thus in Leader and Others v. Direction der Disconto-Gesellschaft (31 The Times L.R., 83), referred to in Clare and Co. v. Dresdner Bank (supra), a demand having been made at Berlin, where the account was kept, and having been refused, and a writ having been properly served on a branch in England, judgment was given against the bank in England under Order XIV., the claim being treated as for a liquidated demand. It may perhaps be asked whether the cause of action in such a case is for damages for breach of contract to pay at the branch or for money lent. I have not found any case in which that point was discussed. No doubt the bank in such a case is liable in damages but it may be that, having itself, by its branch, refused to repay notwithstanding the fulfilment of the condition which was implied in the contract for its benefit, it becomes unconditionally liable to repay. Be that as it may, the bank is not liable anywhere until the demand is made at the branch where the account is kept.

A further difficulty, on the question whether the liability in this country is in damages or in debt, arises when the bank is sued here and the account is kept at the branch abroad in a foreign currency. The questions arising upon a liability, to pay in a foreign currency, enforced in the Courts here had not at the time of Leader and Others v. Direction der Disconto-Gesellschaft (supra) received that full consideration which it has since received in Di Ferdinando v. Simon, Smits and Co. (36 The Times L.R., 797 ; [1920] 3 K.B., 409), and recently in Lloyd Royal Belge v. L. Dreyfus and Co. (27 Ll. L., 288). The Court of Appeal has made it clear that the cause of action upon refusal to pay in a foreign currency is damages and not debt.

These considerations lead to the following conclusions in the present case as between the bank and the debtor : (1) that previously the bank was liable to pay only at the African branch, (2) that upon demand at, and refusal by, the African branch the bank could be sued here, but that, the breach having been a refusal to pay in a foreign currency, the cause of action here could only be for damages ; the bank could not be sued here for money lent.

It has occurred to me to consider whether the obligation of the bank could be put in another way. It is the practice of banks at the request of a customer to transfer amounts to the credit of the customer from one account to another. And perhaps it is an implied term of the contract that the bank shall at the request of the customer make such transfer at the expense of the customer and, if a conversion from one currency to another is necessary, at the rate of exchange ruling at the time of the transfer. This would get over the difficulty about the difference of currency. But, even if such a term is to be implied, and the request to transfer can be made to the head office and not to the branch where the account is kept, it seems to me that the cause of action must be for damages for refusal to transfer, and that a refusal to transfer at request would not make the money recoverable as money lent elsewhere than at the branch where the account is kept.

Such being the position as between the judgment debtor and the bank, I have to consider whether Order XLV., r. 1, applies. The bank is no doubt indebted to the judgment debtor and the bank is within the jurisdiction. The order deals with the case where "any other person is indebted to such debtor and is within the jurisdiction." But both upon principle and upon authority, that means, "is indebted within the jurisdiction and is within the jurisdiction." The debt must be properly recoverable within the jurisdiction. In principle, attachment of debts is a form of execution, and the general power of execution extends only to property within the jurisdiction of the Court which orders it. A debt is not property within the jurisdiction if it cannot be recovered here (on the authority of the case of Martin v. Nadel (22 The Times L.R., 561 ; [1906] 2 K.B., 26), as explained by Swiss Bank Corporation v. Böhmische Industrial Bank (39 The Times L.R., 179 ; [1923] 1 K.B., 673)). The decision and judgment in that case show that the order does not apply unless the debt is properly recoverable within the jurisdiction. In the latter case the customer's account was in London. Of it Lord Justice Scrutton said : "It is a sum held by a banker, who is resident in this country, for his customer and not payable until it is demanded in this country. In my view that is a debt arising in this country and situate in this country." In Martin v. Nadel (supra) deposit had been made in Berlin, and of it Lord Justice Scrutton said : "That debt was not in London ; it was in Berlin. Nadel having deposited the £500 with the branch in Berlin could not without more have made good a claim to be paid . . . by the London branch. Before he could do anything, he must make his claim on the Berlin branch who had the money, not on the London branch who had not."

In Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corporation (supra) the Court of Appeal said that the service of a garnishee order nisi was a sufficient demand. But the Court had not to consider whether the service of an order nisi on the London branch would be a sufficient demand for repayment by a branch abroad. I do not see how it could be so regarded, and when the branch at which the account is kept is abroad the order nisi cannot be served there.

In the result, I am of opinion that, in respect of moneys held by the bank to the credit of the judgment debtor at the African branches, they cannot be made the subject of a garnishee order, for they are not a debt recoverable within the jurisdiction. I add this : If the judgment creditor is right, then upon service of the order nisi the bank became custodian for the Court of the whole of the funds attached, i.e., of all amounts to the credit of the judgment debtor at all the branches of the bank, and could not except at its peril part with any of the funds in any part of the world (Rogers v. Whiteley, 8 The Times L.R., 418 ; [1892] A.C., 118), and the burden upon the bank cannot be to communicate with all its branches in all parts of the world.

If I am wrong in the view I have taken the question will still remain whether the order nisi ought to be made absolute. It ought not, if payment under it will not be a good discharge in the Courts of Kenya Colony and Tanganyika. Mr. Lawrence Tooth (an expert on the laws of those countries) is clearly of opinion that it will not be a good discharge. It is suggested by Mr. Herbert Bown (formerly Crown counsel in Kenya) that if the order were registered in Kenya under the Judgments Extension Ordinance of that colony, payments under it by the Kenya (or Tanganyika) branch would also be a good discharge. It does not, however, seem clear that the bank could register the order, and the judgment creditor, if she gets the order here, will enforce a payment here and will not go to the trouble of registering and enforcing the order abroad. In this state of the law abroad it would not be equitable to make the order.

It is satisfactory to learn from the affidavits that the judgment creditor is not without a remedy. She can register in Kenya and Tanganyika the order of this Court for £182 10s. 2d. and then enforce it there by execution. The appeal is dismissed, with costs.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Atkin, and Lawrence, L.JJ.) 1927. May 31.

R. F. BROWN AND CO., LIMITED v. T. AND J. HARRISON.*

Contract—Carriage by sea—Responsibility of carrier—Fault of his agents or servants—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22), Schedule, Art. IV., r. 2 (q).

By Art. IV., rule 2, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from—(a) Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship. . . . (q) Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage."

The plaintiffs shipped a case of cotton goods on the defendants' steamer at Liverpool for carriage to Tampico and delivery there. Without the fault or privity of the defendants, and in spite of the vigilance of the ship's officers, the goods were stolen by the servants of the stevedores, who were employed by the ship's agents to discharge the cargo at Vera Cruz, where the ship called before going to Tampico. In an action for non-delivery,

Held, that the stealing of the cargo was not an act in the management of the ship, and therefore the defendants were not protected by rule 2 (a); and that in rule 2 (q) the words "or without" must be read as "and without," and therefore, although the defendants themselves were free from blame, yet, since the servants of the stevedores were the defendants' agents, and since the defendants, in order to succeed, had to prove that both they themselves and their servants or agents were free from blame, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

Decision of MacKinnon, J. (43 The Times L.R., 394), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon (43 The Times L.R., 394) in an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for the non-delivery by the defendants of goods consigned from Liverpool to Mexican ports on a steamship managed by the defendants.

The same points were raised in another appeal, and the appeals were heard together.

In January, 1925, the plaintiffs, Messrs. R. F. Brown and Company, Limited, shipped a case of cotton goods at Liverpool on the defendants' steamer Spectator under a bill of lading dated January 15, 1925, issued by the defendants and acknowledging the receipt of the goods in good order and condition and agreeing to carry them to Tampico, Mexico, and there deliver them. When delivered the case was found to have been broken into and the goods had disappeared. Alternatively, the plaintiffs said that the defendants had received the goods to carry them for reward and had negligently lost them.

The facts in the other case were similar.

The defendants put in a general denial and pleaded, further, that the goods, if lost in fact, were lost owing to theft and/or pilferage on the part of Mexican labourers at Tampico without the fault, privity, or neglect of the defendants, their servants or agents, and that the loss was, therefore, covered by an exceptions clause in the bill of lading which relieved the defendants from liability for "loss . . . caused by or arising from . . . robbers, thieves of whatever kind, whether on land or afloat or in the service of the carriers or not."

The defendants also pleaded that they were not liable because the plaintiffs had not given notice in writing of the loss as required by Article III., rule 6, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924. They also relied on the provisions of Article IV., rule 2 (a) to (q), of that Schedule.

By Article IV., rule 2:—

"Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from—(a) Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship. . . .

"(q) Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage."

Mr. Justice MacKinnon found that the goods were stolen by the servants of the stevedores who were employed by the ship's agents to discharge the cargo at Vera Cruz, where the ship called before going to Tampico; and he held that the shipowners were not protected by the exceptions in Article IV., rule 2 (a) and (q), and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Mr. Procter appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Miller, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske for the respondents.

The Court did not call on counsel for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is an appeal—or rather there are two appeals—from a judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon, and they undoubtedly raise a matter of great importance to the shipping community under existing conditions.

The matter arises in this way. The dispute in each case is between a bill of lading holder and shipowners. The bill of lading holder is complaining of the loss of certain goods during a voyage. The fact, as proved before the learned Judge, was that in the case of both vessels goods had been consigned by the bill of lading holder from this country to ports in Mexico, and at one port the cargo, or portions of the cargo, had been stolen by the men employed by the stevedores in the discharge of the goods, and the shipowners contended that under the terms of the bills of lading they were exempt from liability. The bills of lading incorporated the articles contained in the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and the question which the learned Judge had to decide was whether or not the theft of these goods by the servants of the stevedores employed by the ship in the discharge of the cargo came within the exceptions contained in Article IV. of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, so as to exonerate the shipowners from liability.

Mr. Clement Davies, who has brought to our attention every point which could be raised, has relied on three points. He has said, first of all, that the loss of these goods occurred in the management of the ship. That was his first point. His second point was, that upon the true construction of paragraph (q) of Rule 2 of Article IV. of the Schedule to the Act of 1924, inasmuch as the loss of these goods occurred without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, he came within the exception contained in paragraph (q). His third point was that even assuming that he was wrong on the first two points, in this particular case, the theft having been by the servants of the stevedores employed by the shipowners to carry out the discharge, the servants acting in that capacity were not his agents within the meaning of the article. Every one of these points is of course of extreme importance nowadays, because shipowners are bound by the terms of these articles and cannot contract themselves out of the obligations imposed upon them by the statute.

The first material article which we have to consider is Article III., rule 2, which imposes a statutory obligation upon the shipowner in reference to the carriage of the goods—and when I say "the carriage of the goods" I include, what the second rule includes, not only the carriage, but the loading, handling, stowing, carrying, keeping, caring for, and discharge of the goods carried.

In construing these articles which form part of the statute, I think one must begin by realizing that here the Legislature has imposed this distinct statutory obligation in reference to the goods which the carrier undertakes to carry. The statute then proceeds to set up what under former practice would have been the exceptions agreed upon between the parties, and these are the exceptions cutting down the statutory obligation which is imposed by rule 2 of Article III. The first of these, which is in Article IV., rule 2, paragraph (a), is the one in reference to which the main and most important point raised in this argument arises. The material words are these: "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from—(a) Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship"; and the first question raised which the learned Judge had to decide, and which we have to decide, is what is included in these words "management of the ship." Can it be said that the act of these stevedores' servants in raiding the cargo and stealing these goods, within the meaning of this paragraph, is an act which occurred in the management of the ship? Mr. Justice MacKinnon has said that it cannot, and I agree with him, whether you consider the question upon the language of the statute by itself, or whether you consider the language in reference to the decisions to which we have been referred and of which there are a number, not only decisions of this Court, but one decision in particular in the Supreme Court of the United States. Speaking first of all in reference to the language of this statute itself, I think that, as an ordinary rule of construction of this language, when you find in the first place the Legislature imposing this particular statutory duty upon the shipowner in reference, amongst other things, to the discharge of the goods carried, and when it comes to enumerate the exceptions there is no exception dealing specifically with the goods, but there is an exception dealing with the ship and the management of the ship as it may affect the goods, then in order to bring any particular matter within the exception it must be something which can be said to be in the management of the ship. Therefore I should say, apart altogether from authority, that if all that the shipowners can prove is an act which has relation to the goods, and the goods alone, and has no relation to the ship itself, an act which is independent of the ship itself—namely, the taking of the goods out of the ship and discharging them from the ship, it does not come within the exception.

Now, so far as the authorities are concerned, I should like to begin with the test which Lord Justice Bowen, I notice, laid down in the case of Canada Shipping Company v. British Shipowners' Mutual Protection Association (5 The Times L.R., 700; 23 Q.B.D., 342). There the question was whether the act in question could be said to come within the expression "improper navigation," and Lord Justice Bowen addresses himself to the point in this way. He says (23 Q.B.D., at p. 344): "The question is whether the damage in this case was caused by 'improper navigation,' and depends on the meaning of that expression. I should have thought it clear that 'damage caused by improper navigation' was equivalent to damage caused by navigation of an improper kind, and consequently that damage, caused by something which was not navigation at all, was not caused by improper navigation." I should like to apply these words to the point that we have to decide, and to apply them to "management of the ship" instead of "navigation of the ship"; and I ask myself: Can it properly be said that this particular damage was caused by mismanagement of the ship? My answer is, No, because it was not management of the ship at all. Now, is there any support for that view, that this particular act of these men cannot be said to come within the term "management of the ship"? I think the more one looks into the authorities the more authority one finds for the proposition that such an act as this, a mere discharging of the cargo, cannot properly be said to come within the expression "management of the ship," as used in Article IV. of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, or in the Harter Act.

There are three cases to which I should like to refer. There is first of all The Ferro ([1893] P., 38). That was decided in the year 1892. Before that case was decided there had been a number of cases before the Courts in which the exception had been confined to matters arising in the navigation of the vessel, and cases in which the exceptions had not included the word "management." A number of decisions had been given in reference to matters which, on the one hand, were said to come within the expression "in the navigation of the vessel," and, on the other hand, were said not to do so. Some were clear cases: for instance, the case of Good and Others v. London Steamship Owners' Mutual Protecting Association (L.R. 6 C.P., 563), where damage was done by the leaving open of a seacock, and there Mr. Justice Willes held that that was clearly improper navigation, because it was something improperly done with the ship or part of the ship in the course of the voyage. Then in Carmichael and Co. v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity Association (3 The Times L.R., 636; 19 Q.B.D., 242) a further difficulty arose, because there the damage was done owing to leaving a port open, and the damage was done before the vessel commenced her voyage. The Court got over the difficulty by holding that it was improper navigation because if the vessel had proceeded on her voyage it would have been an act of improper navigation to leave the port open. But difficulties such as those that were raised in the case of Carmichael and Co. v. Liverpool Sailing Ship Owners' Mutual Indemnity Association (supra) are got over when the section includes not only "improper navigation" but "improper management of the ship," and I think the first of the cases in which there was a discussion as to the meaning of the word "management" is the case of The Ferro (supra). There the point was whether improper stowage constituted mismanagement of a ship. There had been previously a dictum by Mr. Justice Charles in the Canada Shipping Company case (5 The Times L.R., 447 ; 22 Q.B.D., 727), in which he said, confining his language to the facts of that case, that in that particular case he thought the improper stowage was an act of mismanagement of the ship ; and, when the facts are looked into, it is quite plain that when he used that language he was referring to the state of the holds, as having been improperly and insufficiently cleaned and prepared before the cargo was put on board ; and attention is called to that in some of the later cases. But in The Ferro (supra) both the President (Sir Francis Jeune) and Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes state their view very clearly that such an act of damage, done merely in the stowing of the cargo, and apart altogether from anything done in reference to the ship, is not mismanagement of the ship. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in emphatic language, on page 46, says : "It seems to me a perversion of terms to say that the management of a ship has anything to do with the stowage of the cargo" ; and it seems to me on principle that it is quite impossible to draw a distinction between mere stowage and mere discharge, and that if the facts in that case had been in reference to the discharge of cargo instead of the stowage of cargo, Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes's language would have been just as emphatic. Then in The Glenochil ([1896] P., 10) again one finds, as it seems to me, equally emphatic language, and language which I think points quite clearly to the line which is to be drawn between acts which can properly be said to be acts done in the course of the management or mismanagement of a vessel and acts which cannot come within that expression ; and in this case of The Glenochil (supra, at p. 16) the President said this : "This Court had before it the same sort of question in the case of The Ferro (supra), and I adhere to what I said then, that mere stowage is an altogether different matter from the management of the vessel. It may be that the illustration I gave in that case, as to the removal of the hatches for the sake of ventilation, was not a very happy one ; but the distinction I intended to draw then, and intend to draw now, is one between want of care of cargo and want of care of vessel indirectly affecting the cargo." It seems to me that in that short sentence the President very happily draws the distinction between cases which do and do not fall within the protection of an exception which contains the words "management of the ship." Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, in the same case (supra, at p. 18) says : "Here we have a case in which there is an act of mismanagement which it might, perhaps, be said is not strictly navigation. I do not think it is now necessary to decide whether it is or is not ; but it certainly seems to me to be a fault in the management of the vessel in doing something necessary for the safety of the ship herself. In the course of the argument two principal points seem to me to have been taken. It is said that the word 'management,' having regard to the other sections of the Act, cannot mean management of the vessel which may affect the cargo by letting water into the ship. But I think if those sections are looked at there will be found a strong and marked contrast in the provisions which deal with the care of the cargo and those which deal with the management of the ship herself ; and I think that where the act done in the management of the ship is one which is necessarily done in the proper handling of the vessel, though in the particular case the handling is not properly done, but is done for the safety of the ship herself, and is not primarily done at all in connexion with the cargo, that must be a matter which falls within the words 'management of the said vessel.'" The last case to which I should like to refer is the case of Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (19 The Times L.R., 67 ; [1903] 1 K.B., 114), where Mr. Justice Kennedy, in giving his judgment, at p. 117 concludes his judgment in these terms : "This seems to be in accordance with the language of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in The Rodney (16 The Times L.R., 183 ; [1900] P., 112, at p. 117), where he says : 'I think that the words "faults or errors in the management of the vessel" include improper handling of the ship, as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo'"—bringing out again, as it seems to me, the line of distinction that has been referred to by the President in the case to which I have already referred. When you come to what Lord Justice Vaughan Williams said in the Court of Appeal in the same case (19 The Times L.R., 668 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 666), the way he expresses it, at page 676, is this : "Though it is not necessary for me to construe sections 1 and 2, yet I do construe them to this extent : it is the contrast between the dealing with the stowage of the cargo, and the dealing with the vessel itself, that leads me to say, when I come to section 3, that 'management of the vessel' means management of the vessel qua ship—not qua navigation, but qua ship." It is in that case that Lord Justice Stirling goes into the authorities at very considerable length, and he draws from them the same principle and the same distinction that I have been trying to draw between a dealing or damage resulting from some act relating to the ship herself and only incidentally damaging the cargo, and an act dealing, as is sometimes said in some of the authorities, solely with the goods and not directly or indirectly with the ship herself.

So much for the English authorities, the whole bearing of which I think is conclusive against the argument which Mr. Clement Davies has pressed upon us. Reference has been made to a decision in the Supreme Court of the United States in which Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the Court—The Germanic (196 U.S. Rep., 589)—and I think it is satisfactory to find that the law as interpreted in this country in reference originally to exceptions in bills of lading and then in reference to the Harter Act and now in reference to our own Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, so exactly corresponds with the view of the law as expressed by Mr. Justice Holmes in reference to the Harter Act in this American decision. The facts of that case were interesting from this point of view, and the facts brought the case very nearly to the line of distinction between the one class of case and the other, because the question there arose in reference to the shifting of the cargo, and it was said that the shifting of the cargo was done for the purpose of securing the safety of the ship. On the other hand it was said : No, it may incidentally have had an effect in reference to the trimming of the vessel, but the act which caused the damage was primarily an act of discharge of cargo and therefore it cannot be said to be an act done in the management of the ship, although it might have been said to be an act in reference to the management of the ship if it could have been established that the dealing with the cargo was a dealing for the purpose of trimming the vessel or securing the greater safety of the vessel. Mr. Justice Holmes deals with that matter and says that in the Supreme Court they must proceed upon the finding of the Court below that the dealing with the cargo was a dealing with the cargo in the course of the discharge, and that the matter must be regarded from that point of view. I will read a passage from his judgment which seems to me to put the case very clearly and very admirably, if I may say so. I am reading from 196 U.S. Rep., at p. 596. Mr. Justice Holmes says : "The petitioner contends that any dealing with the ship or cargo which affects the fitness of the ship to carry her cargo is 'management of the vessel,' within the meaning of section 3"—of course, he is referring to the Harter Act. "To support this contention the case of The Glenochil (supra) is cited." Then he goes into the facts of that case, and then he refers to the case of The Silvia (171 U.S. Rep., 462). "We see no reason," he goes on, "to criticize this decision, and therefore lay on one side at once the fact that the vessel had come to the end of her voyage and was in dock. We assume further that the captain retained authority over his ship, so that it was his power and perhaps his duty to intervene in any case that needed his control. On these assumptions the argument is that cargo has also a function as ballast, that if, for instance, the loss is caused by the improper shifting of pigs of lead, it does not matter whether they are called ballast or cargo, but in either case, so far as the change affects the fitness of the ship as a carrier, it is management of the vessel within the Act. The thing done is the same and the name of the object cannot affect the result. Nevertheless, in a practical sense, the ship was not under management at the time, but was the inert ground or floor of activities that looked not to her, but to getting the cargo ashore. And this consideration brings to light the limitation of the section, adopted by the Court in The Glenochil (supra) and sanctioned by this Court in Knott v. Botany Mills (179 U.S. Rep., 69, 73, 74), to faults 'primarily connected with the navigation or the management of the vessel and not with the cargo.' In the case supposed the name given to the pigs of lead is not important in itself, to be sure, but may indicate a difference in the purpose and character of the change of place. If the primary purpose is to affect the ballast of the ship, the change is management of the vessel, but if, as in view of the findings we must take to have been the case here, the primary purpose is to get the cargo ashore, the fact that it also affects the trim of the vessel does not make it the less a fault of the class which the first section removes from the operation of the third. We think it plain that a case may occur which, in different aspects, falls within both sections, and if this be true, the question which section is to govern must be determined by the primary nature and object of the acts which cause the loss."

I think, therefore, both upon the construction of the statute taken by itself and on applying the ordinary meaning to the word "management," it cannot be said that the acts of these stevedores' men in pillaging the cargo in the way they did can come within such an expression as acts done in the management of the ship. Apart from that, I think both by English law and decisions of these Courts, and by the decision of the Court of the United States of America, authority is practically unanimous against the view contended for by Mr. Clement Davies and in support of the view taken by the learned Judge. I think, therefore, whatever the consequences may be, it does seem to me clear that the particular acts of this class, acts done in the course of the discharge and in the course of the discharge merely, cannot be held to come within the exception, which is applied to acts which, though they may affect the cargo, are acts done in the course of the management of the ship.

The next point taken was this. It was said that, even assuming that the defendants were wrong on that point, yet they were entitled to the benefit of the exception contained in paragraph (q) of rule 2 of Article IV. of the Schedule to the Act of 1924. That paragraph must be read in order to indicate the point and the answer to the point. The paragraph is in these terms—it is the last exception : "Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage." Now the structure of this exception is, first, to indicate what the exception is, and next to establish what is the necessary proof which brings the person seeking the benefit of the exception within it, and it lays the onus of proof upon the person claiming the benefit of the exception. So far as the burden of proof is concerned, it is plain that the obligation is laid upon the person seeking the benefit of the exception to establish not only that the loss has been without his actual fault or privity, but also that it has been without the fault or neglect of his agents or servants ; and that, one would think, is reasonable and natural, because to contend that the statute has conferred an exception from liability upon a carrier who deliberately incites a man to steal the goods and then claims exemption from his act because his servants or agents had been guilty of no fault or neglect, is to attempt to impose an obligation upon the Court which it would be extremely loth to accept unless it was absolutely compelled to do so. Now Mr. Clement Davies says that the Court must put that construction upon the statute because of the opening words which define the exception and which, as he says, draw a distinction between the act of the carrier and the act of his servant, and that it is sufficient to bring the carrier within the exception if he proves either that the loss was without his actual fault or privity or that it was without the fault or neglect of his agents or servants, and he lays the whole stress of his argument upon the fact that the clause is drafted in this form : "Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants," and he says that the word "or" before "without" is there to be read disjunctively, and that you cannot read it otherwise, except by assuming that the draftsman has made a mistake or that it is competent for the Court to alter "or" into "and." But, with great respect, it is doing no injustice either to the draftsman or to the language to read the word "or" conjunctively and not disjunctively. There is abundant authority for doing that. It seems to me that it is quite imperative upon the Court to do so in this case, first, because it is only by doing so that you can bring the two branches of the subsection into agreement, and, secondly, because unless you do so you adopt a construction of the exception which it seems to me inconceivable that the Legislature should ever have contemplated for a moment. I think therefore that that point fails.

The last point is that the servants of the stevedores in this particular case being employed by the stevedores, and the stevedores being employed as independent contractors by the shipowners to carry out the discharge, the servants of the stevedores are not agents of the carriers within the meaning of this exception clause (q). I think Mr. Clement Davies has answered that point himself, because he pointed out that in a case which he referred to for another purpose, the case of Machu v. London and South-Western Railway Company (2 Ex., 415), a very similar case, the Court held that, for the purpose of construing an Act of Parliament in terms somewhat similar to this statute, the servants of the independent contractor would be the agents of the railway company ; and so here it seems to me impossible to put any reasonable construction upon this statute except by regarding the servants of the persons who are employed by the shipowners in order to fulfil their statutory obligation to discharge the vessel as being their agents for that purpose.

On all points, therefore, I think that the judgment of the learned Judge was right and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin.—I agree. This case raises an important point upon the construction of the rules which are scheduled to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and the particular rule is in the nature of a statutory exception [Article IV., rule 2 (a)] : "Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship." These are words which were found, and no doubt are still found, in old bill of lading and charterparty exceptions, and they are words which are found in legislation which preceded this Act and upon which this Act was founded, and especially, it is to be noted, are to be found in the Harter Act, which was the forerunner of all Acts of this kind, in relation to the carriage of goods by sea. I think it is very important in commercial interests that there should be uniformity of construction adopted by the Courts as to words in statutes dealing with the same subject-matter, and it is a matter of great satisfaction to me to find that the decisions of these Courts seem to correspond with the decisions given by the Courts of the highest authority in the United States.

I do not propose to add anything at length to what has been said by my Lord, with whose judgment I entirely agree, but I think perhaps one might point out this, that in this statute it is plain that a very clear distinction is drawn between dealings with goods and dealings with ships, and that "ship" is defined in the Act. "Ship" is defined as being "any vessel used for the carriage of goods by sea," and it is quite plain that what is meant by "ship," when the word is used, is the actual vessel, the res, the actual thing itself. One will find in Article IV., rule 1, that "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be liable for loss," and in rule 2, that "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss" : that means that the ship as a res shall not be responsible for loss ; and while it is quite true that, in general language, in another context, "management of the ship" might be construed as meaning management of the business of carrying goods by ship, it seems to me plain that that is not the meaning here, but that there is a clear distinction drawn between goods and ship, and when the Act uses the word "ship" it means the management of the ship, and does not mean the general carrying on of the business of transporting goods by sea. The effect of it is that, in the words of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, as he then was, in The Rodney (16 The Times L.R., 183 ; [1900] P., 112, at p. 117), "'Faults or errors in the management of the vessel' include improper handling of the ship, as a ship, which affects the safety of the cargo," and that construction merely follows, I think, and was intended by the learned Judge to follow, his decision in The Glenochil ([1896] P., 10), and the decision of Sir Francis Jeune and Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in both these cases of The Glenochil (supra) and The Rodney (supra) is supported in terms by Lord Justice Stirling in the case of Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (19 The Times L.R., 668 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 666, at p. 680), to which my Lord has referred, and I think that those statements of the meaning of the word "management" must be taken, so far as this Court is concerned, as being authoritative.

I do not quite agree with what was said by the learned Judge as to the impossibility of defining the words "management of the ship" in this context. I agree that a definition which is made before a full and complete observation of the different phenomena to which you are to apply the definition is unsatisfactory, but it may very well be that the time has not yet come to attempt a complete definition of the word. On the other hand, it is impossible for a reasoning and logical tribunal to try to construe the word without forming for itself some idea of what it means, and we may say how far the definition goes so far as the observed facts are at the present moment, and clearly the partial definition given by Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in the words that I have cited amounts to something which binds the Court and which affords a guide to construction. Therefore we are dealing with the question of management of the ship and not of management of the business of the ship.

The only other thing that I want to deal with is this. In the case which was cited of Rowson v. Atlantic Transport Company (supra) the members of the Court of Appeal, without deciding the matter, suggest, I think all of them, some doubt as to whether or not a defect in the management of the apparatus in the ship could be said to be a defect in the management of the ship if that apparatus applied solely to the cargo or was introduced into the ship for the mere purpose of protecting the cargo. I wish to guard myself at the present moment against being supposed to accept that definition or that view of the construction. It was not necessary for the Court of Appeal in that case to lay down an actual decision on the matter, and it is unnecessary for us to do so. I merely wish to point out this, that at the present day a part of the proper equipment of cargo-carrying ships is very largely concerned with appliances for the safe carrying of the cargo, appliances that have nothing to do with the navigation of the ship but have everything to do with the safety of the cargo, and among other things one would mention in particular the refrigerating machinery which was the subject of discussion in Rowson's case (supra), and other appliances dealing with ventilation, fans, pumps—a great many pumps on board a ship have the sole object of dealing with the cargo—the pumps of an oil tanker and things of that kind, and winches and derricks and so forth, which have nothing to do with the navigation of the ship, but which are part of the structure of the ship and without which the ship would clearly not be seaworthy either if they were not fitted at all or if they were not in a proper condition when the ship started. For my part, at the present moment, I have a difficulty in seeing, if there was a defect in the management of those appliances in the ship which are an essential part of the ship, that that would not be a defect in the management of the ship. This case clearly is not and could not be brought within the definition mentioned by Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes. It appears to me that here we are not dealing with anything which is or can be said to be part of the ship as a ship. The stevedores brought in were employed by the ship for the purpose of discharging the cargo, and that which was done was not a defect in the ship or a defect in the management of the ship as defined, but merely a default of a person dealing with the cargo, and in my view it is clearly not within the meaning of the words "management of the ship" as defined by the authorities.

The other question is the question of the construction of the words in the exception (q) in the second rule of Article IV. I do not propose to say more about that than that I think, upon the whole, the point that has been taken in that matter is the worst point that has ever been taken in the Court of Appeal in my time. It is a most hopeless proposition—not that it has not been very well argued by Mr. Clement Davies. Again, I disagree with the learned Judge in his view that the word "or" can never have a conjunctive sense. I think it quite commonly and grammatically can have a conjunctive sense. It is generally disjunctive, but it may be plain from the collocation of the words that it is meant in a conjunctive sense, and certainly where the use of the word as a disjunctive leads to repugnance or absurdity it is quite right within the ordinary principles of construction adopted by the Court to give the word a conjunctive use. Here it is quite plain that the use of the word as a disjunctive leads to an absurdity, because the contention put forward by the shipowners in this matter amounts to this, that if a shipowner himself breaks open a case and steals the contents of it, he is exempted from liability under this section if none of his servants stole the contents of the case or broke it open. That seems to me to be a plain absurdity. In addition to that, there is a repugnancy, because to use the word in a disjunctive sense is plainly repugnant to the second part of the section. Therefore I say no more about that.

The other question is whether or not the servants of the master stevedores at Vera Cruz can be said to be, within the meaning of the clause, the agents or servants of the ship. Mr. Clement Davies did not dispute that the master stevedores were to be considered agents of the ship, and I think he was quite right in that. There was a statutory obligation on the ship to discharge, and that duty was performed by entering into a contract with the master stevedores, who for that purpose were agents in performing the ship's statutory duty, and, to my mind, that in itself would be sufficient to support the matter, because it is plain that the master stevedores, according to our law, would be responsible for the tortious acts of their servants done in the scope of their employment; but quite apart from that I think that the servants of the stevedores for this purpose are also the agents of the ship, and I think that is made plain by the reasoning of the Court in the case that my Lord has referred to, Machu v. London and South Western Railway Company (2 Ex., 415), where the Court had to deal with words which were narrower in their meaning; where they had to deal with the word "servants," and where the Court held that the servants of the sub-contractor of the carrier were, within the meaning of the Carriers Act, servants of the carrier; and I think that that is sound and applies to this case.

For these reasons it appears to me that the shipowners have not discharged themselves from their liability, and that the judgment of the learned Judge was quite right and that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE.—I entirely agree with the judgments which have just been delivered by my Lords, and I do not think that I could usefully add anything.

The appeals were accordingly dismissed.

Court of Appeal, (Bankes, Atkin, and Lawrence, L.JJ.) 1927. June 1.

IMPORTERS COMPANY, LIMITED v. WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED.*

Bills of Exchange—Cheque—Crossed cheque—"Account payee only"—Forgery of indorsement—Non-liability of collecting bank—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 82.

By section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882, "Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title . . , the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment." The plaintiffs, who were merchants in London, bought paper from German manufacturers through S., their buying agent in Germany, and sent him a crossed cheque, marked "account payee only," drawn on the National Provincial Bank in London, and payable to the vendors. S. indorsed the cheque by forging the name of the vendors and added his own name, and he then paid it into his own bank at Dresden. The Dresden bank collected the money from their English agents, the defendant bank, and the latter collected the amount from the National Provincial Bank. In an action for wrongful conversion of the cheque the defendants relied on s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.

Held, (1) that since, even if the defendants had scrutinized the cheques, there was nothing which would have put them on inquiry, the defendants had not been negligent; (2) that the word "customer" in the section included the bank with which the defendants were dealing; and (3) that, although the defendants were acting as a collecting bank, they "received payment" within the meaning of the section; and therefore that the action failed.

Decision of MacKinnon, J. (43 The Times L.R., 325; [1927] 1 K.B., 869), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs, the Importers Company, Limited, from the judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon (43 The Times L.R., 325; [1927] 1 K.B., 869) in an action brought by them claiming to recover from the defendants, the Westminster Bank, Limited, the sum of £1,905 15s. 11d. as damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of a number of cheques.

* Reported by T. W. MORGAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs, who were merchants in London, bought from time to time in the course of their business large quantities of paper from manufacturers in Germany. In 1924 they appointed one Schultze as their buying agent in Germany. When they bought paper through him their practice was to send a cheque to him to be handed over by him to the particular manufacturers. The cheque was drawn on the plaintiffs' bank in London, the National Provincial Bank, Limited, made payable to the manufacturers, and crossed and marked "account payee only."

After a time Schultze began a series of frauds. He endorsed cheques by forging the names of the manufacturers to whom the money was payable, disguising the handwriting for the purpose, and added his own name underneath. He then paid the cheques into his own bank, the Oscar Heilmann Bank, Dresden. That bank then collected the money from their English agents, the defendants in this case, and the defendants in due course collected the amount from the National Provincial Bank.

Schultze had now become bankrupt, and the Oscar Heilmann Bank had also become insolvent. The plaintiffs, being still liable to the German manufacturers, sued to recover the amount from the defendants.

The defendants put in a general denial and pleaded that the Oscar Heilmann Bank was their customer and that they had acted in good faith and without negligence in receiving payment for such customer and sending him the proceeds. They relied on section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which provided that

"Where a banker in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a cheque crossed generally or specially to himself, and the customer has no title . . . the banker shall not incur any liability to the true owner of the cheque by reason only of having received such payment."

Alternatively, they pleaded that the words "account payee only" were only a direction to the receiving bank concerned and did not in any way affect a collecting bank. They said that the cheques in question were always payable to payees abroad and in the ordinary course of business would always have to be presented by a foreign bank through an English collecting bank and the words "account payee only" did not amount to a direction to the defendants as to the disposal of the proceeds of the cheques.

They also pleaded that they had remitted the amounts to the Oscar Heilmann Bank before they received notice of the plaintiffs' claim.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon held that the defendants, the Westminster Bank, Limited, were entitled to rely on section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and he accordingly entered judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Pritt, K.C., appeared for the appellants; Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. D. B. Somervell for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes.—We need not trouble you, Mr. Rayner Goddard. This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon, and the case for the appellants has been very fully put before us by Mr. Pritt; but in my opinion the judgment of the learned Judge was quite right. The circumstances under which the action was brought are these. The plaintiffs are an English company carrying on business in England, having, or having had, customers in Germany. They employed an agent in Germany, a man named Schultze, and the course of business as between the plaintiffs and their German customers was that, with reference to payments to those customers for goods supplied, the plaintiffs drew cheques in favour of the different customers, those cheques were sent to Schultze, and his business was to have handed the cheques to the persons in whose favour they were drawn. What Schultze did was to act dishonestly, and instead of handing the cheques to the customers he kept them himself. He indorsed them by forging the names of the customers to the cheques, and then paid them into an account which he had with a firm of bankers called Heilmann, who carried on business at Dresden. Heilmann employed the Westminster Bank, the defendants in the action, to clear the cheques for them, and they did clear them. I think there were 14 altogether in number. These cheques were drawn in favour of four of the plaintiffs' German customers, who appear to have carried on business either in the name of an individual or in the name of persons trading in partnership, or possibly in one case in the name of an individual carrying on business under a trade name. Those cheques in due course were passed on, if that is the correct expression, to the bank upon which they were drawn, which was the National Provincial Bank, through the Clearing House, and in due course the defendants received through the Clearing House the proceeds of those cheques. The plaintiffs' cause of action was that the defendants by so doing, and so receiving the proceeds of the cheques, had converted them, and that they were bound to pay over the proceeds of the cheques to the plaintiffs by way of damages for that conversion. The defendants' case was this: "We, as bankers, are protected by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882; in that we acted in good faith, which was not disputed; in that we acted without negligence, which was disputed; in that we received a payment for a customer, which again was disputed"; and the question which the learned Judge had to decide was whether, on those three matters, the defendants had brought themselves within the protection of the section. The cheques were all crossed cheques—and this is the principal point, I think, of the appellants' argument—and they were all drawn on account of "Payee only," and the contention of the appellants is that that indorsement amounts to a direction to anyone who is dealing with those cheques, that they are only to be dealt with in such a way that the proceeds of the cheques must pass into the account of the payee, and that anybody who disregards that direction is acting contrary to the express direction on the face of the cheque, and, if the direction is disregarded, he must be taken to be acting negligently, and, if a bank, to be without the protection given to bankers by section 82.

Now, as I understand the argument, the respondents' answer to that contention is this: "True it may be that that form of crossing is a direction to some bankers—and it is a direction to the banker who is the banker of the person in whose favour the cheque is drawn—but it has no application to our case at all, because we are merely clearing bankers, and it is not in our power to comply with the direction, because the cheque comes into our possession, and is passed on by us, in pursuance of a mandate under which it comes into our possession, under such circumstances that we cannot control the ultimate destination of the money, and therefore we cannot act upon the direction. It has no application to us." Again, as I understand the argument, Mr. Pritt says:

"It is all very well to say that, but it does not avail you. If you choose to take a cheque in this form, as collecting banker, if it comes to you, you must do one of two things: you must either refuse to do the business at all because you cannot comply with the direction or, if you do the business, you must do it knowing that you are doing something which is irregular and disregarding the direction, and you therefore, as a matter of business, and as wise people, ought only to undertake the business in cases where, knowing it is irregular, the person for whom you are doing the business is of sufficient standing to indemnify you if any trouble arises." Now, with great submission to that answer to the defendants' case, if I have put the case on the one side and on the other correctly, that contention, it seems to me, renders this class of business altogether impossible. If what Lord Macnaghten said in Capital and Counties Bank v. Gordon (19 The Times L.R., 462; [1903] A.C., 240), that bankers may fairly be said to bring themselves within the provisions of section 82 if they are only doing the particular form of business in the ordinary course in which such business is done, is not applicable to every case of this class—and I do not pretend to say that it is—at any rate it is an indication that, in the view of Lord Macnaghten, a very fair test, not necessarily a conclusive test, but a very fair test, of whether a banker can bring himself within the protection of section 82 is to see whether he is carrying on a particular class of business in the way in which the business is invariably done, business of this importance and magnitude, and business done by the class of persons who necessarily are the only persons who can conduct this particular class of business.

The evidence given on behalf of the Westminster Bank was given by people of high quality, whose evidence was not contradicted, and who spoke to what, according to their view, was the universal way of doing this particular class of business. Whether they expressed themselves in a way in which they would have done had the cheques been in a somewhat different form I am not sure, and I am not prepared to say that they did not possibly put their case higher than it ought to be put in reference to cheques which are not in this particular form; but for a reason which I will give in a moment, it seems to me to be immaterial in this case to consider whether they did not put the case for collecting bankers higher than, under certain circumstances, they might be able to justify. What in substance they said, dealing in the first instance with these cheques, but going a little farther in cross-examination, without possibly having considered all the consequences, was: "We are collecting bankers merely, and therefore we concern ourselves merely with considering whether our mandate to collect is sufficient, and we satisfy ourselves about that by looking at the indorsement, which is to us our mandate, and we do not concern ourselves with either the form of the cheque or anything else that is upon the cheque." Whether they went too far in saying that, and whether they could justify that under all circumstances, I am not prepared to say; but I do say that it is immaterial in this case because, assuming for the moment that their duty might be to scrutinize the cheque, at any rate to see whether or not it was not on its face in proper form, if they had done that in this case, in my opinion there is nothing upon either the face or the back of the cheque that would have put them upon inquiry. Therefore, upon the assumption that I am right in thinking that the learned Judge was correct when he came to the conclusion that the disregarding of the particular form of indorsement in this case by the defendant bank, having regard to the position they occupied as a collecting bank merely, was not in itself negligent, and assuming that he was right also in holding, as I think he was, that even if the bank had a duty at any rate to scrutinize the cheques sufficiently to show that there was nothing either on the face of them or on the back of them, or anywhere, to put them on inquiry, then I think that the bank did discharge the onus which lay upon them of showing that they acted in this particular matter without negligence.

I do not propose to go through the authorities to which our attention has been drawn. No doubt there are passages in them which are relevant upon the broad principles that one should apply to cases of this class. But there is no case which deals with this particular point as to how far a collecting bank is under any duty to regard the direction contained in a cheque crossed in this form, "Account Payee," and, if I am not repeating myself, I say that in my opinion the view that the learned Judge took was quite right both upon that point and upon the point that there was nothing in the indorsements upon the backs of the cheques themselves that ought to have put the bank upon inquiry, assuming that it was their duty at any rate to pay sufficient attention, to what appeared upon the cheque itself, to satisfy themselves that there was nothing apparently wrong.

The point taken in reference to the last matter by Mr. Pritt, as I understand it, is that these indorsements should have put the bank upon inquiry because of the way in which Schultze's name appears on them. In every case the indorsement took this form. The indorsement, first of all, was an indorsement in the name either of the person or of the firm, or of the person trading under a firm name, in whose favour the cheque was drawn. In every case that name appeared first. In one case it is true that the name was written in indelible pencil, but the learned Judge paid no attention to that, and I think that he was quite right in so doing. What followed in every case was that Schultze wrote his own name under that of the drawee, and it is said: "That ought to have put the bank upon inquiry, because there was nothing that indicated that Schultze, or whoever he was, was signing per pro, or in what capacity he was signing." But, with submission to that argument, I cannot see the force of it, because there was nothing to indicate that the original drawee had not in the first instance indorsed the cheque in blank; then it would have been passed on and indorsed again by Schultze in blank. There is nothing on the face of the cheque to indicate that the indorsement of the drawee might not be put on it by someone acting as an agent or servant, and I myself fail to appreciate the force of the argument that there was anything in the form of the indorsement which ought to have put the bank upon inquiry. That disposes of the contention that the bank failed to establish that they acted without negligence.

Then it is said: "But at any rate they were not receiving payment for a customer, because they must establish that as a matter of fact, and there was very little evidence given, and in those circumstances the Judge ought not to have drawn the inference he did in their favour." Now with reference to that we must remember that we are sitting here as a Court of Appeal—as a Court of Appeal from a Judge who tried this action without a jury—and we should only reverse the learned Judge if we were quite satisfied that in this particular matter he had drawn an inference which was quite unwarranted by the facts.

It is true that the whole history with reference to the transactions between the parties was not sifted to the bottom, but the whole case was fought upon the footing that the ordinary bank practice in such matters as these is at any rate common knowledge in the Commercial Court and to a learned Judge such as the learned Judge who tried this action, and it seems to me impossible to condemn with success the inference which the learned Judge drew from the facts, and from what is common knowledge about banking practice, that in this particular case this bank was receiving payment for a customer in the sense that at any rate it was not receiving payment for itself. I think, therefore, that on that point the appeal fails. But then it is said: "At any rate they were not receiving payment for a customer even if they were not receiving payment for themselves," and it was said that in this particular matter Heilmann was not the customer. Now, what does the expression "Customer of a bank" cover? The most ordinary meaning, I suppose, that one would attach to the expression "Customer of a bank" is, a person who keeps an account at the bank. He is obviously a customer of the bank. But banks do various kinds of business, and in all those various kinds of business either the individuals or the companies with which they do the business may properly be called customers, and they can properly be called customers whether they are individuals or whether they are banks, and in this particular case this class of business of collecting cheques is done between bank and bank, and it seems to me to be impossible to contend, as a matter of law, that the bank for which the defendants in this particular case were doing this particular class of business was not, in reference to that piece of business, their customer. Again, with submission, I fail to appreciate the force of the argument that in this particular case Messrs. Heilmann were not the customers of the bank. On all the points, therefore, I find that the learned Judge was right, and that this appeal fails and must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin.—I agree with the judgment that was delivered by the learned Judge and with the judgment which has just been delivered by my Lord. I really have nothing to say, I think, in addition to what has already been said, but in deference to the sustained and interesting argument of Mr. Pritt, I will add a few words giving my own reasons for the dismissal of this appeal.

This is a case where the plaintiffs drew cheques in favour of the foreign sellers to them of goods, and they sent the cheques over to their own agent, a man named Schultze, with instructions to hand the cheques to the foreign sellers. There can be no doubt that Schultze stole the cheques and forged the foreign sellers' indorsements and paid them into an account with a German bank for his own benefit and when those cheques came forward they were collected by the defendant bank for the German bank, and there can be no doubt therefore that the defendant bank converted the cheques, which were in fact the property of the plaintiffs.

The only question is, whether or not the defendants bring themselves within the protection of section 82 of the Act. The onus of bringing themselves within the section in that particular I think rests upon them, and they have to show that they, in good faith and without negligence, received payment of a crossed cheque for a customer. Now that, of course, must depend partly upon the facts, and the facts in this case are partly admitted and partly proved by evidence. Some of the evidence is the evidence of officials of the defendant bank and other bank officials, and, as not uncommonly happens, the bank officials were, I think, fairly easy victims in cross-examination. I have hardly ever known a bank case in which a bank official has not voluntarily gone a good way towards giving away the case of his principal, but I do not think that they succeeded in doing it altogether in this case, though Mr. Pritt urges upon us that perhaps they did.

The first question was whether or not the defendants received this money, because that is one of the essentials in the section. Mr. Pritt succeeded in inducing the principal official of the defendant bank to concede that there was a difference between a collecting bank and a receiving bank and that the defendants were not the receiving bank. Therefore, says Mr. Pritt, I have proved out of your mouth that you did not receive this money; but I think he was too successful there; I think that the witness was using a phrase with a mere view of distinguishing between the bank which initially receives the cheque and the bank which, in fact, puts it forward, and notwithstanding that distinction that it cannot be disputed that this bank, the Westminster Bank, received the money from the paying bank; they received it in the course of collecting, and I think quite clearly received it.

The other question that was raised was this. It is said: "You have not shown that in this case you received the money without negligence." Mr. Pritt says that there are two ways in which the bank failed to acquit themselves of negligence. He says, in the first place, that these cheques were drawn payable to the account of the payee only and the defendant bank paid no attention to that matter and did not investigate the question whether they were collecting merely for the account of the payee, and in reference to that he also refers to the indorsement, which it is said ought to have drawn their attention to the fact that they were not collecting the money for the account of the payee. Now, what is the meaning of a cheque to the account of the "payee only"? I do not know any better statement of it than the statement made by Mr. Justice Bigham, a very great authority on questions of commercial practice, and particularly banking practice, in Akrokerri (Atlantic) Mines, Limited v. Economic Bank, Limited, and Nobbs (20 The Times L.R., 564; [1904] 2 K.B., 465), that the paying bank have nothing to do with the application of the money if it has once been paid to the proper receiving banker. The words "Account payee" are a mere direction to the receiving banker as to how the account is to be dealt with after receipt. In this case it appears to me that when you are considering the question of negligence, you have to consider the particular facts of the case and the parties upon whom the duty to take care is imposed. I think it is desirable to point out that the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, first of all, expressly provides that a crossed cheque can only be paid by the bank on which it is drawn, and, if crossed specially, to the banker to whom it is crossed; and it also expressly contemplates that where a banker receives a crossed cheque, that banker may cross it to another for collection. Therefore, the position of a banker who receives a cheque in the ordinary course of business is well recognized by the Legislature. By section 77 (5) it is provided that "Where a cheque is crossed specially, the banker to whom it is crossed may again cross it specially to another banker for collection"; and section 79 provides, as to the duties of the banker on whom it is drawn : "Where a cheque is crossed specially to more than one banker, except when crossed to an agent for collection being a banker, the banker on whom it is drawn shall refuse payment thereof. (2) Where the banker on whom a cheque is drawn which is so crossed nevertheless pays the same, or pays a cheque crossed generally otherwise than to a banker, or if crossed specially otherwise than to the banker to whom it is crossed, or his agent for collection being a banker," he is responsible ; and the same provisions are made in section 80.

Now, everybody knows that in the ordinary course of practice, in England at any rate, crossed cheques. certainly in the metropolis, are cleared through the Clearing House, and there are only a certain limited number of banks—I think the number given in evidence was ten—which are what are called clearing banks. It follows that all the other banks in the country, if they desire to clear crossed cheques, have to send those crossed cheques to a clearing bank, the very persons contemplated in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, as the agents for collection. In those circumstances, it was proved in evidence that the clearing bankers—and the defendants are clearing bankers—received thousands of cheques in a day for clearance through the Clearing House. That being the state of business, which everybody must contemplate, it seems impossible in those circumstances that you could expect a very close and accurate survey of all the circumstances connected with each cheque from the clearing banker, whom I am treating now as the agent for collection. But Mr. Pritt got the representatives of the defendant bank to say that they were under no obligation to look at the cheques at all, except to see whether there was an indorsement on them, and that that was in order. I do not think it is necessary to accept that view. For my part, I think also they have to bear in mind that though the clearing bankers have to deal with a considerable number of cheques, still they are dealing with very valuable negotiable instruments representing enormous sums of money and that they have some responsibility at any rate to the person whose property those negotiable instruments really are, and if anything was noticed and it was such that it ought to be noticed, and the cheque came into the hands of the clearing banker without there being any indorsement which would confer a right upon anybody to part with it, in the case of a bill drawn to order, without any indorsement at all, I think it might very well be that the clearing banker might find himself in a difficulty if he sought to establish that he had no duty to look at the back of the bill at all except to see whether there was an indorsement to him. But that is not this case, and when you look at the cheques in this case you find that there is a complete set of indorsements, and the position, it seems to me, of the clearing bank in respect of a cheque which is marked "Account payee" may very well be this : as long as there are indorsements upon the cheque which are consistent with the bank which is sending it forward holding the cheque so that it can comply with the direction, that is sufficient. I do not propose at the present moment to deal with the question, which has not been argued, as to what is meant in those circumstances by "account payee only," or by collection for a customer, which is a different point and which I will deal with so far as it is necessary a little later. All that it is necessary to say on this particular point is that the documents are such that it seems to me that it was quite possible, and indeed probable, that the official who scrutinized these indorsements would pass them if satisfied that the bank with which he was dealing was in fact going to account for the proceeds to the payee mentioned on the face of the document. That seems to me to be sufficient. It is said that the collecting bank must be satisfied that their principal, the bank which sent it forward, must hold the proceeds for the account of the payee. I am not satisfied even that that is true, because one knows very well that cheques are drawn occasionally "on account of payee" and sent to a person who has not a banking account. I do not agree that those cheques are cheques which are of no value to that person. I see no reason at all why such a person cannot request somebody who has a banking account to present the cheque for him and get it cleared for him. I do agree that there is a duty upon the bank which takes a cheque in those circumstances to see that, in fact, it is collecting the money for the account of the payee and that the proceeds, when it has received them, will go to the payee. But that seems to me to be entirely a different matter. Therefore I think in this case there is no evidence of negligence on that point.

Then it was also suggested that there was evidence of negligence because the indorsements in themselves, if looked at, would have attracted suspicion. I think it is unnecessary to say anything further in respect of that, except to say that if you look at the indorsements on these cheques, there is really nothing to attract the attention of a person who, as I say, has only the duty of doing that which is proper on the part of a bank which has to collect thousands of cheques in the course of a day.

The other point is this. It is said that these cheques were not collected for a customer. It is said that from the evidence you must infer that the bank was a holder for value of the cheque, and did not collect for a customer, the German firm of Oscar Heilmann. The evidence on that point seems to me to be this, that Oscar Heilmann had what appears to be an ordinary drawing account with the Westminster Bank. They may call it by a different name because Oscar Heilmann is, in fact, a bank, but it was an account in which Oscar Heilmann sent cheques for collection, and they were credited to the account of Oscar Heilmann, as a bank drawing upon the account, by the defendants, and in every respect it seems to me that there was an ordinary account. If there is an ordinary account and nothing more and crossed cheques are sent to the bank, with a request to credit them to the account, prima facie the bank who receives those cheques and does collect them collects them for the customer and does not become a holder of them for value, and if it is sought to show that the ordinary position which you would infer from that set of circumstances has in some way been altered, I think that the plaintiffs ought to prove what they seek to infer. There is, in my opinion, no evidence in this case from which it can be inferred that the Westminster Bank were holders for value of the cheques and collected them at all in that capacity.

The only other point was that the firm of Heilmann, in any case, was not a customer, because it was a bank. First of all, I think that, so far as I can see on the evidence, it was a customer in every sense of the word. It had a drawing account with the Westminster Bank. But if it was not and if it was in a different position, it seems to me that if a non-clearing bank regularly employs a clearing bank to clear its cheques, in the ordinary relation that exists in banks between those two persons the principal non-clearing bank is a customer of the clearing bank. There is a further point which I think may well arise on the section, inasmuch as one knows that a bank which is a customer in the ordinary sense, as Mr. Pritt said, a lay customer, can and must employ a clearing bank as its agent for collection if the cheque is to be cleared through the Clearing House. I think it may very well be that the agent for collection collects for a customer when the cheque is collected for the benefit of the customer of the non-clearing bank. But that is a point which has not been argued and which it is not necessary to decide. I think there are analogous cases, some such cases as we dealt with the other day when we dealt with the question of the servants of a carrier, and there was authority for saying that the servants of the sub-contractor might yet be the servants of the carrier, which would justify that argument. However, it is unnecessary to decide that. It seems to me that the evidence supports the finding of the learned Judge in this case in every respect, and, therefore, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

THE BACKWORTH.*

Ship — Collision — Navigation round points or sharp bends—Port of London River By-Laws, 1914-1926, By-law 36.

By-law 36 of the Port of London River By-Laws, 1914-1926, provides :—"Every steam vessel navigating against the tide shall on approaching points or sharp bends in the river ease her speed and if necessary stop and wait before rounding so as to allow any vessel navigating with the tide to round and pass clear of her."

Held, that the by-law imposes on the vessel navigating against the tide two duties, (a) to ease her speed, and (b), if necessary, to stop her engines and wait before rounding so as to allow any vessel navigating with the tide to round and pass clear of her. The question whether it is necessary to stop and wait is one of seamanship, and depends upon the particular facts of each case.

This was an action which arose out of a collision off Blackwall Point, River Thames, between the plaintiffs' steamship Sentry and the defendants' steamship Backworth, and raised an interesting point as to the construction of By-law 36 of the Port of London River By-Laws, 1914-1926, which provides :—

"Every steam vessel navigating against the tide shall on approaching points or sharp bends in the river ease her speed and if necessary stop and wait before rounding so as to allow any vessel navigating with the tide to round and pass clear of her."

* Reported by A. W. Grant, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The collision occurred in daylight on the evening of September 16, 1926, when the Sentry, a steamship of 1,354 tons gross, was bound down river on a voyage from Shadwell to Manchester with general cargo, and the Backworth, a steamship of 2,481 tons gross, was bound up river on a voyage from Stettin to Millwall with a cargo of coal. The tide at the time was flood, of the force of about 1½ knot, and the Sentry was, therefore, navigating against the tide and the Backworth with it. Each vessel was navigating on her own proper side of mid-channel and the Sentry had slowed down when approaching the point.

The Court found that there would have been no danger of collision if both vessels had continued on their courses to pass port side to port side. As the Sentry neared the point under port helm, however, she was compelled to stop her engines and to steady her helm owing to the manœuvres of two motor-boats which endeavoured to cross her bows from port to starboard. With the tide on her starboard bow the Sentry, when she stopped her engines and steadied her helm, began to pay off to port, and her bows, as the Court found, got to the north of mid-channel and the collision with the Backworth occurred. It was contended by the defendants (inter alia) that the Sentry was to blame for a breach of By-law 36 by failing to stop her engines and wait above Blackwall Point until the Backworth had passed clear of her.

Mr. D. Stephens, K.C., and Mr. H. C. S. Dumas appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. A. T. Bucknill for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Hill.—The ships involved in this case are the Sentry, a vessel of 1,354 tons gross, 230ft. long, with a draught, according to the log, of 13.7 forward and 16.8 aft. The Backworth is a steamship of 2,481 tons gross, 303ft. long, drawing 19.10 aft, even keel, in charge of a pilot. The Sentry was bound down the Thames, and the Backworth was bound up, and they met in collision off Blackwall Point. The time was about 6.55 p.m., British Summer Time, on September 16, 1926. It was therefore daylight and it was fine and clear. The tide was flood, of the force of a knot and a half. High water at London Bridge was at 7.58 p.m. As to the precise place, there is no very great dispute. At any rate, it was about off Green's Upper Dry Dock. It is difficult to fix the position precisely, but that is about the place. The difference in the evidence is not of much importance, for the place was certainly not below Blackwall Point. It was not in Bugsby's Reach, neither was it in Blackwall Reach. As to the position as regards mid-river there is the usual dispute. I find that it was a little north of mid-river. These are some of the considerations which lead me so to find. Before anything happened the Sentry was proceeding down south of mid-river. As to the Backworth, I find that she was coming up in about mid-river—not south of mid-river. There was not much other traffic in the neighbourhood. No vessels were entering or leaving the docks, nor any sailing craft. Two tugs with craft were coming up, both nearer the north shore than the Backworth. The Backworth had overtaken and passed one, and was overtaking the other. There were also two petrol motor-boats, the one towing the other, coming up. They were further up river than the Backworth, and when first seen by the Sentry were south of mid-channel, but shaping to pass to the north side of mid-channel. That was all the traffic, except that the Sentry was being followed down by the steamship Ardgarroch. The Sentry and Backworth came into collision, each striking with the stem or close to the stem. The angle is in dispute, differing as much as two points (which is the plaintiffs' case) and seven points (which is the defendants' case). The only surveyor called was called by the plaintiffs, and gave a reason for thinking that it was two points. The master of the Ardgarroch, called by the plaintiffs, drew a picture showing nearly four points. The damage looks like more than two points. The final angle may well have been greater than the initial angle. I cannot determine this question with any precision. The angle is not of much importance, unless it proves that the Sentry starboarded. On the evidence as a whole I am satisfied that the Sentry did not starboard, and that whatever angle she got to the north shore was by reason of her stopping her engines and ceasing to port, as I shall presently describe, and getting the stronger tide on her starboard bow. Undoubtedly the effect of that was to give her an angle to the north shore and to bring her to a position in which some part of her, at any rate, was to the north of mid-river.

Prima facie, the Sentry, proceeding down and found with her bows to the north of mid-river, in collision with the Backworth, proceeding up, and being at the time of collision to the north of mid-river, is in the wrong. Her case is that she could not help herself, and in this she has much support from witnesses called by the defendants. In Blackwall Reach the Sentry was proceeding down to the south of mid-river in her proper water. She had been at slow, and had increased to half her speed for a short time, and again reduced to slow, when a little above Blackwall Tunnel. She was now approaching Blackwall Point at a speed of about four knots. Being at slow, she saw the Backworth approaching the Point from the opposite direction. Her witnesses said that the Backworth was to the south of mid-river, but that I have not accepted ; the Backworth was in mid-river. The Sentry had also seen the two motor-boats, which were to the south of mid-river, but were shaping to cross to the north of mid-river and pass the Sentry port to port. There was nothing likely to cause any difficulty, if every one acted on the rule of passing port to port. The motor-boats did in fact draw on to the port bow of the Sentry and were in a position to pass port to port. The helm of the Sentry was ordered hard-a-port for the bend, and, as her master said, also for the Backworth, and there would have been no difficulty in the Sentry rounding the bend on the south side of the river, while the Backworth went round the bend on the north side of the river. The motor-boats, however, altered their course to recross to the Sentry's starboard bow, thus creating a position of danger, and in this attempt the tow-rope parted and the Sentry was then in great danger of collision with the second motor-boat. The other, after attempts to get hold of the second, which failed, got away to the southward. The second was left helpless. The Sentry stopped her engines and steadied her helm. The effect of this, coupled with the tide, was that she got a cant to port. She thereby escaped collision with the second motor-boat, which passed her starboard bow at close distance. The Sentry then ported and let go her starboard anchor and put her engines full astern. But she could not prevent herself from getting partly athwart and partly to the north of mid-river, and so her stem struck the Backworth. The plaintiffs' witnesses say that there was nothing else that she could do, when confronted with the difficulty created by the improper navigation of the motor-boats and the breaking adrift of the second motor-boat. Witnesses called by the defendants agree with that view. The Elder Brethren agree. I also agree. So far, then, the collision was not due to any negligence on the part of those on board the Sentry. It is, however, contended that it was due to negligence antecedent to the time when the motor-boats created the position of difficulty by starboarding across the bows of the Sentry. I will consider that when I have considered the case made against the Backworth. I have already found that the Backworth was not proceeding up to the south of mid-river. The only fault that could be suggested is that she did not reverse soon enough. She did reverse. Was there any delay ? The Sentry pleaded that she gave a signal of four short blasts once, when the motor-boats parted. The defendants pleaded that they heard a signal of four short blasts twice. It turned out in evidence that the Sentry did give the signal twice, once when the motor-boats were seen to be starboarding across the bows of the Sentry, and the Sentry's engines were stopped and the helm was steadied, and a second time when the tow-rope parted. The log of the Sentry apparently recorded both signals and the stop as after the parting of the tow-rope. The record is not clear, and I find that one signal preceded and the other followed the parting ; but the interval between the two signals was very short. The Backworth put her engines astern after the second signal. There was no real delay. Moreover, the first signal would not inform the Backworth that the Sentry was coming across to the north of mid-river. The first signal was upon the stop and steady, and it was the stop and steady which caused the Sentry to cant. I can find no fault in the navigation of the Backworth. So far, then, the collision happened without negligence on the part of either ship.

That leaves for consideration the charge made against the Sentry, based upon Rule 36 of the Thames Rules, 1914-1926. It is alleged thus in the defendants' charges : "They failed to ease their speed on approaching Blackwall Point, and stop and wait before rounding, so as to allow the Backworth to round and pass clear." The duty of a steamship approaching a point in the Thames against the tide when other vessels are approaching the same point with the tide has been the subject of a rule for many years past. But the rule has not always been expressed in the same terms. Rule 23 of the Rules of 1880 was thus expressed : "Steam vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding" (certain named points, which included Blackwall Point), "ease their engines and wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear." That rule was interpreted, and, as interpreted, was made the basis of the decision in The Libra (6 P.D., 139) and in The Margaret—Cayzer, Irvine and Co. v. Carron Company (9 App. Cas., 873). Rule 47 of the Rules of 1898 was thus expressed : "Steam vessels navigating against the tide shall, before rounding" (certain named points, which included Blackwall Point), "wait until any other vessels rounding the point with the tide have passed clear." That rule was interpreted, and, as interpreted, was made the basis of the decision in The Ovingdean Grange ([1902] P., 208). The object of both rules was stated to be to prevent vessels meeting on the point, and the duty of the ship navigating against the tide was that she should "so far check her speed as to prevent her coming up to the point at the same time when the other vessel would come there," and to "wait until the other has passed her," per Lord Justice Brett in The Libra (supra). Rule 36 of 1914-1926 is not limited to certain named points, but applies to all points or sharp bends. It is in the following terms : "Every steam vessel navigating against the tide shall on approaching points or sharp bends in the river ease her speed and if necessary stop and wait before rounding so as to allow any vessel navigating with the tide to round and pass clear of her." The rule was the subject of discussion in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in The Hontestroom (42 The Times L.R., 741 ; [1927] A.C., 37), but the majority of the House of Lords decided that, as there was no tide at the time in question, the rule did not apply. The minority (Lord Phillimore and Lord Blanesburgh) held that it did apply, but further held that the collision was caused not by the Hontestroom neglecting to wait, but by the starboarding of the Hontestroom. There was therefore no actual decision based upon a breach of the rule. At the same time the judgments both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords throw much light upon the meaning of the rule.

I need not consider what bends are included in the words "points or sharp bends." Undoubtedly the bend at Blackwall Point is a sharp bend. Nor need I consider what precisely is meant by "ease her speed." The Sentry on approaching Blackwall Point, namely, when about off the Thames Tunnel, did reduce her speed to slow. She was about where the Hontestroom was when the Hontestroom put her engines at slow, as found by the President ; and, with regard to that, Lord Phillimore said : "Under the Thames Rule No. 36 a vessel proceeding against the tide and approaching a point in the river should ease her speed. That the Hontestroom did" (42 The Times L.R., at p. 742 ; [1927] A.C., at p. 55). What I have to consider is whether it was the duty of the Sentry to stop and wait above the point until the up-coming vessels had rounded the bend and passed clear of her. If it was her duty so to hold back, she did not do it. If she had done it, she would not have reached the place of collision and the case would be very similar to that of The Ovingdean Grange (supra), where the Forsete, which did not wait, found herself hampered by a barge and it was said that she was unable to extricate herself from a position where she should not have been. So in The Hontestroom (supra) Lord Sumner said : "The point" (i.e., whether there was any tide) "is crucial, for it is surely plain that, if the Hontestroom was bound to comply with the rule and had fully done so, there would have been no collision, for she would have been waiting above the point well clear of the Sagaporack at the material time" (42 The Times L.R., at p. 742 ; [1927] A.C., at p. 51). The argument for the defendants is, in effect, that the present rule means the same thing as the former rules, and that the steamship meeting the tide must so regulate her speed, by easing and, if necessary, stopping, that the vessels do not meet on the point. The plaintiffs' construction of the rule is that she must in any case ease her speed, and, if the circumstances make it necessary, she must stop and wait until the up-coming vessels have rounded the point and passed clear.

First of all, in my opinion, the words "so as to allow," &c., are not to be read with the words "ease her speed." If "so as to allow" is to be read with "ease her speed" there was no need to provide for anything else. If the ship was bound to ease in such a way that she did not meet the other on the point, that obligation would without question oblige her to stop, if that was necessary to prevent her meeting on the point. I read the rule as imposing two duties: (1) "Ease her speed." (2) "If necessary stop and wait before rounding so as to allow any vessel navigating with the tide to round and pass clear." Again, in support of that view, I quote Lord Phillimore : "Under the Thames Rule No. 36 a vessel proceeding against the tide and approaching a point in the river should ease her speed. That the Hontestroom did. She should also, if necessary, stop and wait before rounding so as to allow any vessel navigating with the tide . . . to pass clear. This the Hontestroom did not do" (42 The Times L.R., at p. 742 ; [1927] A.C., at p. 55).

The next question is as to the meaning of the words "if necessary." The plaintiffs say that they mean "if necessary in order to allow the other vessel to round and pass clear." If that be the meaning, it is ill expressed by the phrase "so as to allow." I do not think that that is the meaning. I think "if necessary" means "if necessary in order to avoid risk of collision." And, in that view, I am strengthened by what was said in The Hontestroom (supra) both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords. The Court of Appeal asked their assessors this question : "Having regard to (a) Rule 36 of the Thames Rules ; (b) the presence of the Corfe Castle and the Durham Castle at the north side of the channel ; and (c) the sailing barge crossing from north to south, were those in charge of the Hontestroom guilty of a want of care and proper seamanship : (1) in starboarding for the barge, and (2) in not stopping and allowing the Sagaporack to pass clear ?" When they so asked the second question the Court of Appeal cannot have thought that, in all circumstances, the Hontestroom was bound to stop and wait until the Sagaporack had rounded. They treat it as a question of seamanship depending on the state of traffic at the time. Similarly in the House of Lords Lord Sumner said that the rule "adapts the action (if action there is to be) to the circumstances of the moment by distinguishing between obligatory easing of speed and stopping only if there is also necessity" (42 The Times L.R., at p. 742 ; [1927] A.C., at p. 52). And Lord Phillimore said that the object of the rule was "to prevent the simultaneous passing of a point . . . if such simultaneous passing be dangerous" (42 The Times L.R., at p. 743 ; [1927] A.C., at p. 55). It is true that if in the opinion of the majority there had been any tide the House of Lords would with one voice have held the Hontestroom to blame—but the circumstances have to be remembered. It was night. The Hontestroom was light. She had ahead of her the Durham Castle (of more than 8,000 tons), which backed out of the East India Dock Basin and straightened down a little north of mid-channel, the Corfe Castle just below the basin waiting to enter, the Sagaporack, of over 5,000 tons, coming up Bugsby's Reach, and a sailing barge crossing the bows of the Hontestroom. The position was very different from the position in the present case. Here it was daylight, and fine and clear, there was no traffic out of or into the dock, there was no sailing barge ; both the Sentry and the Backworth were of moderate size, the tugs and craft proceeding up near the north shore were in nobody's way ; the Backworth was not south of mid-river, and the two motor-boats, though they were south of mid-river, were shaping to pass to their proper side and on to the port bow of the Sentry, as indeed they did. Such being the circumstances of the moment, the Elder Brethren are of opinion that there was no want of due care or seamanship in the Sentry continuing at slow speed, and that there was nothing to make it dangerous or risky for her to pass the point at the same time as the Backworth. The risk of collision was created by the faulty manœuvre of the motor-boats. I am entirely of that opinion.

I hold that the Sentry was not guilty of any breach of Rule 36, and the claim and counterclaim will be dismissed, with no order as to costs.

K.B. Div. (Acton and Talbot, JJ.) 1927. June 2.

CROSSINGHAM v. PARK.*

Moneylenders — Reopening transaction — Application by borrower — In "any Court in which proceedings might be taken for the recovery of money lent by a moneylender"— Jurisdiction of County Court—Moneylenders Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict., c. 51), s. 1 (2).

A County Court has jurisdiction under s. 1 (2) of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, to entertain an application by a borrower from a registered moneylender to reopen a moneylending transaction only when the amount of the money lent, whether repayable by instalments or otherwise, without the addition of any claims arising under any agreement to pay interest or an amount charged for "expenses, inquiries, fines, bonus, premium, renewals, or any other charges," is within the jurisdiction of the County Court.

If, however, this condition is fulfilled, the Court may entertain the application although the moneylender has not taken any proceedings to recover the money lent and although the time has not come for taking such proceedings.

This was an appeal from a decision of Judge Harington at Wandsworth County Court in a case which raised the question in what circumstances a borrower from a registered moneylender might have recourse to the County Court by an application for relief under section 1 (2) of the Moneylenders Act, 1900.

In February, 1924, the plaintiff, Mr. Lawrence Thomas Jubilee Crossingham, a builder, of Blackfriars-road, S.E., borrowed £250 from the defendant, Mr. Gilbert Park, a registered moneylender, trading as the Temperance Loan Fund, and he gave as security a bill of sale on certain furniture and utensils. In January, 1927, he had paid £372 10s. to the defendant in repayment of principal and in payment of interest, but the defendant alleged that there was still money due to him from the plaintiff in respect of the transaction.

The plaintiff accordingly issued a summons in the Wandsworth County Court by which he claimed under section 1 (2) of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, a declaration that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, and that the interest charged was excessive, and he asked that the Court might reopen the transaction.

It was admitted for the plaintiff before the County Court Judge that, under the terms of the contract between the parties, more than £100 was alleged by the defendant to be owing to him by the plaintiff, but it was contended that, as that contract provided for repayment of the loan by monthly instalments of £15, the defendant could have sued for the payment of an instalment in the County Court, and that it thereby acquired jurisdiction to deal with the matter then before it.

Judge Harington, however, held that he had no jurisdiction, as the amount claimed to be due to the moneylender was more than £100.

The plaintiff appealed.

Section 1 (2) of the Moneylenders Act, 1900, provides:—

"Any Court in which proceedings might be taken for the recovery of money lent by a moneylender . . . may, at the instance of the borrower [reopen a transaction which appears to be harsh and unconscionable], and the Court shall have power, notwithstanding any provision or agreement to the contrary, to entertain any application under this Act by the borrower . . . notwithstanding that the time for repayment of the loan, or any instalment thereof, may not have arrived."

Mr. S. P. Kerr appeared for the appellant; Mr. Charles Bray for the respondent.

The Court reserved judgment.

Mr. Justice Acton read the judgment of the Court as follows:—The question in this case is in what circumstances a borrower from a registered moneylender may have recourse to the County Court by an application for relief under subsection (2) of section 1 of the Moneylenders Act, 1900.

To ascertain the meaning of this subsection it is, in our opinion, necessary to read it along with subsection (1) and to compare the two subsections with some care. Section 1 (1) begins with the words, "Where proceedings are taken in any Court by a moneylender . . ." and subsection (2) with the words "Any Court in which proceedings might be taken . . . by a moneylender. . . ." The first question is, What is the meaning of the words "might be taken" in this latter phrase? In our opinion, the true meaning of this phrase is "Any Court in which (so far as amount is concerned) it would be competent for a moneylender to take proceedings, if he were minded so to do." The insertion of the parenthesized words is due to a consideration of the concluding words of the subsection, viz., "notwithstanding that the time for repayment of the loan, or any instalment thereof, may not have arrived," the effect of which is discussed later.

The next point to be observed is as follows:—Subsection (1) deals with "proceedings" of more than one kind, viz.: (a) "for the recovery of any money lent" or (b) "the enforcement of any agreement or security made or taken . . . in respect of money lent." Subsection (2) deals with "proceedings" of one kind only, viz., "for the recovery of money lent," and there it stops. Now the claim of a registered moneylender is commonly upon some negotiable instrument, such as a bill, note, or I.O.U., but, whether it be so or not, it is always analysable into (a) a claim for "money lent," and (b) a claim or claims arising under an agreement, or agreements, to pay interest on or in respect of the amount of the loan, or other sums for "expenses, inquiries, fines, bonus, premium, renewals, or any other charges," to employ the words of the Act of 1900. This analysis is familiar in the practice in the King's Bench Division under Order XIV. since the decision in Lazarus v. Smith (24 The Times L.R., 592; [1908] 2 K.B., 266), the result of which is that in a registered moneylender's action, if it appears that the whole or some part of the money "actually advanced" by the moneylender is still owing by the borrower, after crediting him with every payment made by him to the moneylender, irrespectively of whether it purported to be in payment of principal or interest or charges, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for that amount as "the principal sum admitted to be due" (per Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R.), or as "a debt which is admitted, quite irrespective of any matter with which that Act has to deal" (per Lord Justice Kennedy). "The Moneylenders Act," says the Lord Justice, "only relates to transactions which can be reopened and modified under its provisions, and what would be reopened and modified under those provisions is not the amount of an admitted debt apart from all questions of bonus or interest, or of bonus or interest consolidated with principal."

In the light of this decision and what is therein involved, consideration now reverts to the meaning of section 1 (2) of the Act of 1900. It can hardly be suggested that the difference in the wording of the two subsections to which attention has already been drawn—viz., that subsection (1) deals with proceedings for the recovery of money lent and also with other claims of different kinds, whereas subsection (2) deals only with proceedings for the recovery of money lent and there stops—is without its significance. In our opinion, this gives the clue to the correct meaning of subsection (2). We think that the test whether a Court is a Court in which it would be competent for a "moneylender" (that is, for any particular moneylender) to take "proceedings for the recovery of money lent" is a test to be applied with reference to the strict meaning of the two italicized words. If the whole amount of the "money lent," whether repayable in instalments or otherwise, without the addition of any claims arising under an agreement or agreements to pay interest or "expenses, inquiries, fines, bonus, premium, renewals, or any other charges," is within the jurisdiction of the County Court, then in every such case, even though the moneylender has not taken any proceedings and though the time has not come for taking proceedings, the borrower may make application under the Act to the County Court, but not otherwise.

This interpretation gives their ordinary and simple meaning to the words "money lent" and is applicable to every case. The fact is that a claim by a moneylender is often loosely regarded as a claim for "money lent" without more, whereas it is, practically always, not merely a claim for money lent, but such a claim in combination with claims of a different nature, although they are of course incident to the transaction of borrowing the money lent.

It remains to be added that the concluding words of subsection (2) seem to be intended to show that the test is the amount of "money lent," and not the time at which any payment under the contract between lender and borrower becomes due and payable. It would otherwise seem very difficult to reconcile the words "any Court in which proceedings might be taken for the recovery of money lent" with the later words "notwithstanding that the time for repayment of the loan, or any instalment thereof, may not have arrived." This difficulty impressed itself upon us in the course of the argument. It ceases, however, to be a difficulty if the earlier words are construed as relating solely to the amount of "money lent," irrespectively of whether it is then wholly or in part due and payable, and we have not heard suggested, nor are we able to suggest, any more satisfactory reconciliation between these apparently inconsistent phrases occurring in the same subsection. It is for these reasons that we have construed the words "any Court in which proceedings might be taken" as limited by the addition of the words "so far as amount is concerned."

We think that the learned County Court Judge was right in holding that this action was one under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, and not under section 67 of the County Courts Act, 1888. The jurisdiction given by the Act of 1900 is a new jurisdiction of a special kind (see Samuel v. Newbold, 22 The Times L.R., 703; [1906] A.C., 461). In our opinion, the only test to be applied in an action such as this, to determine whether the County Court has or has not jurisdiction to entertain an application by the borrower under section 1 (2) of the Act of 1900, is that which is provided by the Act itself. We think, therefore, that Mr. Kerr's contention that he may have recourse to section 67 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and rely upon some more or less dubious claim for redemption of the bill of sale granted by his client, as being a mortgage of personal chattels, is a contention which cannot prevail, even if there were no other grounds for rejecting it. Whether there are other grounds it therefore becomes unnecessary and inexpedient further to consider. His contention involves, however, the substitution of an inquiry whether the Court is one in which the borrower might take proceedings for the inquiry whether it is one in which the lender might take proceedings, and it is the latter inquiry only which the Act of 1900 indicates as relevant and essential.

As the amount actually advanced in the present case was £250, this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Leave to appeal was given.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. June 2.

IN RE MUSGROVE DECEASED—DAVIS v. MAYHEW.*

Will—Probate—Non-discovery for 20 years—Possession by executrix—Discovery after death of executrix—Suspicion from fact that executrix did not put will forward—No suspicion attaching to document itself—Onus of proof as to revocation—Judgment pronouncing for will.

By a will which was made in 1890, and in which the attestation clause was in order, the testatrix appointed E. M. D. executrix, the sole beneficiary under the will being A. M. D., an illegitimate daughter of E. M. D. In 1900 the plaintiff married A. M. D. In 1905 the testatrix died, and, the will not having come to light, letters of administration as on an intestacy were granted to her brother. Although by 1908 E. M. D. knew of the testatrix's death, she did not propound the will. In April, 1924, E. M. D. died. In July, 1924, the testatrix's brother died, leaving a will making the defendant his sole legatee, and in 1925 the defendant, in the month of March, was appointed administratrix de bonis non. Also in 1925, more than a year after the death of E. M. D., the plaintiff discovered the will of 1890 in a desk that had belonged to E. M. D. In October, 1925, the plaintiff's wife died. The plaintiff then propounded the will of 1890 as the personal representative of his deceased wife, and he asked for a revocation of the grant of administration de bonis non. The defendant put the plaintiff to the proof of the testatrix's knowledge and approval of the contents of the will and claimed that the grant of letters of administration de bonis non be handed out to her (the defendant).

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that although from the conduct of E. M. D. in not putting the will forward there might be a suspicion that there must have been some condition subsequent under which the will, though in itself a valid testamentary document, ceased to be effective, yet, as no suspicion attached to the will itself or to its terms, and therefore the fact of execution was sufficient proof of the testatrix's knowledge and approval of its contents, and as the burden of proving revocation was on the defendant and had not been discharged, there must be judgment pronouncing for the will and revoking the grant of administration de bonis non.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Hill refusing to grant probate of a document dated September 9, 1890, propounded as the will of Miss Lavinia Musgrove, who died on March 16, 1905. The will was discovered in 1925 in an old desk in the possession of the plaintiff, the husband of the woman named as residuary legatee therein.

The plaintiff, Mr. William George Davis, a mantle maker, of 69, Mildmay-grove, N., propounded the will of September 9, 1890, as the personal representative of his late wife, Agnes Maria Davis, who was named as the sole beneficiary under the will and who had died on October 16, 1925. The plaintiff also asked for the revocation of a grant of administration de bonis non made on March 13, 1925, to the defendant, Miss Lily Mayhew, of Redholme, Preston-road, Withdean, Brighton.

The defendant put the plaintiff to the proof of the due execution of the will and the testatrix's knowledge and approval of its contents, and claimed that the Court should pronounce against the will of September, 1890, and that the grant of letters of administration de bonis non be handed out to the defendant on the ground that she was the sole legatee of Miss Lavinia Musgrove's brother, Alfred Musgrove, who was granted letters of administration of his sister's estate on her death intestate in 1905 and who died on July 31, 1924. The estate was between £6,000 and £7,000.

Mr. Justice Hill found the following facts :—The document propounded was a printed will form. It was expressed to be the last will of "me, Lavinia Musgrove, of 204, High-street, Deptford," appointing Emma Mercy Dunmall, of Wall Hill, Chelsfield, Kent, executrix. It bequeathed to "Agnes Maria Dunmall all my property real and personal of which I may be possessed for her own use absolutely." The signature had been proved to be in the hand of the deceased woman, but he had been unable to satisfy himself whether or not the body of the will was written in by Miss Musgrove. There were resemblances to and differences from contemporary writings of hers. The signatures of the two attesting witnesses had also been proved. Emma Mercy Dunmall was a cousin of Lavinia Musgrove, and Agnes Maria Dunmall, who was a child in 1890, was the former's illegitimate daughter. Emma Mercy Dunmall died in April, 1924, aged 78, having outlived Lavinia Musgrove 19 years. Emma Mercy Dunmall knew of the death of Lavinia Musgrove in 1908. More than a year after Emma Mercy Dunmall's death a desk of hers containing papers was opened by the plaintiff (who had married Agnes Maria Dunmall in 1900) and in it was found the document in question. It was clear that neither of them knew of its previous existence.

His Lordship pronounced against the will on the grounds that the testatrix had entirely forgotten that she ever had executed it and it did not represent her testamentary wishes at the time of her death. He thought that it was a very suspicious circumstance that Emma Dunmall, though she knew of the death of the testatrix in 1908, did not propound the will.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. G. C. Tyndale and Mr. R. Wavell-Paxton appeared for the appellant; Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., and Mr. Noel Middleton for the respondent.

The Master of the Rolls, in the course of his considered judgment, recited the facts, and said that the mere statement of the dates and facts was sufficient to prove that it was surprising and curious that the will of Lavinia Musgrove was not brought to light until more than 20 years after she died and 17 years after those interested knew of her death. He had carefully considered the judgment of Mr. Justice Hill and had accepted the facts found by him, but he was unable, though not without diffidence, to agree with his decision on the law applicable to those facts.

Lavinia Musgrove was a good business woman. Her will, beginning in bold type, "This is the last will and testament," was found duly signed and attested, and there could be no doubt that the testatrix intended that document to be her last will. It was made in the lifetime of her father, at a time when her estate was not so large as it afterwards became, in favour of a cousin's illegitimate daughter, then ten years old, who might not unjustly be the object of womanly sympathy and charity.

No suspicion attached to the will itself or its terms and if it had been produced immediately on Lavinia Musgrove's death in 1905 no exception could have been taken to it. The suspicion referred to by the Judge was suspicion as to the conduct of Emma Mercy Dunmall and her forbearance to put the will forward. But if there was once a good will it could not be disposed of except in one of the authorized ways of revocation (Wills Act, 1837, sections 18, 19, 20). If it was once a will and, as such, was handed over to the custody of the executrix—and no more effective act could be taken by a testatrix in support of it—it remained the will of the testatrix, and no mere conduct of the executrix would stop its effect. Forgetfulness might explain her inaction, but to import more into that inaction appeared to be acting upon a presumption arising from conjecture only.

It was necessary to consider the authorities which had been cited to the Court and the rules which had been laid down. It was clear that the onus of proving a will lay on the party propounding it and that he must satisfy the Court that the instrument so propounded was the last will of a free and capable testator who knew and approved of the instrument as his testament and intended it to be such (per Baron Parke in Barry v. Butlin, 2 Moore, P.C., 480).

In Burgoyne v. Showler (1 Robertson, 5) Dr. Lushington said, at page 10 :—

"Upon what principle ought the Court to consider a case of this description where the will upon the face of it appears to be duly executed—where there is an attestation clause, though not quite in the strict form? I apprehend in the first place the presumption is omnia rite esse acta. If a party is put on proof of a will, he must examine the attesting witnesses. On the present occasion there are two subscribed witnesses ; if these persons were dead, the law would presume the will to be duly executed ; if they were utterly forgetful of all the facts, the presumption of law would be the same."

In that case the Judge pronounced for the will in spite of the evidence of the attesting witnesses.

The presumption carried the will to probate, although there were alterations and obliterations in the body of it. In Lloyd v. Roberts (12 Moore, P.C., 158) the same course was followed. In Vinnicombe v. Butler (3 Sw. and Tr., 580) the presumption was held to prevail in a case where there was an incomplete attestation clause and three out of the four attesting witnesses remembered nothing about the matter. In that case Sir James Wilde said that the presumption applied with more or less force according to the circumstances of each case. In Guardhouse v. Blackburn (L.R., 1 P. and D., 109) Sir James Wilde declared certain propositions as rules which ought to govern the action of the Court in respect of a duly executed paper. The first two were applicable to the present case :—

"The Court must be satisfied that the testator knew and approved of the contents at the time he signed it. Secondly, that, except in certain cases where suspicion attaches to the document, the fact of the testator's execution is sufficient proof that he knew and approved the contents."

In Wright v. Sanderson (9 P.D., 149) the principle of Burgoyne v. Showler (supra) and Lloyd v. Roberts (supra) was adopted and followed in the Court of Appeal by Lord Selborne and Lord Justices Cotton and Fry. Other illustrations to the same effect were Woodhouse v. Balfour (13 P.D., 2) and In re Peverett ([1902] P., 205). The latter was a startling decision, for there was no attestation clause whatever ; it was distinguished in In re Strong—Strong v. Hadden (31 The Times L.R., 256 ; [1915] P., 211).

The facts in the present case appeared to establish that this business woman must have signed the instrument in the form in which it was for the purpose of making her will ; the attestation clause was in order ; and the contents appeared from the writing and ink used to be an original part of the instrument and in accordance with the rules and reasoning in the cases above set out. The suspicion was not such as attached to the document itself. In Tyrrell v. Painton ([1894] P., 151) Lord Justice Lindley gave a wide definition of suspicion, saying that it extended to all cases in which circumstances existed which excited the suspicion of the Court. Those words appeared to have been used in reference to the preparation of the will, its intrinsic terms, and the circumstances surrounding its preparation and execution.

Here the suspicion was that there must have been some condition subsequent under which a valid testamentary document ceased to be effective. The onus of proof of that lay on the opponent of the grant of probate ; for, when once the will had been proved to have been duly executed, the burden of proving that it was revoked lay on those who set up its revocation. In the absence of evidence proving it, revocation would not be presumed. That was laid down by Lord Penzance in Benson v. Benson (L.R., 2 P. and D., 172). The facts of the present case presented sufficient internal evidence of knowledge and approval of the will when executed. The suspicion arose at a later date, when the will had begun to run its course as an effective instrument. In his (his Lordship's) judgment, the maxim operated in favour of the will, after the proof given of its execution and attestation, to establish that the testatrix knew and approved of its contents. The appeal must be allowed and judgment given pronouncing for the will and revoking the grant of administration de bonis non.

Lord Justice Sargant.—In this case the plaintiff has succeeded in proving to the satisfaction of the Court the signature of the alleged testatrix and of the two alleged witnesses to the document propounded by him as a will. Furthermore the document is prominently described on its face as a will and purports to have been signed and witnessed in the manner prescribed by the statute as essential for the purpose of constituting a will. Accordingly on the principles established in earlier cases and summarized in the leading case of Wright v. Rogers (L.R., 1 P. and D., 678) the plaintiff has satisfied the onus prima facie resting on him, and the presumption is that, apart from countervailing circumstances, the document is in fact the will of the alleged testatrix, Lavinia Musgrove.

Further there is nothing, in my opinion, in the circumstances in which the document was discovered or in the dispositions made by it, to cast any suspicion on its authenticity. To confide a will to the sole executrix who was also the mother of the universal legatee thereunder, an infant of some ten years of age, was a very natural act. And I see no improbability at all in a gift of the testatrix's property in favour of an infant who was illegitimate but had been recognized as a relative by the testatrix. The unfortunate position of the infant, especially in view of her mother's recurrent impecuniosity, may well have evoked the testatrix's compassion.

Mr. Middleton, for the defendant, urged that at the date of the alleged will the testatrix was living with her father and brother at Deptford, and that at that time she had only a comparatively small property of her own, not exceeding £2,000 ; and these facts, though not actually proved, were accepted by Mr. Tyndale for the appellant, and no doubt had been common ground at the trial. But so far as these facts are relevant at all (and I attach little importance to them) they seem to tell rather in favour of the appellant than against him. For the smallness of her then property would make it more natural for Miss Musgrove to give the whole of it to the infant. And the argument that the gift to the infant of the much larger sum which Miss Musgrove possessed at her death would probably not have represented her wishes at her death, though much relied on by Mr. Cotes-Preedy, seems to me of no importance and was rightly rejected by the learned Judge. The only date at which her testamentary intentions are to be regarded is, of course, the date on which the document was executed.

The sole ground on which the learned Judge has pronounced against the will is the suspicion excited in his mind by the circumstance that the executrix, realizing (as she must have done) the effect of the will, knowing by the year 1908 at latest of the death of Miss Musgrove three years before, and being on good terms with her daughter, did nothing during the remaining sixteen years of her own life to secure these benefits for her daughter. And he deduces from this that the executrix must have known something about the document which prevented her from putting it forward as a genuine will of Miss Musgrove—that is, something which either prevented the document from expressing the real mind of the testatrix or which affected the due execution of the document as a will. In these circumstances he considers that the plaintiff has at least to bring further affirmative evidence to prove the facts of due execution and of expression of real intention ; and as this is impossible he pronounces against the alleged will. In so holding he relies on the principles of Tyrrell v. Painton ([1894] P., 151), summarizing and following certain earlier cases to the same effect, though he recognizes that there are differences between those cases and the present.

With great respect to the learned Judge I am of opinion that the principle of the cases in question does not apply in the circumstances of the present case. That principle is most neatly expressed in the judgment of Lord Justice Davey, which is not in any way inconsistent with that of Lord Justice Lindley and Lord Justice A. L. Smith, but has the advantage of incorporating a little more definitely all the conditions of the problem which the Court was solving. He says at page 159 : "It must not be supposed that the principle in Barry v. Butlin (2 Moore, P.C., 480) is confined to cases where the person who prepares the will is the person who takes the benefit under it—that is one state of things which raises a suspicion ; but the principle is, that wherever a will is prepared under circumstances which raise a well-grounded suspicion that it does not express the mind of the testator, the Court ought not to pronounce in favour of it unless that suspicion is removed." Now here there is nothing in the preparation or contents of the will to raise a suspicion that it did not express the mind of the testatrix. The sole peculiarity is the subsequent fact that for many years after knowledge of the death of the testatrix the executrix did not take any steps to prove a will which gave large benefits to her daughter. I cannot think that this fact is analogous to the facts in Tyrrell v. Painton (supra) or the previous similar cases, or that it justifies such an inference as was drawn there.

The learned Judge in attributing the inaction of the executrix to knowledge of some defect in the document was, in my judgment, conjecturing only. And I do not think it difficult to suggest a good many reasons for her inaction which are at least as probable as that adopted by the learned Judge and would not invalidate the will. The executrix may have been told by the testatrix at the time of her will, or have thought, that her intention was only to benefit the legatee if she was a minor, or was unprovided for, at the death of the testatrix. But any such intention, even if communicated, would not in law invalidate or affect the will. Or the executrix may, like the testatrix, have forgotten altogether the existence of the will. Or on the occasion of the marriage of the legatee the testatrix may have communicated to the executrix an intention to revoke the will, but this again would be quite ineffective. And even if the executrix thought that there had been some informality in the execution or attestation of the will, as for instance, if she had forgotten altogether that she had witnessed the will, there are several cases to show that this would not be sufficient to rebut the presumption arising from the form in which the will was witnessed (Wright v. Sanderson, 9 P.D., 149 ; Lloyd v. Roberts, 12 Moore, P.C., 158).

The executrix must be regarded for this purpose as merely a witness. The beneficial interest under the will was not that of her daughter.

In my judgment, therefore, the appeal should be allowed and the will pronounced for, with such costs here and below as are appropriate in a poor person's case.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—The question which falls to be determined on this appeal is whether in the special circumstances of this case the presumption omnia rite esse acta ought, or ought not, to prevail. If the presumption is held not to prevail the will cannot be admitted to probate, as both the attesting witnesses are dead and the only available evidence has been given.

The will was made on a printed form which contained not only a regular attestation clause, but also precise instructions as to the manner in which it ought to be executed so as to comply with the requirements of the Wills Act, 1837.

The signatures of the testatrix and of the attesting witnesses have been duly proved.

The testatrix was a business woman. There is some doubt whether she actually filled in the form herself ; but, even if she did not, there is nothing to suggest that she did not understand and approve of the contents, which are short and perfectly simple. Nor is there any reason to suppose that she did not read the instructions and make herself acquainted with the proper method of executing the will. Moreover, there is no suggestion of fraud or undue influence. The sole beneficiary named in the will was Agnes Maria Dunmall, the ten-year-old illegitimate daughter of the testatrix's cousin, Emma Mercy Dunmall. The testatrix, who was living at home with her father and brother (both of whom were well off), had some property of her own, which we are told was given to her by her father. She was on friendly terms with her cousin, who was in humble circumstances, and it is quite natural that she should have become attached to her cousin's daughter and have determined to make a will in her favour.

Had the will been found in the possession of the testatrix at her death and had the attesting witnesses been then dead, it is not disputed that on proof of the signatures of the testatrix and of the attesting witnesses the presumption omnia rite esse acta would have applied and the will would have been admitted to probate without any further evidence.

It is contended, however, that as the will was not discovered until 20 years after the death of the testatrix and as it was then found in a desk which had belonged to Emma Mercy Dunmall, the presumption ought to be held to be inapplicable. Mr. Justice Hill has accepted this contention and has withheld probate.

The grounds upon which the learned Judge has arrived at this conclusion are that the will was not produced from proper custody, and that Emma Mercy Dunmall, in whose custody it was, did not disclose it when she heard of the testatrix's death. The learned Judge held that these circumstances were of such a nature as to raise in his mind a strong suspiciton that Emma Mercy Dunmall knew that there was something about the document which prevented her from putting it forward as genuinely the will of the testatrix, and consequently that it could not be admitted to probate without strict proof of its due execution.

Of the cases cited during the argument, those in which the sole question was whether the presumption omnia rite esse acta ought to prevail in the face of evidence given by the attesting witnesses, tending to show that the formalities required for the due execution of the will had not in fact been observed, do not, in my opinion, afford much assistance in solving the question which has arisen in the present case, except perhaps as showing the weight which the Court attaches to the presumption.

On the other hand, in every case in which the Court has had to consider whether, apart from the evidence as to the formal execution of the will, the circumstances were of such a nature as to arouse a well-grounded suspicion that the alleged will did not in fact represent the testamentary wishes of the testator at the time when the document was signed, the suspicious circumstances have been circumstances existing at the time of and surrounding the preparation and execution of the will; one of the most common circumstances being that the person benefiting by the will has prepared it and has prevented its execution. Although Lord Justice Lindley in Tyrrell v. Painton ([1894] P. 151, at p. 157) points out that the rule, that the onus of proving that the testator knew and approved of the contents of the will lies upon the party propounding the will, is not confined to such a case as I have last mentioned, but extends to all cases in which circumstances exist which excite the suspicion of the Court, yet, in my opinion, the circumstances which the learned Lord Justice had in mind were primarily circumstances existing at the time when the alleged will was executed and having a direct bearing on the question whether the testator then knew and approved of its contents.

In the present case the matters which have excited the suspicion of the learned Judge are matters which occurred only after the execution of the will. Subsequent events may in some cases no doubt give rise to a suspicion that the will was not properly executed or that the testator did not know or approve of the contents, but in the present case the facts relied upon by the learned Judge are not, in my opinion, of such a nature as to form a good ground for any such suspicion.

Having regard to the fact that Emma Mercy Dunmall was the executrix named in the will and the mother and natural guardian of the sole beneficiary, I do not consider it at all unnatural that she should have been entrusted by the testatrix with the custody of her will, especially if, as is not improbable, the testatrix did not want her father or brother to know that she had made it.

The reasons which induced Emma Mercy Dunmall not to tell her daughter of the will and not to put it forward on the death of the testatrix are less easy to conjecture, but I do not agree with the learned Judge that, in the circumstances of this case, this secrecy and non-disclosure on the part of Emma Mercy Dunmall created a suspicion that the will was not duly executed or that the testatrix did not know or approve of its contents when she signed it.

It is possible, although not very likely, that Emma Mercy Dunmall may have forgotten the will. Assuming that she had not forgotten it, it is possible that the will was handed to her by the testatrix under a pledge of secrecy and on a condition that it was to become inoperative and not to be put forward by her unless the testatrix died within a given time or before the happening of some event, such as the coming of age or the marriage of the infant beneficiary. If this be the true explanation it would also account for the statement made by the testatrix to her brother in the year 1905 that it was time that he and she were thinking of making their wills. It may well be that neither the testatrix nor Emma Mercy Dunmall realized that, unless duly revoked in accordance with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, the will would remain effectual.

Be that as it may, however, and bearing in mind that there is nothing on the face of the will to suggest that it was otherwise than regularly executed and that neither its contents nor the known circumstances surrounding its preparation and execution give rise to any suspicion of fraud or undue influence, I am of the opinion that the mere absence of evidence explaining why the testatrix handed her will to Emma Mercy Dunmall and why the latter did not disclose it at the proper time, does not furnish an adequate ground for suspecting that the will was not properly executed or that it did not represent the testamentary wishes of the testatrix at the time when it was made.

In these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that in the present case the presumption omnia rite esse acta has not been rebutted and ought to prevail. I therefore agree that the appeal succeeds and that the Court should pronounce for the will.

K.B. Div. (Swift, J.) } 1927. June 2.

ALBEMARLE SUPPLY COMPANY, LIMITED v. HIND AND CO.*

Lien — Hire-purchase agreement — Taxicabs — Repairs — No authority to hirer to pledge owner's credit — Possession parted with for limited and specific purpose — "Repairs" or "Maintenance"—Appropriation of payments on general account—Creditor's right to leave balance owing for repairs.

The plaintiffs let out three taxicabs to B. on hire-purchase agreements which provided that B. should not have any authority to pledge the credit of the plaintiffs for repairs to any of the vehicles or to create a lien on them in respect of repairs. For a considerable time before May 1, 1925, the cabs, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs, had been garaged at the defendants' garage and B. owed the defendants £94 as the balance of a general account for garage rent, goods supplied, and washing, cleaning, and repairing the cabs. On May 1, 1925, the plaintiffs terminated the hiring agreements as B. was in arrear with his payments to them thereunder, but the defendants refused to hand them the cabs, asserting that they had a lien over them for the cost of the repairs which they had done to them. In an action by the plaintiffs for the delivery-up of the cabs and damages for their detention,

Held: (a) That the defendants were entitled "up to the very last moment" to appropriate the payments made to them by B. from time to time generally on account so as to leave a balance owing for repairs in respect of each cab on which to base their claim to a lien.

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dictum of Lord Macnaghten in The Mecca (13 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1897] A.C., 286) applied.

(b) That the defendants were entitled to a lien on the cabs although at the time when they claimed to retain them they had not ascertained the amount due in respect of each of them, the question of such amount not having been raised by either party until after action brought.

(c) That the defendants' lien might attach notwithstanding the provision in the hire-purchase agreements that B. should not have any authority to pledge the plaintiffs' credit, or to create a lien on the cabs, in respect of repairs.

(d) That the defendants' lien might attach although they did not have continuous possession of the cabs, since, in letting B. take them out from time to time to ply for hire, they parted with possession only for a limited and specific purpose and without any intention to abandon any rights which they might have in respect of them, including the right of lien.

North-Western Bank, Limited v. Poynter ([1895] A.C., 56) applied.

(e) That the defendants' lien was not prevented from attaching on the ground that the work done on the cabs was work of maintenance and not of improvement or real repair.

Hatton v. Car Maintenance Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 275 ; [1915] 1 Ch., 621) distinguished.

The plaintiffs, the Albemarle Supply Company, Limited, claimed from the defendants, Messrs. Hind and Co., the delivery-up of three motor-taxicabs which, they alleged, were their property, or the value of the cabs, and damages for their detention.

The defendants denied that they had detained the cabs from the plaintiffs and said, alternatively, that, if they had detained them, they had done so under a lien to which they were entitled.

Mr. Cave, K.C., and Mr. A. E. Woodgate appeared for the plaintiffs ; Serjeant Sullivan, K.C., and Mr. Martin O'Connor for the defendants.

His Lordship read the following considered judgment :—In this case the plaintiffs claim a return of three taxicabs or their value and damages for their detention, and the defendants allege that those taxicabs were detained by them under a lien to which they were entitled and allege that they were justified in detaining the same under such lien. Before the trial an order was made for the delivery of the taxicabs to the plaintiffs on their paying the sum of £113 18s. 3d. into Court. That was done and the real question now is : Who are entitled to have that £113 18s. 3d. paid out to them ?

The action came on to be tried before me with a common jury, but the facts as opened by counsel for the plaintiffs were stated by counsel for the defendants not to be in dispute and it was agreed that there was no question for the jury, and it was further agreed that, if, during the course of the case, any issue of fact did arise which it was necessary should be determined, I should decide it, and the jury were accordingly discharged.

The plaintiff company were a company which, among other things, let out taxicabs on the hire-purchase system, and on May 3, 1921, September 13, 1922, and May 5, 1923, they let the three cabs which are the subject of this action to one John Botfield upon hire-purchase agreements. Each of the agreements was in the same terms and provided for the payment of hire and for the purchase of the vehicle when a certain sum had been paid by the hirer to the plaintiffs. At the commencement of May, 1925, the hirer was in arrears in the rent which was due from him in respect of each of these hire-purchase agreements and the plaintiffs terminated the hiring agreements by a letter of May 1 of that year. At that time the cabs were garaged at the garage of the defendants, Messrs. Hind and Co., and they had been garaged there with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiffs for a considerable time. Botfield had from May 9, 1924, to May 5, 1925, become indebted to the defendants in sums amounting to £1,222 7s. 10½d. for garage rent, goods, washing and cleaning, and repairs, and he had made payments generally on account amounting to £1,127 16s. 9½d., leaving a balance of £94 11s. 1d.

The items debited for repairs of the three taxis amounted to £219 5s. 7½d., made up of £56 15s. 10d. for the first cab, £89 16s. 9½d. for the second, and £72 13s. for the third. When the plaintiffs desired to take possession of the three cabs on the termination of the agreements with Botfield the cabs were in the defendants' garage, and the defendants asserted that they had a lien over them for the cost of the repairs which they had done to them and they refused to hand them over unless and until those charges were paid. This action was accordingly commenced. At first the defendants do not seem to have ascertained how much they alleged was owing in respect of each cab, or what sum was required to satisfy their lien, but by a letter dated May 12, 1927, from the defendants' solicitors they claimed to appropriate the payments made by Botfield generally on account in such a way that £124 14s. 6½d. was left after payment of all items other than repairs debited against Botfield. This £124 14s. 6½d. they appropriated to the repairs items, thus leaving a balance of £94 11s. 1d. due to them in respect of repairs with regard to all the cabs. They appropriated £31 10s. 4d. to each cab, thus leaving £25 5s. 6d. due in respect of the first cab, £58 6s. 5½d. due in respect of the second cab, and £41 2s. 8d. due in respect of the third cab.

The first dispute between the parties arises on this letter appropriating the payments made by Botfield and leaving these balances owing for repairs in respect of each cab. Mr. Cave, for the plaintiffs, contended that it was not competent for the defendants to take a general account and so to appropriate payments made on it to particular items as to have a debt owing for repairs on the specific cabs. He said that what was being claimed by the defendants was not a lien for repairs at all, but was a lien for a balance of a general account allocated between three cabs by the simple process of dividing the total balance of the general account by three. Serjeant Sullivan, for the defendants, dissociated himself from any intention or desire to claim a lien on these cabs for the balance of a general account for rent, cleaning, and goods supplied as well as for repairs, but he contended that the defendants were entitled to appropriate the payments made by Botfield "up to the very last moment," and he relied upon the authority of The Mecca (13 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1897] A.C., 286). In that case Lord Macnaghten said ([1897] A.C., at p. 293) : "Now, my Lords, there can be no doubt what the law of England is on this subject. When a debtor is making a payment to his creditor he may appropriate the money as he pleases, and the creditor must apply it accordingly. If the debtor does not make any appropriation at the time when he makes the payment the right of application devolves on the creditor. In 1816, when Clayton's case (1 Mer., 585, at p. 608) was decided, there seems to have been authority for saying that the creditor was bound to make his election at once according to the rule of the civil law, or, at any rate, within a reasonable time, whatever that expression in such a connexion may be taken to mean. But it has long been held and it is now quite settled that the creditor has the right of election 'up to the very last moment,' and he is not bound to declare his election in express terms. He may declare it by bringing an action or in any other way that makes his meaning and intention plain. Where the election is with the creditor, it is always his intention, expressed or implied or presumed, and not any rigid rule of law that governs the application of the money. The presumed intention of the creditor may no doubt be gathered from a statement of account, or anything else which indicates an intention one way or the other and is communicated to the debtor, provided there are no circumstances pointing in an opposite direction. But so long as the election rests with the creditor, and he has not determined his choice, there is no room, as it seems to me, for the application of rules of law such as the rule of the civil law, reasonable as it is, that if the debts are equal the payment received is to be attributed to the debt first contracted." I think that the contention of Serjeant Sullivan is right and, if that be so, there was due and owing from Botfield in respect of each of these cabs for repairs, and repairs only, the respective sums which I have set out above.

It was contended that the defendants could not have a lien for the cost of these repairs because at the time when they claimed to retain the cabs they had not ascertained and could not tell the plaintiffs the amount due in respect of each cab. I do not think, however, that this contention is sound. It is the duty of the person claiming goods over which a lien is alleged to exist to tender the proper amount. It may be that the person alleging the lien may by his conduct make it impossible for the claimant to make a tender, so as to show either that the lien is waived or that the tender is waived, but the mere fact that an excessive amount is claimed, or that an indefinite amount is claimed, does not of itself, in my opinion, prove that. See Scarfe v. Morgan (4 M. and W., 270). In this case the question of the amount claimed in respect of each cab never was a question considered by either party until litigation had started. The plaintiffs said, "Hand us over the cabs." The defendants said, "No, we have a lien on them." And the action was then started. I do not see anything in that to justify the inference that the defendants so embarrassed the plaintiffs that their conduct amounted to a waiver of their right to have the sum really due tendered to them.

There being, in my opinion, specific sums due in respect of each of these cabs for repairs and the defendants having, in my view, done nothing to lose their lien, if one existed at the time when the plaintiffs claimed the vehicles, it remains to be considered whether such lien did at that time exist.

Mr. Cave contended that there was no lien, first, because it was excluded by the agreements made between the plaintiffs and Botfield; secondly, because the defendants had not had continuous possession of the cabs but had let Botfield take them out from time to time to ply for hire; and, thirdly, because the repairs done were maintenance only and not for the improvement of the cabs.

With regard to the first of these contentions: By clause 5 of each agreement it is provided that "the hirer shall not have or be deemed to have any authority to pledge the credit of the owners for repairs to the vehicle or to create a lien upon the same in respect of such repairs." In the case of Albemarle Supply Company, Limited v. Hind and Co. (unreported) (another dispute between these same parties), Mr. Justice Rowlatt held on May 2, 1927, that the lien of a repairer attached notwithstanding the agreement between the owner and the hirer. Having regard to the fact that this exact point arising between these same two parties has been decided by a Judge of this Court, I do not think it right to express any opinion of my own. The cases of Keene v. Thomas (21 The Times L.R., 2; [1905] 1 K.B., 136) and Pennington v. Reliance Motor Works, Limited (38 The Times L.R., 670; [1923] 1 K.B., 127) were cited to me and I have considered them, and I have also considered the authorities upon which they are based. Mr. Justice Rowlatt has held that a lien attaches, and no suggestion was in any way made to me that the facts in the case which I am trying differed in any way, so far as this point is concerned, from the facts in the case that he tried, and no evidence was opened to me of circumstances to show that it did not in every detail coincide—so far as this point is concerned—with the case with which he was dealing. I do not, therefore, investigate channels which might be very illuminating as to the defendants' knowledge of the relationship between the plaintiffs and Botfield, nor do I express an opinion upon the authorities which have been cited or referred to. As between these two parties on exactly similar facts there has been a judgment, and I accept it and hold that a lien may attach notwithstanding the proviso in clause 5 of the agreements under consideration.

That brings me to the consideration of Mr. Cave's second contention, namely, that no lien attaches in this particular case because the defendants did not have continuous possession of the cabs, but had let Botfield take them out from time to time to ply for hire. It was conceded by Serjeant Sullivan in effect that the law laid down in Erskine's Institutes is true as a general proposition, namely, that "In a pledge of moveables the creditor who quits possession of the subject loses the real right he had upon it" and that a lien entails continuance of possession, but he contended that delivery of the article subject to the lien for a limited and specific purpose and with the intention of maintaining the lien was not such an interruption of possession as to destroy the bailee's rights. I am of opinion that this view of the law is correct. [See hereon North Western Bank Limited v. Poynter ([1895] A.C., 56).]

It therefore became necessary for me to determine as a fact in what circumstances the defendants parted with the possession of these cabs to Botfield and whether such parting was an abandonment of their lien. On this part of the case I had the evidence of Mr. Hind, and I am satisfied, and I find as a fact, that after Botfield had become indebted to the defendants he was allowed to take the cabs out only for the purpose of earning money, part of which was to discharge his indebtedness; that he was allowed to take the cabs out only on his promise to return them to the defendants' garage each night; that the cabs were to be deemed "in pawn" to the defendants; and that the defendants had no intention of abandoning any right of any kind—including lien—which they might have dependent upon the physical custody of the cabs. Upon this finding of fact I hold that the defendants did not cease to have continuous possession so as to destroy their lien over these cabs.

That brings me to the last of Mr. Cave's contentions, viz., that the work done on these cabs was work of maintenance and not of improvement or real repair and was not the subject of lien. In support of this contention he cited the case of Hatton v. Car Maintenance Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 275 ; [1915] 1 Ch., 621). In that case a fixed yearly sum was paid for the hire, equipment, and maintenance of a car—such maintenance to include necessary repairs. It was held by Mr. Justice Sargant that such an agreement did not give a repairer's lien. If I may very respectfully say so, I entirely agree—and if the facts in this case were the same as in that I should consider myself bound by it and should follow it. But the facts in this case are very different. Here the work done by the defendants for which they claim their lien was repair work quite apart from maintenance—there was no fixed price—and the artificer's lien arises in this case just as much, in my view, as though the cabs had been taken for repair to some outside engineering firm who had nothing whatever to do with garaging, equipping, or maintaining them.

For these reasons I think that, holding as I do on the authority of Mr. Justice Rowlatt that a lien may arise in this case, the defendants have done nothing to prevent them from exercising it ; that a lien has arisen ; that they have lawfully asserted it ; and that there must be judgment for them with costs and, subject to any application, an order that the money in Court should be paid out to them.

McLEOD v. DOWLING.*

Partnership — Dissolution — Notice by one partner to determine partnership — Death of that partner before receipt of notice by other partner — Whether partnership dissolved by notice or by death — Partnership Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 39), ss. 32, 33 (1).

By section 32 of the Partnership Act, 1890, " Subject to any agreement between the partners a partnership is dissolved . . . (c) If entered into for an undefined time, by any partner giving notice to the other or others of his intention to dissolve the partnership. In the last-mentioned case the partnership is dissolved as from the date mentioned in the notice as the date of dissolution, or, if no date is mentioned, as from the date of the communication of the notice."

By section 33 (1), " Subject to any agreement between the partners, every partnership is dissolved as regards all the partners by the death or bankruptcy of any partner."

Held, that where a partner sends by post a notice to the other partner to determine the partnership as from the date of the notice and dies before the other partner receives the notice, the partnership is dissolved not by the notice but by the death of the partner sending it, inasmuch as the statutory dissolution by notice is not brought about until receipt of the notice. In such a case, therefore, the surviving partner has the rights which by the terms of the partnership he is to have on the death of a partner during the partnership.

The plaintiffs in this action, Messrs. Roderick and Donald McLeod, were the executors of the will of Mr. Llewellyn Wynn McLeod. The defendant, Mr. Henry Barré Dowling, and Mr. Llewellyn Wynn McLeod, entered into partnership on April 13, 1913. The articles of partnership provided that they should carry on in partnership the profession of solicitors for seven years under the name of McLeod, Eyre, Dowling and Co., at No. 6, New-square, Lincoln's Inn. If either partner died during the term of the partnership, the surviving partner was to be exclusively entitled to the business and goodwill of the partnership, the surviving partner to pay for three years to the executors of the deceased partner one-third of the profit costs derived from the business of the deceased partner's clients. The defendant said that this provision was only to apply during the term of the seven years.

After the partnership had expired without any new agreement being made the partnership was still carried on at No. 6, and later at No. 1, New-square.

By a notice in writing dated February 23, 1927, Mr. L. W. McLeod gave notice to the defendant to determine the partnership on April 20, 1927. Later, by a notice dated March 23, 1927, he gave notice to the defendant to determine the partnership as from that date—namely, March 23. The notice was posted at Surbiton between 3 and 4 p.m. on March 23, and was received by the defendant on March 24 at 10 a.m.

Mr. L. W. McLeod died on March 24, 1927, at 3.15 a.m. The plaintiffs contended that the partnership was determined by the notice as from March 23, 1927. The defendant submitted that it was determined by the death of Mr. L. W. McLeod on March 24, 1927, and that he (the defendant) was exclusively entitled to the business and goodwill. The defendant circularized his late partner's clients and informed them that he proposed to carry on the business under the name of McLeod, Eyre, Dowling and Co.

On April 5, 1927, the defendant was appointed receiver of the partnership business until the trial of the action. The plaintiffs asked for a declaration that the partnership was dissolved as from March 23, 1927 ; that the provisions in the articles relating to the death of either party had no application ; and that the affairs of the partnership be wound up and adjusted with proper accounts and inquiries.

Mr. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. J. G. Joseph appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Owen Thompson, K.C., and Mr. Danckwerts for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Russell, in the course of his judgment, said that the question was whether the notice of March 23 was effectual to dissolve the partnership so that the assets and goodwill must be realized and the proceeds divided between the partners in equal shares, or whether it was dissolved by the death of the partner. This depended on the true construction of sections 32 and 33 of the Partnership Act, 1890.

* Reported by J. B. B. MacMahon, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 32 provided :—"Subject to any agreement between the partners a partnership is dissolved . . .

"(c) If entered into for an undefined time, by any partner giving notice to the other or others of his intention to dissolve the partnership.

"In the last-mentioned case the partnership is dissolved as from the date mentioned in the notice as the date of dissolution, or, if no date is so mentioned, as from the date of the communication of the notice."

Section 33 (1) provided :—

"Subject to any agreement between the partners, every partnership is dissolved as regards all the partners by the death or bankruptcy of any partner."

In his view section 32 dealt with two things—first, dissolution ; and, secondly, the date from which the dissolution should run. The enacting part of the section which brought about the statutory dissolution was the first part and it provided that a partnership was dissolved by any partner giving notice to the other. In his opinion that statutory dissolution was not brought about until notice had been given by partner A to partner B—i.e., until partner B, or his authorized agent, had received the notice. Section 32 did not come into operation as to subhead (c) until notice had been received by the defendant. By that time the partnership had been dissolved by the death of Mr. McLeod.

It was said that the provision in the articles that the surviving partner should pay over one-third of the profits derived from his deceased partner's clients only applied during the term of the partnership—i.e., during the seven years. But the law was that after a partnership had expired and, without any new agreement, was carried on as a partnership at will, such articles of the old partnership as were not inconsistent applied to the new partnership. In his opinion the agreement to pay over the one-third of the profits was quite consistent with the partnership at will.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. METROPOLITAN WATER BOARD.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Water authority—Interest on stock and debentures—Deduction and retention of tax—Whether interest paid out of profits not brought into charge—Liability to account for tax—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), All Schedules Rules, Rules 19, 21.

The profits of the Metropolitan Water Board are assessable under Schedule A, No. III., Rule 3, of the Income Tax Act, 1918, by reference to the profits of the year preceding the year of assessment. The accounts of the Board for the year ending March 31, 1922, showed a loss, and therefore no assessment was made on the Board under Schedule A, No. III., for the year ending April 5, 1923. The accounts for the year ending March 31, 1923, showed a profit of over two millions, out of which the Board paid over one million interest on water stock and debentures, deducting and retaining the income-tax thereon. On an information claiming that under Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules the Board was liable to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the amount of the tax so deducted, the Board contended that the interest paid for the year 1922-23 was payable out of profits brought into charge for 1922-23 within Rule 19 of the All Schedules Rules and was in fact paid out of the profits for 1922-23, and that, although the income-tax for 1922-23 was to be measured by the profits of the preceding year, the profits for 1922-23 had been brought into charge, and Rule 21 did not apply.

Held, that as the Board had been assessed at zero under Schedule A for 1922-23, the interest had not been paid out of profits brought into charge, and the Crown was entitled to succeed.

This was an information in which the Attorney-General claimed £409,000 odd from the Metropolitan Water Board, being the amount of tax on interest paid on water stock and on other annual payments made in the year ending April 5, 1923. The amount of the payments was £1,668,351, and the sum claimed represented income-tax at the rate of 5s. in the pound, the rate in force at the time when the interest was paid, less £8,027 odd, tax on profits and gains otherwise brought into charge.

For the year ending April 5, 1923, the interest payable by the Board on water stock issued by them or on redeemable Debentures in respect of which they had assumed liability and certain other annual payments due from them amounted to £1,730,751 16s. 10d. Part of that sum was paid without deduction of income-tax, but from the remainder—£1,668,351—£435,617 3s. was deducted and retained as representing the tax thereon at the rate or rates in force during the period through which the interest and other annual payments of which the sum of £1,668,351 0s. 7d. was composed was accruing due. Income-tax on £1,668,351 0s. 7d., at the rate of 5s. in the pound, being the rate in force during the year ending April 5, 1923, amounted to £417,087 15s. 2d.

The profits of the Board were assessable under Schedule A in accordance with Schedule A, No. III., Rule 3, of the Income Tax Act, 1918, by reference to the profits of the year preceding the year of assessment. For the year to March 31, 1923, the Board's accounts relating to the undertaking showed (after adjustment for income-tax purposes) a profit of £2,481,085, out of which the Board paid the interest referred to. That figure formed the basis for an assessment under Schedule A, No. III., made upon the Board for the year ending April 5, 1924, against the amount of which assessment an allowance (including sums carried forward from previous years) in respect of wear and tear of plant and machinery fell to be made to the amount of £798,328, leaving a net figure of £1,682,757 for that year.

The accounts relating to the undertaking of the Board for the year to March 31, 1922, disclosed (after adjustment for income-tax purposes) a loss of £57,366 3s. 2d., and therefore no assessment was due to be made or was made upon the Board under Schedule A, No. III., for the year ending April 5,

* Reported by G. F. L. BRIDGMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1923. The increase in the profit made in the year to March 31, 1923, was due to the fact that the Board was enabled to raise its charges to the public in consequence of the passing of the Metropolitan Water Board (Charges) Act, 1921, which came into force on April 1, 1922.

The Board for the year ending March 31, 1923, paid income-tax or suffered tax by deduction in respect of other income to the extent of £8,027 12s. 3d., on the amount of £32,110 9s. 0d., made up as follows :—

	Amount.	Tax paid or deducted.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
Rent receivable (Sch. A)	7,293 3 1	1,823 5 9
Property owned and occupied by the Board (Sch. A)	11,849 14 0	2,962 8 6
Interest on Investments (excluding investments of accumulating Redemption Fund) ..	12,967 11 11	3,241 18 0
	£32,110 9 0	£8,027 12 3

The Board also suffered tax by deduction for the year on £5,019 interest on investments of an accumulating redemption fund, but for the purposes of this case it was agreed that that interest was not to be taken into account, and except as aforesaid the Board did not become liable to pay by deduction or otherwise any income-tax in the year ending March 31, 1923.

The Attorney-General contended that for the year ending April 5, 1923, the Board was liable to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under Rule 21 of the General Rules applicable to all Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the sum of £409,060 2s. 11d., made up as follows :—

Tax at the rate of 5s. in the £ in respect of interest and annual payments		£417,087 15 2
Less tax on taxed income,	£32,110 9s. 0d.	£8,027 12 3
		£409,060 2 11

The Board contended that the interest on the water stock and on the redeemable debentures and the annual payments referred to paid by the Board for the year 1922-23 were payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax within Rule 19 of the said Rules ; that the profits or gains of the Board brought into charge to tax for the year 1922-23 were the profits of the Board of that year (namely, the said £2,481,085), though the liability to income-tax for that year was to be measured by the amount of the profits of the preceding year, and that was so whether there were profits of the preceding year or not ; that the profits or gains of the Board brought into charge to tax for the year 1922-23 were sufficient in amount to meet the interest and annual payments payable for that year, and the interest was in fact paid and the annual payments were in fact made out of these profits or gains ; that the fact that no assessment was or could be made on the Board for the year 1922-23 was irrelevant ; that the Board was entitled, under Rule 19 of the Rules, to retain for itself the income-tax deducted on payment of the interest and annual payments ; and that Rule 21 of the Rules had no application to this case.

Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King for the Board.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that the question for him to decide was whether the interest and payment in question had been paid by the Board out of "profits or gains brought into charge to tax" within Rule 19. What was brought into charge in any income-tax year of assessment was the profit of that year, which might be calculated or estimated by reference to some other year, or to a series of years, or to anything that the Legislature might choose to set up as a standard of calculation. But the subject-matter of the charge was the profits and gains of the year of charge.

Were the interest and payments in the present case, which were paid in the year ending April 5, 1923, paid out of the profits or gains brought into charge, not necessarily in that year, because if the Board had profits and gains brought into charge in previous years and had carried them forward and used them to liquidate the interest and other payments, they would be none the less profits or gains brought into charge ? He had not, however, heard of any amount being carried forward from previous years. All the profits or gains brought into charge of which he had heard were those brought in at the figure of zero. The Board could not pay £1,600,000 odd out of nothing. But Mr. Latter had said that, while zero was the figure at which the Board had been assessed, the profit of the year was really £2,481,085, and that the interest and other payments had been paid out of that money. He (his Lordship) knew nothing of that figure. The only figure which he could regard was that which appeared as profits and gains in the assessment relating to the year in question.

The Crown were entitled to succeed, and there would be judgment accordingly for the amount claimed, with costs.

A stay of execution was granted.

Court of Appeal.

WILLIS v. WILLIS.*

Divorce — Restitution of conjugal rights — Judicial separation — Settlement of suit — Deed of separation—Agreement to execute—Term as to custody of child — Refusal by agreed custodian—Whether settlement prevented from being carried into effect.

The Court held that where the parties to a matrimonial suit had agreed to settle it upon certain terms, and a deed of separation had been approved to give effect to such settlement, the refusal of the husband's brother to undertake the custody of one of the children, as nominee of the husband, which custody had been agreed on between the husband and wife as one of the terms of the deed, was not a failure of such a vital term as to prevent the settlement from being carried into effect.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Bateson, who had refused to order the petitioner, the husband, to execute a deed of separation, the heads of which had been agreed on by the parties, and had restored the cause to the list on the ground that, owing to the husband's brother having refused to accept the custody of a child of the marriage, the agreement could not be carried into effect.

The husband, Commander A. U. Willis, presented a petition for restitution of conjugal rights on February 18, 1926. The wife, Mrs. Olive Christine Willis, pleaded just cause and prayed for judicial separation and for the custody of the two children of the marriage, Mary, born in December, 1917, and Joan, born in July, 1920. In November, 1926, the petitioner obtained an order that the children should go and stay with his brother and sister-in-law Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Willis, during his (the petitioner's) Christmas leave.

The suit came on for hearing on February 10, 1927, before Mr. Justice Hill, who thought that the case was one which ought to be settled. On February 11 the parties ultimately agreed to certain terms of settlement which were put into writing and signed by them. It was provided that the terms should be filed and made a rule of Court and any dispute as to the terms of the deed of separation was to be settled by counsel, Mr. C. Talbot-Ponsonby, on behalf of both parties.

A separation deed was drafted and settled on behalf of the parties by Mr. Talbot-Ponsonby. The terms of the deed were embodied in ten items. On May 12 the petitioner's solicitors wrote stating that their client refused to execute the deed as drawn, on the ground that an essential term could not be carried into effect.

One of the terms agreed on was that the legal custody of the elder child, Mary, should be entrusted to the petitioner's brother, Mr. H. J. Willis, though she was to continue to live with her mother. Mr. H. J. Willis refused to undertake the custody of the child under those conditions. He said that he had been asked to undertake certain duties and responsibilities which he was unable to fulfil unless he was given the actual custody of the child and the right of access to her and was made a party to the deed. Thereupon a summons was taken out by the wife asking that the husband should be ordered to execute the deed. The husband took out a summons to have the case restored to the list for hearing.

Mr. Justice Bateson, before whom the summonses came, made no order on the first, but on the second summons ordered the case to be restored to the list. He gave leave to appeal on each summons. The wife appealed.

Mr. Willis, K.C., and the Hon. Victor Russell appeared for the appellant; Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., and Mr. T. Bucknill for the husband. Mr. J. M. Tucker held a watching brief for the husband's brother, Mr. H. J. Willis.

The Master of the Rolls, in the course of his judgment, said that the case raised an important question not only for the parties, but possibly for many other persons in a similar position. His Lordship stated the facts, and proceeded:—One of the terms of the deed of separation was that the custody of the elder child should be given to the petitioner's brother, Mr. H. J. Willis. The term "custody" did not mean actual physical custody, but the right to control. Having regard to charges which had been made by the wife against the husband, partly with regard to the children, which charges, however, had been withdrawn, it was important that custody should be carefully provided for.

There were a number of points in the deed which counsel who settled it had to attend to, including the question whether the money paid for maintenance and education of the children should be paid free of income-tax or not. His Lordship then read the letter from Messrs. Martyns and Gane, solicitors for Mr. H. J. Willis. When that letter was sent it was taken to mean that Mr. H. J. Willis had refused to accept the deed as drawn and that his refusal went to the essence of the settlement and prevented its terms from being carried into effect. The basis of Mr. Justice Bateson's decision was this: He accepted the argument that, as Mr. H. J. Willis had refused to accede to the terms of the settlement, the whole fabric of the settlement had fallen to the ground. In taking that view he followed the principle laid down in F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company, Limited v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 677; [1916] 2 A.C., 397), where Lord Loreburn (at p. 403) said:—

"But a Court can and ought to examine the contract and the circumstances in which it was made, not, of course, to vary, but only to explain it, in order to see whether or not from the nature of it the parties must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular thing or state of things would continue to exist. And if they must have done so, then a term to that effect will be implied, though it be not expressed in the contract."

Mr. Justice Bateson took the view that Mr. H. J. Willis's refusal upset the whole of the contract. He (the Master of the Rolls) did not share that view. It did not appear to him that the settlement fell to the ground. It was necessary to consider the facts. The primary issue between the parties, one of whom was petitioning for restitution of conjugal rights, the other for separation, was separation or no separation. They agreed to execute a deed of separation with all the usual covenants and that all charges should be withdrawn.

The importance of an agreement was not to be measured by the length of time taken in reading it. There were a number of clauses in the agreement about which no difficulty arose at all, the only real difficulty being as to the custody of the child, Mary. It would be quite wrong to suppose that that difficulty brought the agreement to an end. The agreement as to its general terms remained a valid and operative agreement between the parties. The Court, therefore, must allow the wife's appeal and discharge the order restoring the cause to the list for hearing.

The Court thought that the Judge was wrong in refusing to make any order, but they would remit the case to him to consider, without defining exactly what order he ought to make. It had been represented to the Court by counsel on both sides that the case presented great difficulties and he could well believe it, but the difficulties were not such as to upset the settlement. The best opinion of conveyancers was that Mr. H. J. Willis ought not to be a party to the separation deed. He (his Lordship) would only add that he hoped that an effort would be made on both sides finally to settle the case not only in the parties' own interests, but in those of the children, and he would remind them of the old saying: "Where there's a will, there's a way."

Lord Justice Sargant and Lord Justice Lawrence delivered judgment to the same effect.

IN RE THE PETITION OF CLAYTON.*

Legitimation — Procedure — Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), ss. 188, 226 ; Sched. VI.— Legitimation Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 60), s. 2 (1).

This was a summons adjourned into Court in which an application was made for his Lordship's directions with regard to a proposed petition by a woman for a declaration of legitimacy of her three children under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, as amended by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and the Legitimacy Act, 1926.

Mr. H. Durley Grazebrook said that no question of any claim to inherit specific property arose, and a direction was sought as to the procedure to be followed for a declaration of legitimation under the Act of 1926, which provided by section 1 (1) that "where the parents of an illegitimate person marry or have married one another . . . the marriage shall . . . render that person if living legitimate from the commencement of this Act, or from the date of marriage, whichever last happens."

Counsel pointed out that section 2 (1) of the Act provided for a petition to be presented under the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, by the person seeking to be legitimated, but the draughtsman had not observed that the whole of that Act, except for two and a half lines, had been repealed and re-enacted by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, sections 188 and 226, and Schedule VI.

The President.—Until it is authoritatively decided to the contrary I shall be ready to proceed on the footing that this is a manifest slip on the part of the draughtsman. But the effect of the re-enactment is clear. The party to be legitimated must be the actual claimant. His Lordship recalled that the infant claimant in Slingsby v. Attorney-General (33 The Times L.R., 120) proceeded through his guardian.

Mr. Grazebrook said that here two of the children were of age and could proceed by themselves, and that the third was under age. He submitted that three persons might join in one petition.

The President.—Each of the children is a competent suitor and if each presents a separate petition the proper procedure would be to hear them together with one set of affidavits and one body of evidence. As regards the question of a comprehensive petition, on some future occasion an ingenious person might wish to complicate an application by advancing a plea on behalf of all the claimants which applied only to one or more of them and not to all of them. I give leave to proceed in this case on one body of evidence and three petitions. Before filing the petitions notice should be given to the Attorney-General of the application in the three cases and the Court will direct the petitions to be filed within one month of the notice to the Attorney-General.

Mr. Grazebrook pointed out that in the County Court rules on this subject it was provided that the petition itself should be served on the Attorney-General.

The President.—What I have indicated to you is an effectual mode of dealing with the matter in this Court. Your difficulty will be that you will have to deal with the position of interested parties. You must take care that everybody is before the Court whose interests may be affected, including possibly the next-of-kin of the putative father.

PICKFORD v. QUIRKE.
PICKFORD v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Carrying on trade— Successive adventures—Additional assessment —When made—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 125 (2).

During the Lancashire cotton "boom" of 1919, the appellant, in company with other persons, engaged in the operation known as "turning over" a cotton mill, i.e., acquiring a controlling interest in the mill, organizing its administration and finances and re-selling it. The operation was successful, and the appellant was asked to join, and did join, several further syndicates engaged in "turning over" other mills. In each case a profit resulted to the appellant. On March 24, 1923, the Additional Commissioners for the Division in which the appellant resided signed the book containing an estimated assessment upon the appellant to income-tax under Schedule D for the year 1919-20. The book was not delivered to the General Commissioners until April 18, 1923 ; notice was given to the appellant on May 5, 1923, and the assessment was signed by the General Commissioners on September 5, 1923.

Held, that though each adventure of "turning over" a mill was not a trade, the succession of such adventures, in each of which the appellant took part, might constitute the carrying on of a trade by him.

Held, also, that the assessment was in time, having been made by the Additional Commissioners within the three years allowed by s. 125 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The subsequent steps need not be within that time.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

G. Pickford (the appellant) appealed against an assessment to income-tax (Schedule D) in the sum of £15,000 for the year ending April 5, 1920, made upon him in respect of promotion profits by the Additional Commissioners for the division of Middleton in the County of Lancaster under the provisions of the Income Tax Acts.

The assessment was an estimated assessment made in the absence of a return. The book of assessment in which this assessment was included was signed by the Additional Commissioners on March 24, 1923, but was not delivered to the General Commissioners until April 18, 1923. Notice of the assessment was not sent to the appellant until May 5, 1923, and the assessment was not signed by the General Commissioners until September 5, 1923.

In the year 1919 there was a boom in the Lancashire cotton spinning trade. Many spinning mills were being sold by their old proprietors or were passing from one set of shareholders to another. When the shares in a spinning company changed hands it often happened that the old mill-manager was dismissed by the new Board of Directors and a new one was engaged who was personally known to the group of men who had obtained control of the business. As a consequence of this the position of mill-managers in 1919 tended to become insecure and their future prospects were uncertain.

In 1919 John William Wroe was manager of the Commercial Mills Spinning Company, Limited (the old company), which owned a spinning mill in Oldham. It was within his knowledge that many mills in the neighbourhood were passing to new proprietors and that another local spinning company had been considering the desirability of purchasing the shares in the old company with a view to working the two mills with one manager. These things made Mr. Wroe anxious about his position, foreseeing as he did that if the Commercial Mill passed under the control of men who were strangers to him he would very likely lose his situation. He approached Mr. Charles Henry Pickford, the chairman of the directors of the old company, and put the position before him. Mr. C. H. Pickford, who was about 70 years old and was prepared to sell his shares and to retire from business, appreciated Mr. Wroe's position and suggested to him that he might join forces with his son, Mr. George Pickford (the appellant) and buy out the shareholders of the old company. Mr. George Pickford was manager of one spinning company in the neighbourhood and was director of another, and his father was desirous that in the event of a change in the proprietorship of the old company his son should have a chance of succeeding him.

Mr. Wroe then sought out the appellant and enlisted his support for the enterprise. They were joined by Mr. Thomas Norcliffe, one of the directors of the old company, who wanted to remain on the Board, even if the shares in the old company changed hands. The combined resources of these three, G. Pickford (the appellant), J. W. Wroe, and T. Norcliffe, proving insufficient for a transaction of the size contemplated, they decided to invite two other men engaged in the cotton trade to join with them. These were Mr. J. S. Higham, proprietor of a cotton mill in Oldham, and Mr. Frank Partington, manager and director of another company owning a mill in the same locality. Those five persons were able between them to command sufficient funds or credit to undertake the purchase of all the shares in the old company.

Negotiations were opened with the old company, with the result that Messrs. G. Pickford (the appellant), J. S. Higham, T. Norcliffe, F. Partington, and J. W. Wroe (the five associated persons) bought, in August, 1919, all the shares in the old company for the sum of £118,770, which included a sum of £6,600 paid to the directors of the old company for loss of office. They then determined to liquidate the old company and to form a new company to be named "Commercial Mills Spinning Company (1919), Limited" (the new company), which should buy from the liquidator all the assets and liabilities of the old company at a net price of £150,000. They also determined that the capital of the new company should be £150,000, divided into 150,000 ordinary shares of £1 each, and that 10s. only per share should be paid up upon allotment. The five associated persons anticipated that upon the issue of the shares in the new company the said shares would be saleable at a price in excess of the 10s. per share which was to be paid on allotment.

The appellant and J. S. Higham, acting for the five associated persons, then entered into an agreement dated November 10, 1919, with an agent on behalf of the proposed new company, which, after reciting (a) that the appellant and J. S. Higham had purchased all the shares in the old company; (b) that the new company was to be formed to buy, for a net sum of £150,000, all the assets of the old company subject to the liabilities of the old company; and (c) that it was anticipated that the shares in the new company would immediately after issue be bought and sold at a premium, provided, inter alia, as follow:—

"(1) The said George Pickford and John Samuel Higham shall keep and retain for their own benefit and without being liable to account therefor to anybody whomsoever all profit which they may have made or may make by reason of their purchase of the shares in the old company and the said sale to the new company.

"(2) The directors of the new company may allot the shares in the new company at par to any person or persons whomsoever, including themselves, notwithstanding that a premium may be obtainable therefor, and if any of them shall make any profit by selling the said shares at a premium he shall not be liable to account therefor to the new company or to anybody whomsoever."

The old company went into voluntary liquidation, the new company was duly incorporated on November 13, 1919, the five associated persons being the directors of the new company, and the agreement referred to was adopted by the new company on December 8, 1919. The five associated persons received £150,000 from the liquidator of the old company in their capacities as shareholders in the old company, and they allotted to themselves all the shares (150,000 of £1 each, 10s. paid up) in the new company. Having been allotted all the shares in the new company the five associated persons retained 2,000 shares each as directors' qualification shares and sold the remainder at the price of 12s. 6d a share. At no material time had any further call been made upon the said shares.

For the purposes of these transactions a bank account was opened in the joint names of the five associated persons into which was paid the amount received from the liquidator of the old company and the amounts which they received on the sale of the shares in the new company, and out of which was paid (with the help of a loan from the bank when necessary) the amount which they paid for the purchase of the shares in the old company and the amount which they paid to take up the shares in the new company. The balance of this account represented their total profit on the whole transaction, and this was divided into five equal parts and distributed among the five associated persons, who immediately placed their respective shares of profit on loan with the new company.

Transactions of this nature (which were known locally as "turning over a mill") were very common in Lancashire at that time. Before the proceedings in connexion with "turning over" the Commercial Mill had been formally completed, the appellant was approached by a Mr. Ogden, who was then manager of the Glodwick Mill, with the suggestion that he would perform a similar operation in connexion with the Glodwick Mill.

The case set out in detail the facts relating to the "turning over" by the appellant of the Glodwick Mill and of two other mills called the Lime Mill and the Olive Mill. He declined to be concerned in a large number of others.

Evidence was given by the appellant to the effect that he had been engaged in the cotton trade in Oldham from his youth up; that his object in the above-mentioned transactions was to improve his position in that trade by becoming a director of cotton spinning companies; and that at the time when he and the persons associated with him were selling the shares in the four companies concerned to the public at 2s. 6d. a share premium the state of the trade and of the cotton share market was such that they would have had no difficulty in obtaining a much larger premium.

At the time of the hearing of the appeal the appellant was still a director of the four new companies formed in connexion with the aforesaid transactions, holding shares in those companies and having money on loan with those companies.

It was contended for the appellant:—(a) That the signing of the assessment by the Additional Commissioners did not constitute the making of an assessment and that the assessment appealed against was therefore invalid as not having been "made" within three years after the expiration of the year of assessment; (b) that the appellant was not in these transactions carrying on a trade the profits of which were assessable under Case I. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918; (c) that the profits arising to the appellant from these transactions were not assessable under Case VI. of Schedule D; and (d) that the assessment should be discharged.

For the Crown it was contended:—(1) (a) That it was not competent for the appellant to raise, or for the Special Commissioners to decide, in proceedings by way of appeal against an assessment, the question whether in making that assessment the procedure prescribed by the Income Tax Acts had been strictly followed, and that, therefore, no evidence as to the dates upon which the assessment in question was signed should be received by the Special Commissioners; alternatively, (b) that the assessment was "made" when it was signed by the Additional Commissioners and that, therefore, it was made within the time limited by law.

(2) That the profits arising to the appellant from the four transactions in question were assessable under Case I. of Schedule D, as being profits of a trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade.

(3) That, alternatively, the profits so made were assessable under Case VI. of Schedule D.

The Special Commissioners who heard the appeal, having taken time to consider their finding, held on the appellant's first contention (being of opinion that they had power to decide the matter) that the assessment was "made" when it was signed by the Additional Commissioners before April 5, 1923, and was therefore made in due time. On the appellant's other contentions they gave their decision in principle in the following terms:—

"The present is one of a series of appeals which have been brought before us arising out of the conditions prevalent during the Lancashire cotton boom of 1919-20. The appellant has entered into four transactions involving in each case the purchase by himself and others of the shares of a company owning a spinning mill, the liquidation of the company, and the formation of a new company. This was known locally as 'turning over a mill.'

"The result of these transactions is that the appellant has been able to accomplish what was upon the evidence his main object in them, that is to say, to establish himself in a position of power as a director of the new companies. We accept the evidence that this was the primary object which he had in mind when entering into these transactions.

"In the circumstances obtaining at the time in the cotton trade it was possible for the appellant so to arrange matters that each transaction should, when it was concluded, leave a profit in his hands. It was, moreover, necessary, if the appellant's ambition to become a director of several companies was to be achieved, that the transactions should be successful as measured in terms of money, for the appellant was without the means or credit to carry through more than one or two transactions at most without such success, and if the first transaction had resulted in a loss the others would probably not have followed.

"In our view the transactions considered separately are capital transactions, and the first transaction, considered by itself, would not have constituted a trade nor would it have attracted liability to income-tax under Case VI. of Schedule D. As, however, there was more than one transaction we have to ask ourselves whether, when all the four transactions are regarded together, the appellant can be said to have entered 'habitually' into profitable contracts in such a sense as to constitute the four transactions, into which he did enter, a trade; in other words, stating the matter in the language of the day, 'did he make a business of "turning mills over"?'

"In deciding this question we have to remember that the appellant did not try to make as much immediate profit as he might quite easily have made out of the transactions, and declined to enter into many other similar transactions which were offered to him, and cannot, apart from these transactions be regarded as a dealer in shares or securities. We are also asked to have regard to the case of Stott v. Hoddinott (7 Tax Cas., 85). On the other hand the appellant did in fact make a profit on the four transactions in which he took part, and the fact that many other similar transactions were offered to him may be used to show that he was known in the trade to be engaged in transactions of this kind and to be prepared to consider similar offers on their merits.

"The question, as we have stated it, is we think a question of degree. In two other appeals which we heard at the same time as the present appeal the appellants had been concerned in a much larger number of these transactions during the cotton boom, eleven in one case and sixteen in the other, and in those cases we have held that the appellants were making a business of 'turning mills over' and were therefore carrying on a trade within the meaning of the income-tax and excess profits duty Acts. Can we come to a different conclusion in this case because the present appellant had an ambition more modest than theirs and was content with a less commanding position; because, in other words, he did the same things for the same motive in the same way but not so often? Are we to say that he drew back before he reached the point where 'turning mills over' becomes a business? We think, after carefully weighing all the facts that we must decide the question against him, and that the true view is that what he did was done in the course of what must be called a business of turning to his advantage the very peculiar conditions of the period during which the transactions took place.

"We hold accordingly that he is liable to excess profits duty and income-tax, and we must ask the two sides to agree figures to include his total profits from the transactions."

On the basis of this decision the liability to income-tax (Schedule D) was agreed by the parties to the appeal to be £9,667, and the Special Commissioners accordingly reduced the assessment to that figure. No question arose as to the amount of the assessment, which was agreed.

A second case was stated on the same facts with regard to an assessment to excess profits duty.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Edwardes Jones, K.C., appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

At the conclusion of Mr. Latter's argument on behalf of the appellant,

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said:—I do not think I need trouble you, Mr. Attorney, not out of want of respect for Mr. Latter's argument but really because he has put it so fully and completely that I think I am already clear that his points fail.

His first point is that this matter is concluded by a previous decision. The case stands thus: This gentleman associated himself with other gentlemen, in different combinations, in what is called turning over four cotton mills; that is to say, he acquired them and disposed of them to a new company in a way that showed a balance in his favour. He did that, as I say, in four cases, in each case in combination with other gentlemen and not always the same gentlemen. In each of these four cases it was held that his action was not the carrying on of a trade. Now he has been assessed in respect of the result to himself of the four adventures or four transactions combined into one, and it has been decided by the Special Commissioners that in that respect he was carrying on an adventure in the nature of trade. Now, of course, it is very well known that one transaction of buying and selling a thing does not make a man a trader, but if it is repeated and becomes systematic, then he becomes a trader, and the profits of the transaction, not taxable so long as they remain isolated, become taxable as items in the trade as a whole; of course losses being set against profits, and all then being combined into one trade. Now I do not understand how it can be said that the first decision concludes the second. The second depends upon an issue which never arose and was never dealt with, either by decision or by admission or by assumption in the first case; it never came into it at all. It was held that the individual transactions were not adventures in the nature of trade and were not taxable. So be it. But consistently with that, and consistently with every element in that view, it can be held that as a whole these transactions, so far as the appellant took part in them, were a trade, adventure, or concern on his part. That really is the end of it. If he had not had any associates and it was held that he alone was not trading in respect of such transactions as these taken separately, it could still have been held that when they are all taken together he was carrying on a trade. I do not think there is any difficulty about that at all.

The second point that was taken was this. It was said that if he was to be assessed at all he must be assessed together with the persons with whom he was associated in these transactions. That is the same point again. He was assessed in respect of something different. The assessment on the overriding adventure in the nature of a trade which resulted from his participation in these transactions is not an assessment upon the transactions themselves. It is the same point over again, and I think it fails.

I ought to mention the case of Birt, Potter, and Hughes, Limited v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (6 Annotated Tax Cases, 237). There the question was whether two forms of activity, each of them adventures in the nature of trade, could be combined for the purpose of being assessed together to excess profits duty. The Commissioners there found as a fact that there were two independent trades, and this was an end of it in the view which the Court of Appeal took. Here the Special Commissioners have found as regards the independent transactions one by one that there was no trade, but that in respect of this gentleman's participation there was a trade. I cannot see how that case bears upon this one at all; it seems to me to be in an entirely different region.

The third point was a point of time. The assessment on this unfortunate gentleman is an additional first assessment, which may be made within three years of the expiration of the year of assessment under section 125 of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The three years expired on April 6, 1923. In March, 1923, the Additional Commissioners made this additional first assessment. When I say they made it, I do not want to beg the question. The Additional Commissioners at that time entered this assessment and signed it; it was not until after April 6, 1923, that they sent it on to the General Commissioners; of course it was long afterwards that the General Commissioners signed and allowed it and it was necessarily after that sending to the General Commissioners that the subject had notice of it. Now it is said that there was no additional first assessment made within section 125 (2) before April 6, 1923; in a word, that it was not made by the Additional Commissioners when they entered it in their book and signed it. Now the Act of Parliament here is imposing a time limit and it can make the time limit apply to any step in the proceedings that it chooses. It is perfectly true that what the Additional Commissioners did in March, 1923, did not impose upon the subject a liability to pay. That is quite clear from Lord Wrenbury's decision in Kensington Income Tax Commissioners v. Aramayo (31 The Times L.R., 606; [1916] 1 A.C., 215), and it is clear from the decision of Mr. Justice Bankes (as he then was) in the action that was brought for wrongful distress in the case of Berry v. Farrow (30 The Times L.R., 129; [1914] 1 K.B., 632), because there the distress was made and until the subject was liable the distress could not properly be made. That is perfectly true. It is also perfectly true that, when section 32 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, which was passed to remedy the difficulty disclosed in the Aramayo case in the Court of Appeal (30 The Times L.R., 574; [1914] 3 K.B., 429), used the word "charge," it was referring to the allowance by the General Commissioners when the subject first becomes liable. That is all perfectly true, but I have simply to look at section 125 (2) of the Act of 1918 and to see what is the step that must be taken within the three years. That is all that I have got to see. Whatever that step may be in its effect, what is the step that the subsection is mentioning? It says "An additional first assessment may be made." What does that mean? I go to the part of the section which creates the thing that is being alluded to. Here it is; at the very end of section 125 (1) it says this: "Where the tax is chargeable under Schedule D, the Additional Commissioners shall make an assessment on the person chargeable, in an additional first assessment . . . and any such assessment shall be subject to objection by the surveyor, and to appeal." Now what is subject to objection by the surveyor and to appeal, is of course what the Additional Commissioners do before it becomes an effective charge upon the subject. But here, what the Additional Commissioners did was to make an assessment in an additional first assessment, and when the next subsection says that an additional first assessment may be made I really cannot see how it can be said that reference is not being made to the making of an assessment in an additional first assessment mentioned at the end of section 125, and that is the act of the Additional Commissioners. Now I think it is quite clear (and section 52 (2) of the Taxes Management Act of 1880, which this section replaces, makes it quite obvious) that before this Act the result was as I have described, because there it says : "The Additional Commissioners shall at any time after the said first assessments have been signed and allowed, but within four months after the expiration of the year to which such first assessments relate make an assessment on any such person in an additional first assessment." Therefore the whole thing is grouped under one verb, the act and the time limit as well. But apart from that, even within section 125 I think there is something which throws light upon it because, speaking of Schedules A, B, and E, it says : "(a) If the first assessments have not been signed and allowed, the surveyor shall amend the assessments," i.e., if he finds something which has escaped him. Now it is the surveyor who does it. Nobody could ever say that the General Commissioners are amending or anything of that sort. The surveyor is doing the act of amendment, and subsection (2) requires that it is that act of amendment that shall be done within the period of three years. Therefore it seems to me that one has not read into subsection (2) a reference to the imposition of an exigible liability upon the subject but a reference to this indubitable preliminary act upon the part of the surveyor in the case of amendment and upon the part of the Additional Commissioners in the case of an additional first assessment ; and so that act in this case (subject to a point which I will mention) was done within the time. But it is said, secondly, that although the making referred to here does not refer to the imposition of an effective charge by allowance but refers to what is done by the Additional Commissioners, still even so the making is not complete until notification to the subject, or first of all until delivery to the General Commissioners, or, failing that, at any rate until notice to the subject which comes after delivery to the General Commissioners. I cannot find anything to bear that out. Under section 122 what the Additional Commissioners are to do is this. As their assessments are completed they are to cause to be made out and entered in books provided for the purpose certificates of assessment, and they are to be signed by the Additional Commissioners and to be delivered from time to time to the General Commissioners. But surely when the Additional Commissioners have signed the assessment they have made it ; and when one turns to the form which is in the sixth Schedule, Form 2, headed "Additional Commissioners' Certificate of First Assessments," it begins : "Assessments of income-tax, under Schedule D, made upon the several persons chargeable with the said tax" and so on, "by the Commissioners whose names are signed at the end hereof." Now what is made ? It is the assessment referred to in the Additional Commissioners' certificate of first assessments. That is what is made. Then there follow the particulars of assessment : "We, the undersigned Additional Commissioners of Income Tax . . . do hereby certify the foregoing first assessments under Schedule D," and they sign it. The certificate is signed by the Additional Commissioners ; and then a certificate of allowance is given and signed by the General Commissioners at the end of the document. It seems to me that the assessments are made before delivery to the General Commissioners by the Additional Commissioners when the latter make them in the book and write them and sign the form to which I have drawn attention.

The next point taken was that the assessment was not made until there was notice to the subject, and Mr. Justice Bankes' decision in Berry v. Farrow (supra) was referred to. But the Act does not say so ; I cannot read it in. Mr. Justice Bankes of course uses the expression "no valid assessment was made" because what he was looking for was an assessment in the sense of a liability that was exigible, since the question was whether the distress was lawful. But I cannot find that subsection (2), referring to the making of the additional first assessment by the Additional Commissioners, imports the limitation that it is not to be made until notice of it is given. It is curious that notice to the subject does not seem to be expressly enjoined by the Act, but of course notice must be given before the assessment is signed and allowed by the General Commissioners, because that is not done until the time for appeals against assessments has expired and of course that does not expire until the subject has had notice.

I think, therefore, all these points fail, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

WILLIAMS v. SANDERS.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Schedule A—House let in apartments — Weekly tenancies — Basis of assessment—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule A, No. VII., Rule 8.

Where a house is let in a number of apartments or tenements on weekly tenancies, the correct method of arriving at the annual value of the entire house or tenement for the purpose of charging the landlord to income-tax under No. VII., Rule 8, of Schedule A of the Income Tax Act, 1918, is to ascertain what the value of each of the separate tenements would be if they were let by the year and to add the values together, making the permitted deductions from the total. It is not allowable either (a) to estimate what a hypothetical tenant would give for the whole house on the basis that he could re-let it in tenements at weekly rents, nor (b) to add together the weekly rents and multiply by 52 and then allow a discount for contingencies.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of Income Tax acting for the division of Roborough, South Devon.

Mr. Arthur Lawrence Williams, of 47, York-street, Regent's Park, London (hereinafter called "the appellant"), appealed against an assessment to income-tax, Schedule A, in the sum of £50 gross, made upon him for the year of assessment ending April 5, 1924, in respect of a messuage and premises known as No. 39, Admiralty-street East, Stonehouse, Plymouth, Devon.

The premises consisted of a house or building owned and let by the appellant in four different apartments or tenements under separate weekly tenancies, each terminable upon one week's notice by either landlord or tenant. The four different apartments were occupied by four distinct tenants and their families, with the use in common of the passages, stairs, washhouse, w.c., and front and back entrances. The tenants belonged to the poorer classes and paid for the said apartments the respective weekly rents of 10s. 6d., 7s., 3s. 9d., and 6s., making a weekly aggregate rental of 27s. 3d., the landlord paying all the rates, water rates, and inhabited house duty payable in respect of the said premises. All the said rents were fixed by agreements which commenced within the period of seven years preceding the 5th day of April next before the time of making the assessment appealed against.

The appellant by his representative, Mr. Arthur Body, a rating surveyor, put in evidence the following estimate of the annual value of the said premises, which had been prepared by him in respect of the year ending April 5, 1923, namely :—

Gross income from four weekly tenants if fully occupied—27s. 3d. × 52				£70	17	0
Deduct to convert from four weekly tenements into annual value in one letting of the whole house—20 per cent.				14	3	0
				£56	14	0
Deduct :—
Inhabited house duty £36 at 3d.		9	0
Rates on estimated rateable value £29 at 13s. 2d. ..	19	1	10
Water rate £36 at 4 per cent.	1	3	2
Rack rental value ..				£36	0	0
Deduct statutory allowance for repairs one-fourth ..	9	0	0
Conventionary rent ..	1	12	0
Net				£25	8	0

Mr. Body said in support of this estimate that in arriving at the figures therein contained he assumed that for the purposes of income-tax annual value must be understood to be the rack rent at which the premises were worth to be let by the year and that such rent was to be estimated by considering what a single intending tenant by the year of the whole of such premises so occupied and used would pay the landlord as rent if such tenant bore the usual tenant's rates and taxes ; that to compute such rent it was necessary to consider a hypothetical tenant and the rent which he would give having due regard to what he was able to obtain from actual or hypothetical sub-tenants and the profit which he would expect in recompense for his time and trouble in management ; that in considering the rent such tenant would have regard, and consequently regard should be had by the Commissioners, to the probability of some part of the premises or the whole remaining unlet and on his hands for part of his own period of tenancy ; that the hypothetical tenant of the whole of such premises would not be of the same class of persons as those tenanting mere apartments or tenements in such premises nor moved to acquire the tenancy by the same objects ; and that in consequence the actual rents paid for the separate tenements must be regarded as only a factor or element to be taken into account and not a starting point or basis of calculation in computing the rack rent at which the house or building was worth to be let by the year.

It was not suggested by Mr. Body that the rents actually payable for the separate tenements were capable of increase or decrease, nor that a single tenant of the whole premises could be obtained save for the purpose of farming out these premises at rents corresponding to those actually payable.

It was given in evidence that considerable sums of rent were in arrear ; that the chance of recovery of these arrears was small, and that losses due to sickness, unemployment, poverty, and dishonesty were invariably attendant on this class of tenancy and type of tenant.

The assessment of the property for 1922-23 for poor rate purposes was £28 gross, £22 rateable, and the actual rates paid in that year were £15 18s. 2d. It was argued that it was a common practice for rating authorities to ascertain new assessments for Schedule A and if the annual value under Schedule A was increased to raise the annual value for rating purposes.

It was argued that the rates payable would have been estimated by an intending tenant on the basis of the rent which he agreed to pay, and on that footing the rates would probably be at least £20 5s. 0d. and would have been estimated as at least that amount by an intending tenant at all material times, and the appellant contended that in estimating the rack rent which would be payable by an intending tenant of the whole (such tenant as herein mentioned) this increase should be taken into account by the Commissioners, as it would be by the intending tenant in estimating the rent which he would pay.

Mr. Body stated that his estimate was based also upon his experience in connexion with this property and similar properties in the locality, on a consideration of the rent that one person would, as tenant of the entire house or holding, be prepared to pay on a letting by the year, as contrasted with the amounts payable or expected to be paid by several weekly tenants of the four distinct apartments or tenements into which that house or building was divided.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant :—

(a) That Rule No. I. (1) of Schedule A for estimating the annual value of lands, tenements, hereditaments or heritages did not apply. This rule provided : "In the case of all lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages capable of actual occupation, of whatever nature, and for whatever purpose occupied or enjoyed, and of whatever value (except the properties mentioned in No. II. and No. III. of this Schedule), the annual value shall be understood to be : (1) The amount of the rent by the year at which they are let, if they are let at rack rent and the amount of that rent has been fixed by agreement commencing within the period of seven years preceding the 5th day of April next before the time of making the assessment."

(b) That the direction in Rule 8 (c) of No. VII. of the Rules applicable to Schedule A, to assess and charge such premises as one entire house or tenement, involved, in the circumstances hereinbefore mentioned, the application to them of Rule No. 1 (2) of Schedule A and thus introduced all the considerations mentioned above.

(c) That Schedule A, No. IV., Rules 1, 2, 7, and 10, and Schedule A, No. V., Rule 8, referred to an owner or tenant of the unit of assessment and not to tenants of apartments or tenements, and that Schedule A, No. VII., Rule 4, did not give exemption to, nor give power to income-tax authorities to remit tax on, unoccupied parts of a house.

The appellant cited the case of Stevens v. Bishop (4 The Times L.R., 325 ; 20 Q.B.D., 442), and argued that the cases of Tennant v. Smith (8 The Times L.R., 434 ; [1892] A.C., 150), Attorney-General v. London County Council (23 The Times L.R., 390 ; [1907] A.C., 131), Russell v. Coutts (1 Tax Cas., 469), and Grinter v. Fleming ([1900] 2 Q.B., 735) did not apply.

The respondent, the inspector of taxes, on behalf of the Crown contended that the assessment should be made in the sum of £51 10s. 0d. gross, and in support of this contention he put in as evidence the following schedule, namely :—

Gross rental of No. 39, Admiralty-street, Stonehouse		£70	17 0
Deduct rates	£15 18 2
„ inhabited house duty	12 6
„ 1/26 gross rents ..	2 14 6
		19	5 2
		£51	11 10

Say £51 10s. 0d.

The respondent cited the following cases : Biddle v. Morris (40 The Times L.R., 791 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 490), Russell v. Coutts (supra), Grant v. Langston (16 The Times L.R., 415 ; [1900] A.C., 383), Farmer v. Cotton's Trustees (31 The Times L.R., 478 ; [1915] A.C., 922), and Turner v. Carlton ([1909] 1 K.B., 932).

On July 15, 1924, the Commissioners gave their decision in the following terms :—

"We take the view that in the case of properties let at a weekly rent or let to more than one tenant the gross rents, less the rates paid by the owner, less a contingency balance of 1/26th of the net rents at the time of making the assessment, represent the rack rent, and therefore we make the assessment of 39, Admiralty-street East, Stonehouse, £48."

Mr. Hawke, K.C., and Mr. Hugh E. Kingdon appeared for the appellant ; Mr. R. P. Hills (with him the Attorney-General, Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt.—The contest between the parties here, as revealed by the case and as argued by counsel, is this. In dealing with this property, which is a house or building divided up and let in working-class tenements weekly at so many shillings, with the common use of the stairs and certain accessories, what is the effect of the legislation with regard to such a property ?

It was contended by Mr. Hawke for the appellant that an assessment was made in respect of this building upon the landlord by virtue of No. VII., Rule 8, of the Rules of Schedule A. That is true. That rule provides, to put it shortly, that the landlord of any house or building let in different apartments or tenements and occupied by two or more persons shall be assessed and charged as on one entire house or tenement. Mr. Hawke said that, as this house had to be assessed as one entire house or tenement, then when you look to the annual value, which is the amount that it is worth to be let by the year at a rack rent, you have to look at the imagined rack rent for the house or building as one entire house or tenement ; and he said that you cannot let a tenement of this kind as one entire house or tenement unless you let it to somebody who takes it as a middleman in order to let it out in weekly tenancies ; and of course he would not do that unless there was a profit to him, and therefore the weekly rents of the tenants are not the immediate basis of the annual value, but they can come in only so far as they influence the middleman in quoting his figure.

I think that is untenable. The purpose of this rule is to make it clear that the tax in respect of these houses is to be charged on the landlord, and not on the occupiers under the prima facie rule laid down by No. VII., Rule 1, and the whole group is headed : "Rules as to persons chargeable." Therefore what we find here is a direction that the assessment to income-tax in respect of these premises shall be charged upon the landlord, and the words "as one entire house or tenement" mean that there is to be one charge upon the landlord, and I do not think for a moment that they let in a speculation as to a middleman at all. What the house is worth to be let at a rack rent is the sum of the rack rents you can get for the house, and I do not see that it is any the less so because you get it piecemeal ; and it is not necessary, in order to give effect to the purpose of this rule, which, as I have already pointed out, is to make the landlord assessable in one entire assessment, to introduce an alteration in the principle of valuation.

Mr. Hawke laid some stress on the circumstance that the house or building was to be assessed. Of course that only means that the landlord is to be assessed in respect of the house or building, and the purpose of the rule is not confined merely to showing the person chargeable. But I think he could have made it a little stronger if he had referred to the corresponding section in the old Act, section 36 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, where the words were different : "any house or building let in different apartments" and so on, "shall nevertheless be charged to the duty . . . as one entire house . . . and the assessment thereof shall be made on the landlord"—which is putting it the other way. Even so, I think there is the same answer. What is indicated is the letting of apartments ; it does not come into contemplation that there shall be any hypothetical letting to an intermediary in the way contended for. I really think that is clear, and the well-known case of Attorney-General v. Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association, Limited (1 Ex. D., 469), decided in 1876, is of material assistance in taking that view. Therefore I think Mr. Hawke's argument fails.

I think this case must go back to the General Commissioners, because I do not think they have followed the right reasoning at all. They have said : "We take the view that in the case of properties let at a weekly rent or let to more than one tenant the gross rents, less the rates paid by the owner, less a contingency balance of 1/26th of the net rents at the time of making the assessment, represent the rack rent." What they have done is exactly what Mr. Hills rightly contended was perfectly wrong —namely, to construct a profit and loss account and to see how much was going to come in—and what they have done is to take the weekly rents and knock off 1/26th for contingencies, as they call it, and take that as the rack rent. That is wrong; they must not do it. They are right in taking and adding together the rents of the tenements, but they are wrong in taking and adding together the weekly rents with a discount. They have no right to do that. There is no authority for it at all. They must find out what the particular tenements are worth to let at a rack rent by the year and nothing else than that; it must be by the year. They must say what a man would give if he has to take each tenement for a year and to be responsible for a year; and then, when they have done that, they can add up the rents and allow for the rates and so on, and that will be the correct figure.

I do not know what the result will be; it may be that it will reduce the assessment to something very small; it may not affect it; it may increase it; I do not know; but that is what they must do and they must not take the weekly rents and add them up and then knock off a discount to account for the irrecoverables and voids, or something of that sort. It is not permitted by the Act.

FANSHAWE v. FANSHAWE.*

Divorce—Alimony pendente lite—Future instalments — Husband's assets — Restriction on power of Court to grant injunction—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 45.

The Court has no power to order that moneys accruing to a husband in the future in respect of shares held by him shall be paid into Court in respect of the future instalments of alimony pendente lite. Nor has the Court power, unless there is a sum due by him to be paid under an order of the Court, to grant an injunction restraining him from parting with such assets.

In this case the wife was granted a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage on February 3, 1927, and the custody of the child of the marriage, a daughter aged nine. An order for alimony pendente lite had been made against the husband, and also an order to pay the costs of the petition (as set out in the judgment infra). The husband fell into arrears with the alimony payments and did not comply with the order as to costs. He had been the registered holder of 50 Ordinary shares in a brewery company, which had employed him at a salary of £700 a year, and it was a condition of his contract that, on ceasing to be so employed, he should transfer these shares to a nominee of the company in return for a price to be fixed by their auditors. In March, 1927, his employment ceased, and the shares had been transferred.

The wife now moved the Court, (1) for an order to restrain the husband from receiving any moneys accrued or hereafter due to him in respect of the brewery shares formerly held by him, and for the payment of such moneys into Court if already paid to him, and for the appointment of a receiver of such moneys if not already paid to him; (2) alternatively for an injunction to restrain the husband from dealing with such moneys now or hereafter to become payable except by paying them into Court to the credit of the wife.

Mr. Noel Middleton, for the wife, submitted that the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 45, empowered the Court to make the order sought, and he cited authorities.

Mr. J. H. Watts, for the husband, said that there was no case in which security had been ordered for payments under an order for alimony pendente lite. Nor had the Court jurisdiction to grant an injunction until after a final order for permanent maintenance. It would have been open, however, to the wife to proceed to execution, and that would have been her proper remedy.

Mr. Justice Bateson.—This is an application by the wife, who has been granted a decree nisi of divorce, asking for an injunction to restrain her husband from receiving moneys that have been realized from the sale of some shares, which, previously, by an order of Mr. Justice Hill, he had been restrained from dealing with. The order for alimony pendente lite was made on January 31, 1927, at the rate of £180 per annum, free of tax, and the further sum of £55 per annum, free of tax, was ordered to be paid for the maintenance and education of the child of the marriage, commencing from November 8, 1926, when the petition for divorce was served on the husband. These sums were to be paid in monthly instalments. The proceeds of these shares of the husband are now standing in the joint names of the solicitors to the parties, the shares having been transferred before the original application was made, and the money having been paid for them subsequently to that application.

The husband had had an appointment in a brewery and as part of the appointment he held shares. When the appointment ceased the shares were transferred and he was paid the money according to an accountant's certificate as to their value.

It is quite clear, I think, from Carter v. Carter (12 The Times L.R., 37; [1896] P., 35) that such an order as is asked for in this case cannot be made so far as future payments of alimony are concerned. In that case, which was a decision of Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, the husband was not apparently in default in respect of the payment of alimony. The head-note reads: "Where, in a suit by a wife for judicial separation, an order for alimony pendente lite had been made against the husband, the Court refused to restrain the husband from dealing with certain of his property."

In this case the instalment of March 8, due under the order for alimony pendente lite, was not paid. On March 21 an order was made restraining the sale of the shares, and subsequently, on March 23, there was the sale of some furniture and the money for that was brought into Court.

Counsel have cited all the cases, I think, relating to this matter. They are Gillet v. Gillet (14 P.D., 158); Bullus v. Bullus (26 The Times L.R., 330); Brewis v. Brewis ([1893] W.N., 6); Jagger v. Jagger (42 The Times L.R., 315, 413; [1926] P., 93); Twentyman v. Twentyman ([1903] P., 82); Burmester v. Burmester (29 The Times L.R., 323; [1913] P., 76); Newton v. Newton ([1896] P., 36);

* Reported by William Latey, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Waterhouse v. Waterhouse ([1893] P., 284); Carter v. Carter (supra); and Sidney v. Sidney (17 L.T., 9), which is almost the genesis of these cases. The result of all these cases is that the Court will not grant an injunction in a case of alimony pendente lite unless there is a sum fixed and due by some order of the Court.

I think the proper order to make in this case is one against the husband so far as any sums due and fixed are still unpaid, i.e., there is an order for £73 9s. 2d. for costs; there are arrears of alimony amounting to £57 10s. which ought to have been paid up to May 8, and the costs of the motion, £32 11s. 6d. Beyond that I cannot restrain the husband from dealing with his own property for future sums which may or may not ever come to be due.

Burmester v. Burmester (supra) makes it quite clear that unless there is an order for payment in existence for a fixed sum no order can be made. In Mr. Clifford Mortimer's second edition of Rayden on Divorce, at page 193, it is stated in terms: "Before an order for the payment of a fixed sum (or even after an order for alimony pendente lite has been made) the Court will not grant an injunction restraining a husband from so dealing with his property as to defeat alimony pendente lite." There the author, I think, is thinking of future payments and not payments which are due.

The other cases seem to support my judgment, certainly so far as costs are concerned. In Gillet v. Gillet (supra) the injunction was granted so far as costs were concerned: there were arrears under a magistrate's order, but the Judge did not think that the injunction should be granted in regard to the allowance. He did not say that he could not have granted it in a proper case. In Bullus v. Bullus (supra) Mr. Justice Bigham followed Gillet v. Gillet (supra) in regard to costs. In Brewis v. Brewis (supra) Sir Francis Jeune said: "I will continue the injunction until such time as the order to give security can be enforced, that is, until a week after the order to pay taxed costs has been issued." That seems to have been an application with regard to costs only. There was no order in Newton v. Newton (supra), where Sir James Hannen, in a reference to his own order in Noakes v. Noakes and Hill (4 P.D., 60), said that he could not grant an injunction merely quia timet to restrain the respondent from dealing with his own property.

In Jagger v. Jagger (supra) Mr. Justice Hill said: "The effect of those cases is that an injunction can be granted after an order for alimony or maintenance and cannot be granted before order made." But there, I think, the learned Judge is only speaking obiter and is not dealing with the question of arrears of alimony under an order that has not been obeyed.

Sir Samuel Evans, in Burmester v. Burmester (supra), did not say that there was no difference between permanent alimony and alimony pendente lite; in quoting Newton v. Newton (supra) he says: "Sir James Hannen, in a considered judgment, deals with the broad question of law, and it seems to me that the proper conclusion to come to is that he did not intend to deal merely with the case of alimony pendente lite, but that he laid down principles equally applicable to cases of permanent alimony and maintenance." There again, I think, he refers to future alimony and future maintenance, and does not deal with arrears.

As counsel for the husband points out, in this case the petitioner has never asked for security either in the petition for alimony or in the petition for maintenance which is already on the file, and this is an attempt by a side wind to get such a security in the hope that some time or another there will be an order for permanent maintenance. As things stand at present, according to what counsel for the husband says, this sum of money that is now in the hands of the solicitors is all the money that the husband possesses, and it does not follow that there will ever be an order for maintenance, and to ask anybody to order security—because that is the real effect of this application—in the hope that an order may be made which most probably never will be made is an unprecedented application.

He also points out that if his client had been alert he might have got an order, as soon as he lost his employment, reducing the amount of the present order which he has not obeyed. It seems to me that, where an order for alimony is made and is not obeyed notwithstanding that the respondent has money in his hands wherewith he could pay the money, it is only right that he should pay. For these reasons I allow this application so far as it relates to the costs and arrears that I have mentioned. The wife will have the costs of the motion, and the balance of the money will be paid out to the husband so soon as these payments are made, and the existing injunction then dissolved.

CAPRON v. CAPRON.*

Divorce — Permanent alimony — Arrears—Husband's assets—Writ of sequestration—Power of the Court—R.S.C., Order XLIII., rr. 6, 7—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, r. 79A.

Where a husband is in arrear with the payment of permanent alimony, after a decree of judicial separation has been pronounced in favour of his wife, a writ of sequestration may issue in accordance with Rule 79A of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, and the sequestrator may be ordered to realize property of the husband within the jurisdiction and apply the proceeds of sale to the payment of the moneys owing to the wife by the husband under orders of the Court arising in such proceedings.

An order for payment of permanent alimony by monthly instalments is an act to be done "in a limited time" within the meaning of R.S.C., Order XLIII., r. 6, but there is a special divorce rule governing the procedure, namely, the rule above mentioned.

Mrs. Capron was granted on June 10, 1925, a decree of judicial separation on the ground of her husband's desertion. On November 27, 1925, she was granted permanent alimony of £450 a year, free of tax, to commence from the date of the decree, payable monthly. Two orders for costs were made against the husband aggregating about £88. On May 10, 1927, there was due from the husband £666 in respect of arrears of alimony and costs.

The husband, in his answer to the wife's petition for permanent alimony, had disclosed considerable assets within the jurisdiction, consisting principally of shares in English companies. On January 31, 1927, Mr. Justice Hill appointed a receiver of the assets of the husband, but it was then found that the husband had disposed of most of these shares. His assets still remaining within the jurisdiction comprised, (1) two policies of assurance upon his own life in the Sun Life Assurance Society, the surrender value of which was put at £1,416, but which was subject to a mortgage of just over £1,000 ; (2) a sum of £79 got in by the receiver and paid into Court ; (3) a director's share in the British American Tobacco Company (Holland), Limited.

Mr. T. Bucknill, for the wife, moved for leave to issue a writ of sequestration against the estate of the husband and for an order that the sequestrator sell the assurance policies and the share in the tobacco company and apply the proceeds towards the payment of the sums due from the husband. Counsel said that the writ could issue under Rule 79A of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, which read :—

"In default of payment to any person of any sum of money at the time appointed by any order of the Court for the payment thereof, a writ of fieri facias, sequestration, or elegit shall be sealed and issued as of course in the registry upon an affidavit of service of the order and of non-payment."

If the writ issued, said counsel, he intended to apply for an order to restrain payment to the husband and secure payment to the wife.

Mr. Noel Middleton, for the husband, opposed the issue of the writ, and said that the sums due for costs had been paid after proceedings in Holland against the husband. He submitted that the whole powers of the Court with regard to sequestration were contained in R.S.C., Order XLIII., rules 6 and 7 :—

Rule 6.—"Where any person is by any judgment or order directed to pay money into Court or to do any other act in a limited time, and after due service of such judgment or order refuses or neglects to obey the same according to the exigency thereof, the person prosecuting such judgment or order shall, at the expiration of the time limited for the performance thereof, be entitled, without obtaining any order for that purpose, to issue a writ of sequestration against the estate and effects of such disobedient person. . . ."

Rule 7.—"No subpœna for the payment of costs, and, unless by leave of the Court or a Judge, no sequestration to enforce such payment, shall be issued."

Counsel contended that the order for permanent alimony was not an order to do an act within a limited time, that it would be unreasonable to allow the issue of a writ of sequestration as to the share in the tobacco company since it was of hypothetical value, and that in the case of the life policies, as they were mortgaged and in the hands of third parties, the Court could make no order. He cited certain authorities referred to in the judgment.

Mr. Justice Bateson.—In my opinion this writ must issue. Apparently from March 4, 1926, when the respondent was ordered to pay some £58 costs in the alimony proceedings, he proceeded to dispose of his property in this country. In June and December, 1926, he borrowed just over £1,000 on the security of his life assurance policies. Thus between the amount borrowed on the policies and the surrender value there is a sum of £400, less of course any interest that may accrue. But that seems to have exhausted to a large extent any property that he had, at any rate so far as the petitioner knows, available in this country for payment of the various sums ordered to be paid. It turns out that on May 18, 1926, a sum about £16 short of the total amount of the costs that the respondent had to pay was received by the petitioner's solicitors.

In resisting this motion Mr. Middleton says : (1) The Rules of the Supreme Court dealing with sequestration do not permit of it in a case of this kind ; (2) the issue of such a writ is a matter of discretion, and if it is idle or futile or unreasonable to order such a writ to issue the Court will not use its powers. I am against him on both points. The Rules of the Supreme Court do not apply to the Divorce Court except where there is no divorce rule, and there is a special divorce rule 79A which seems to me exactly to cover this case. If there was not such a special rule, I think that this is within R.S.C., Order XLIII., rule 6, because the order for payment of alimony by monthly instalments is an act to be done "in a limited time." When the Court has ordered money to be paid monthly, it means that the moneys are to be paid within the month, which I think is "a limited time."

Mr. Middleton argues that there has been no case since the Judicature Acts in which a writ of sequestration has been allowed to go. Nobody questions that before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, a writ of sequestration in the case of alimony was utilized as a means of enforcing payment. Clinton v. Clinton (L.R. 1 P. and D., 215) makes that quite clear. Since that Act Willcock v. Terrell (3 Ex.D., 323), in 1878, makes it clear that a writ of sequestration may go where quarterly payments have been ordered to be paid. This decision has been approved by Sir James Hannen in Sansom v. Sansom (4 P.D., 69). The other cases referred to, Birch v. Birch (8 P.D., 163) and Hyde v. Hyde (4 The Times L.R., 586 ; 13 P.D., 166), do not in any way conflict with what I am saying, but I do not think that they carry the case any further.

With regard to Mr. Middleton's second point, I think that his is a mistaken view. Apart from the policies, from which something may be salved, and the director's share in the tobacco company, this gentleman may have other property in this country which may be found on further investigation. Since the receiver was appointed a sum of money has been collected by him about which apparently nobody knew anything at the time.

As is said by Lord Herschell in Hulbert v. Cathcart (12 The Times L.R., 379 ; [1896] A.C., 470), "It seems to me to rest upon the debtor who alleges that the proceedings would be futile to show the Court that it would be so." I am certainly not satisfied that it would be futile. Lord Herschell adds :—

"Now, in the present case it is stated that the respondent has a large yearly income" (that is what was stated here), "and I do not think there is anything to show that this sequestration will necessarily and inevitably be futile. It is impossible now to determine, and this is not the time for it, what could be seized, or whether the result of the proceeding will be to secure to the appellants their debt or not."

I think these remarks apply with equal force in this case. So far as the policies are concerned, there can be no great difficulty in persuading the mortgagees to take their money and interest, so as to allow the sequestrator to get the benefit of the balance. At any rate it will be well worth trying.

Another suggestion was that by ordering a writ of sequestration to go I was really making an order against a third party. That, of course, I am not doing and I am not pretending to do so. It is said I am making an order against the Sun Life Assurance office, which is not represented. I do not even know that they hold the policy, but there is no evidence that they do. They are not before me, and I do not know what attitude they might think wise to adopt. The authorities in support of the view that the Court does not make orders against third parties, Crispin v. Cumano (L.R. 1, P. and D., 622), and Craig v. Craig and Hamp ([1896] P., 171), were referred to, but I am not making any such order.

For these reasons this writ must issue, with leave to sell the policies and the share in the tobacco company, and for substituted service of this order. The motion will be allowed, with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. BELILIOS AND OTHERS.*

Revenue—Estate duty—Succession duty—Trust established in England as result of foreign disposition—Application of foreign law by English Courts in administration—Trust funds abroad—No direction in disposition to establish trust in England—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 51), s. 2—Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 30), s. 2 (2)—Finance Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 36), s. 24.

Under the will in English form of a testator domiciled in Hong-kong his residuary property, subject to an annuity to his widow, was left on trust for his son for life with the remainder to his son's two sons. The tenant for life died domiciled in Hong-kong, which was also the domicile of his sons. Previously the tenant for life had wished to borrow money and the lenders had insisted on English trustees being appointed. Later, it was discovered that the tenant for life, who had been sole trustee, had drawn wrongfully on capital, and against his wish applications for directions regarding the administration of the trust were made to the English Court of Chancery, and the sons, who were infants, became wards of Court. At the time of the death of the tenant for life the trust property was situated abroad.

Held, that the property other than the annuity to the widow was subject to estate duty, since section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, applied to the case of a trust established in this country as the result of a foreign disposition in the administration of which trust the Courts of this country might have to apply foreign law, although investments representing the trust fund were abroad and the trust was not established in this country pursuant to directions in the disposition itself.

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dicta of Lord Cranworth, L.C., in Wallace v. Attorney-General (L.R. 1 Ch., 1), explained.

Attorney-General v. Campbell (L.R. 5 H.L., 524), Attorney-General v. Jewish Colonization Association (17 The Times L.R., 106; [1901] 1 K.B., 123), In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts (7 Ch.D., 351), and Thompson v. Birch ([1876] W.N., 177) applied.

Held, further, that the property in question was not liable to succession duty since s. 24 of the Finance Act, 1925 (which enacts that a succession shall be deemed to arise on the happening of the death by reason of which the successor becomes entitled in possession to the succession or to the receipt of the income or profits thereof), is not retrospective.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General against Vera Carlotta Belilios, Richard Owen Roberts, and Edward Elvy Robb, the defendants.

By his will dated October 1, 1883, the testator, Emanuel Raphael Belilios, declared that the instrument was to take effect according to the law of the colony of Hong-kong where he was domiciled, and he devised and bequeathed his real and personal property to trustees to hold (with a power to convert), to pay certain specific bequests to his wife and children and to invest the residue in certain securities to pay the annual income thereof to the sons or son of the testator during their or his lives or life who should have attained or should attain the age of 21 years, and if more than one in equal shares, and on the death of the last survivor of his sons to stand possessed of the residuary trust funds in trust for the children or child of his sons who being sons or a son should have attained or should attain the age of 21 years, or being daughters or a daughter should have attained or should attain that age or should have married or should marry under that age with the consent of their or her guardians or guardian, and if more than one in equal shares. In the event of no child or children of the testator's sons living after the death of the survivor of his sons to attain a vested interest or vested interests in the testator's residuary trust funds those funds were to be employed to form and found a free college for the education of Jewish children at Calcutta, India, after which event the will was to take effect according to the law of the Empire of India.

The testator appointed his wife and Elias David Joseph Ezra Rajah Sutty Amindo Gho Sual Bahadoor and Jacob Benjamin Elias executrix and executors of his will. By a codicil dated April 20, 1892, the testator after reciting that the executors named in his will other than his wife were then dead appointed his wife and the manager in Hong-kong for the time being of the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation and the manager in Hong-kong for the time being of the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London and China, and also his son, Raphael Emanuel Belilios, on his attaining the age of 25 years, as his will trustees and also executrix and executors of his will. By a second codicil dated December 13, 1899, the testator appointed Robert Chesterton Wilcox to be an additional trustee and executor of his will.

The testator died domiciled in the colony of Hong-kong on November 11, 1905, where his will and two codicils were on May 15, 1906, duly proved by Raphael Emanuel Belilios alone, he being the only son of the testator living at his death, power being reserved to the testator's widow to prove, the other persons named as executors having renounced probate. The grant of probate was duly sealed in this country on November 5, 1906. Of the persons named in the will and codicil as trustees Raphael Emanuel Belilios alone acted in the trusts and by deed poll dated December 13, 1910, the testator's widow, Sema Belilios, wholly renounced and disclaimed the office of trustee.

The testator died possessed in this country of certain leasehold premises and furniture therein and a balance at his bankers the value whereof was exceeded by the amount of the debts due from the testator to persons resident in England, so that no estate duty became payable in respect of such property in this country. The testator also died possessed of immoveable property in Hong-kong and net personalty then valued at $2,424,688 of Hong-kong currency (exceeding £250,000) on which probate duty amounting to $72,741 (£7,634) was paid in that colony.

By a deed of appointment dated May 4, 1911, and made between Raphael Emanuel Belilios, therein described as of Deane Lodge, Ash Green, in the county of Surrey, barrister-at-law, of the one part; the defendant Vera Carlotta Belilios, of Deane Lodge, aforesaid, the wife of Raphael Emanuel Belilios; the defendant, Richard Owen Roberts, of No. 1, The Cloisters, Temple, in the City of London, barrister-at-law; Ernest Samuel Halford, of 93, Chancery-lane, in the City of London, gentleman; and the defendant, Edward Elvy Robb, of Temple Chambers, in the City of London, solicitor (thereinafter called the "new trustees"), Raphael Emanuel Belilios, in exercise of the power for that purpose vested in him by virtue of the will and of the Ordnance or other law of Hong-kong in that behalf and of every or any other power enabling him in that behalf, appointed the new trustees to be trustees in the place of the testator's widow and other the renouncing trustees and to act jointly with him as the will trustees within the meaning of the will and codicils and for all the purposes thereof or such as might be subsisting and capable of taking effect. Raphael Emanuel Belilios also declared that all and singular the hereditaments, chattels and property, whether real or personal, wheresoever situate, including things in action and the right to receive and recover the same, which were then subject to the trusts of the will and codicils and were capable of being vested by that declaration under the local law affecting the same, should vest in himself and the new trustees for all the estate and interest therein subject to the trusts of the will and codicils. The indenture was in fact executed in this country by all the parties thereto, all of whom, with the exception of Raphael Emanuel Belilios, and his wife, the defendant, Vera Carlotta, were permanently resident here. Raphael Emanuel Belilios resided in England for some periods down to the date of his death during a visit to this country on October 17, 1922, but neither he nor his wife ever acquired an English domicile.

There was issue of the marriage of Raphael Emanuel Belilios and the defendant, Vera Carlotta Belilios, two children and no more, namely, Lionel Emanuel Raphael Belilios, who was born on October 31, 1905, and Nigel Edward Richard David Belilios, who was born on April 6, 1909, who were both now living in this country with the defendant and had always lived in this country since their birth.

On April 7, 1913, October 11, 1915, and June 17, 1918, the defendants commenced certain actions in the Chancery Division by originating summonses against Raphael Emanuel Belilios, his infant sons and other parties, asking for directions in connexion with sundry questions which had arisen in the administration of the trusts of the will and codicils of the testator, and the Court made orders in these actions.

On December 17, 1920, Ernest Samuel Halford retired from the trusteeship.

On October 17, 1922, Raphael Emanuel Belilios died leaving him surviving his widow, the defendant, Vera Carlotta Belilios, and his two infant children, who, the Attorney-General claimed (but the defendants denied), had been made wards of Court by virtue of the proceedings in the Chancery Division and the orders made therein. After the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios the Court made orders in the last of the actions in relation to the education and temporary removal of the infants outside the jurisdiction and authorizing the expenditure as an advancement of £39,809 10s. 10d. on a residence for them in Sussex, for which £43,199 8s. 8d. was in fact raised and applied.

At the date of the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios the residuary estate of the testator, consisted of (a) a sum of £1,300 or thereabouts in a bank in the United Kingdom, (b) 15,555 fully paid shares of $15 each in the Hong-kong, Canton and Macao Steamship Company, Limited, 534 shares of $10 in the Hong-kong Dairy Farms and Ice Storage Company, Limited, which were then registered abroad in the names of the trustees of the testator's will, but were subsequently sold by the defendants and realized £66,246 15s. 7d. net, and 10 shares in the Bank of China and Japan, Limited, in liquidation, and (c) certain unsold immoveable property situate in the colony of Hong-kong which was subject to the trust for sale in the will contained.

The Attorney-General claimed that: (1) At the date of the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios the will of the testator was for the purposes of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, an English settlement in that the trust funds and property, although for the most part situate abroad, were vested in trustees who were all resident within the United Kingdom and subject to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice whose wards the infants had become by virtue of the orders referred to.

(2) Upon the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios the whole of the residuary estate, except so much thereof as was required to provide for payment of the annuity of $12,000 bequeathed to the testator's widow, Sema Belilios, passed within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, and the infants became beneficially entitled thereto in equal shares contingently upon attaining their respective ages of 21 years, and such beneficial interests constituted a succession within the meaning of section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, upon which succession duty became payable at the rate of 1 per cent. by virtue of that Act and of section 58 (2) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, and section 24 of the Finance Act, 1925.

(3) The defendants as such trustees were accountable for such succession duty in respect of the sums of £39,809 10s. 10d. or £43,199 8s. 8d., or other the sum or sums from time to time paid or applied by them to or for the maintenance, advancement or benefit of the infants.

(4) Estate duty at the appropriate rate in respect of so much of the residuary estate as so passed became payable by virtue of section 2 (2) of the Finance Act, 1894, and the defendants were accountable for such duty.

The Attorney-General on behalf of his Majesty accordingly prayed:—

(1) That it might be declared that, upon the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios, succession duty at the rate of 1 per cent. became payable in respect of the successions of the infants respectively to the whole of the residuary estate, wherever situate, except such part thereof as was required to provide for payment of the annuity of $12,000 to the testator's widow, Sema Belilios, and that the defendants, as trustees, were accountable for such duty in respect of the sum of £43,199 8s. 8d., or other the sum or sums from time to time paid or applied by them to or for the maintenance, advancement or benefit of the infants respectively.

(2) That an account might, if necessary, be directed to ascertain the amount of the succession duty for which the defendants were accountable upon the footing of the foregoing declaration, together with interest thereon at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum from the time or times when the same became so payable.

(3) That it might be declared that on the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios estate duty became payable at the appropriate rate under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, upon the whole of the residuary estate of the testator, wherever situate, except such part thereof as was required to provide for payment of the annuity of $12,000 to the testator's widow, Sema Belilios.

(4) That an account might if necessary be directed to ascertain the amount of the estate duty payable on so much of the residuary estate as passed on the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios, together with interest thereon at 4 per cent. per annum from the time when the same became payable, and that the defendants might be ordered to pay to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue the amount of such succession and estate duties and interest, the informant waiving such penalties as the defendants might have incurred by reason of the duties not having been paid up to the present time.

(5) That all necessary and proper inquiries might be made, directions given, and accounts taken for the purposes aforesaid.

By their answer, the defendants contended that they were not liable to pay the succession duty or the estate duty claimed on the grounds :—

(1) That no duty was payable on the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios in respect of any part of the residuary estate.

(2) That the testator's will at no time constituted an English settlement, but was in form and in substance a settlement subject only to the law of Hong-kong, and that no person entitled thereunder to any benefit might or would become so entitled by virtue of English law.

(3) That none of the property in respect of which the claim of the Commissioners was made was property which passed on the death of Raphael Emanuel Belilios, nor property which, by virtue of the Finance Act, 1894, or any other Act, was to be deemed to have so passed or be included in any such Act.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. M. J. L. Beebee appeared for the Crown ; Mr. F. H. Maugham, K.C., Mr. A. M. Latter, K.C., and Mr. J. Israel for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt read the following considered judgment :—The first question in this case—namely, whether estate duty is payable in respect of this property—depends on whether succession duty would have been payable under section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853.

The facts are that under the will of a testator domiciled in Hong-kong which was made in English form (which may, for all I know, be Hong-kong form also) property was left (and so far as it was real property with a trust for conversion) upon trust for the testator's son for life with, in the events that happened, remainder to his two sons. The tenant for life died in 1922, domiciled in Hong-kong, which was also the domicil of his sons. At the date of his death the trustees were resident in this country, but the property, so far as material to this case, was abroad. The circumstances under which the trust fund came to be and remained vested in English trustees I will deal with later.

The limitation which it was common ground has to be read into section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, for the purpose of its application to foreign dispositions has never been stated in words capable of being read textually into the section, unless it was by Lord Cranworth in Wallace v. Attorney-General (L.R. 1 Ch., 1), where he said that the successor must become entitled by virtue of the laws of this country. Mr. Maugham contended that that remained the true test. Having regard, however, to Attorney-General v. Campbell (L.R. 5 H.L., 524) and to Attorney-General v. Jewish Colonization Association (17 The Times L.R., 106 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 123), Lord Cranworth's words must be taken in a sense wide enough to include the case of a trust established in this country, as the result of a foreign disposition, in the administration of which trust the Courts here might have to apply foreign law. Further, in view of In re Cigala's Settlement Trusts (7 Ch.D., 351), it seems to me that the circumstance that the investments representing the trust fund are abroad cannot be decisive though it may have to be taken into consideration in determining whether the trust has or has not been established in this country.

What I have to ascertain is, therefore, whether the disposition conferring the succession is being carried out by a trust established here fulfilling the requirements of the principle laid down in Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra). In that case the trust was established in this country pursuant to directions in the disposition itself. Here it was not. Possibly a good deal might be said in favour of a contention that this circumstance of itself differentiates the present case from Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra) and that the removal to this country of the trust of a foreign disposition not in pursuance of the terms of the disposition but at the choice of the parties does not bring the successions conferred within the scope of the Act. But I do not think that that point is open before me, because in Thompson v. Birch ([1876] W.N., 177 ; Hanson's Death Duties, p. 393) Vice-Chancellor Bacon clearly ruled that the principle of Attorney-General v. Campbell (supra) applied to a fund established in this Court—that was the fact in that case—" no matter by what means." The testator there had not directed that the fund was to be transferred to this country, and it is in reference to that circumstance that the Vice-Chancellor uses the words " no matter by what means."

The question, therefore, is reduced to this : Was the trust at the death of the tenant for life in fact established in this country ? Now Mr. Maugham pointed out that, whenever a trustee can be found in England, the trust, wherever its origin or subject-matter, can be enforced against him and he urged that the mere presence in this country of the trustee of a foreign disposition cannot alone attract duty to the successions it may have conferred. I feel the force of that argument, but I have not that simple case to deal with. Here the history was shortly as follows. The tenant for life got into financial difficulties and wanted to borrow money. The proposed lenders insisted on English trustees, and gentlemen of position and of permanent British residence were appointed. Then it was discovered that the tenant for life, who had been sole trustee, had drawn wrongfully upon capital and a particularly close and strict supervision of the affairs of the trust became necessary on the part of the trustees. Several applications were made to the Court and the sons who were infants became wards of Court. In former days no doubt the trust would have fallen to be fully administered by the Court. The tenant for life strongly objected to this English régime, but the strength of his resistance, which was in vain, only emphasizes the English character which this trust had assumed. I think that it was as much established here as if the fund had been brought into Court as in Thompson v. Birch (supra).

For these reasons, and applying the law as laid down in that case, I hold that, on this part of the case, there must be judgment for the Crown.

The second question in the case on which the claim to succession duty itself depends is whether section 24 of the Finance Act, 1925, is retrospective. That section enacts that a succession shall be deemed to arise on the death. The act of interpretation referred to in the word "deemed" must of course be in the future, but the moment when interpretation is called for is the moment of the death. The section, therefore, refers to the interpretation to be applied upon future deaths. If it had been intended to enact that from the passing of the Act the effect of past events should be reversed it was easy (and there are well-known forms of words for the purpose) to provide that the law should be deemed to have always been as then provided.

In the result, there must be judgment for the Crown upon the first point—the claim for estate duty—with the general costs of the information, and judgment for the defendants upon the claim for succession duty, with the costs of the issue as regards that.

A stay of execution was granted.

Railway and Canal Commission. (Sankey, J., Sir E. Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Sir Lewis Coward, K.C.) 1927. June 27.

IN RE APPLICATION OF AMALGAMATED ANTHRACITE COLLIERIES, LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Mines—Coal-mines—Amalgamation of colliery companies — Scheme — Confirmation — Requirement that it should be in the national interest—Mining Industry Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 28), s. 7 (2) (a).

Observations on the meaning of the expression "national interest" in s. 7 (2) (a) of the Mining Industry Act, 1926.

The Commission granted the application of certain companies for the confirmation of a scheme of total amalgamation. The companies making the application were the Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries, Limited, United Anthracite Collieries, Limited, Cleeves Western Valleys Anthracite Collieries, Limited, Gurnos Anthracite Collieries Company, Limited, Gellyceidrim Collieries Company, Limited, Caerbryn Anthracite Colliery Company, Limited, Carway Collieries, Limited, Gwendraeth Valley Anthracite Collieries, Limited, New Rhos Anthracite Collieries, Limited, and Pentremawr Colliery Company, Limited.

The Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries, Limited, were the owners of all the issued shares in companies owning 12 freehold or leasehold anthracite collieries. The United Anthracite Collieries, Limited, were also owners of all the issued shares in companies owning 12 freehold or leasehold anthracite collieries. All the collieries were situate in close proximity to one another in the South Wales anthracite area in the counties of Carmarthen, Glamorgan, and Brecon.

It was claimed that the confirmation of the scheme would result in the more economical and efficient working, treating, and disposing of coal over a large and important area; that the various undertakings would be controlled by a single policy and establishment charges would be substantially reduced; and that amalgamation would:—

(i.) Pool the financial resources of the whole of both existing groups and render them available in aid of any individual colliery which might at any time require further capital outlay.

(ii.) Eliminate uneconomic and wasteful competition.

(iii.) Reduce overhead charges.

(iv.) Afford facilities for the pooling of wagons.

(v.) Permit of the installation of joint power plant linking together a number of the collieries and supplying the additional power essential to the development of certain of them.

(vi.) Enable certain of the coal reserves at present controlled by a colliery of one company to be re-allocated so that they could be worked more efficiently by a colliery of the other company.

(vii.) Abolish the limits at present existing between the underground workings of the collieries of the two groups as far as ownership was concerned, thus giving flexibility to boundaries between collieries and enabling the major faults of the coalfield to be used for this purpose.

(viii.) Enable large-scale breaking, washing, and cleaning plants to be installed in place of existing small plants.

(ix.) Permit of centralized control and purchase of plant, equipment, and stores.

(x.) Give opportunities for the application of scientific and technical research.

It was claimed that on the sales side the following advantages would be obtained:—

(i.) Increased efficiency in marketing through greater specialization.

(ii.) Improved facilities for maintaining and expanding present and developing new markets.

(iii.) Efficient production of standard qualities.

(iv.) Increased opportunities for stabilization of both prices and markets.

(v.) Reduction of selling costs.

It was submitted that the terms of the scheme were fair and equitable to all persons affected thereby. It was further submitted that it was in the national interest that the scheme should be confirmed, because —(a) it would enable the coal reserves of the two companies to be worked, treated, transported, and sold more efficiently than was possible at present; (b) improved efficiency would result in more regular working and increased demand; (c) the more regular working would lead to more constant employment, while the increased demand would call for additional development with corresponding additional employment ; and (d) the pooling of the existing resources of the two companies in regard to finance, administration, and personnel, would enable the welfare programme already commenced to be consolidated and enlarged, and thus improve and increase the amenities provided for the men employed.

* Reported by T. R. F. Butler, Esq., and J. W. Hall, Esq., Barristers-at-Law.

Mr. W. A. Jowitt, K.C., Lord Erleigh, and Mr. L. Cohen appeared for the applicants, the Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries, Limited ; Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Mr. Stamp for the applicants, the United Anthracite Collieries, Limited ; and Mr. Geoffrey Smallwood for the Great Western Railway Company, who had lodged an objection to the scheme which was subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. Crankshaw, an objector, appeared in person.

MR. JUSTICE SANKEY read the judgment of the Court. His Lordship referred to the provisions of the Mining Industry Act, 1926, and especially to section 7, which provides :—

" (1) Where a scheme has been referred to the Railway and Canal Commission, the Commission, if satisfied that the scheme conforms to the requirements of this Part of this Act, shall take into consideration all objections to the scheme which may be lodged by any person or by any class or body of persons within such time and in such manner as may be directed by the Commission, and where any objections have been so lodged shall hear any objectors whom they consider entitled to appear.

" (2) The Commission, after hearing such objectors as aforesaid, may confirm the scheme either without modifications or subject to such modifications as the Commission think fit, or may refuse to confirm the scheme : Provided that the Commission—(a) shall confirm a scheme if satisfied that it would be in the national interest to do so, and that the terms of the scheme are fair and equitable to all persons affected thereby. . . ."

The judgment proceeded :—The object of the scheme is to amalgamate all the various colliery companies into one big concern, under the name of the Amalgamated Anthracite Collieries, Limited, and to allot shares in that concern proportionate to the interests of the various shareholders in the constituent companies.

The facts are as follows. All the collieries are situate in close proximity to one another in the South Wales anthracite area, in the counties of Carmarthen, Glamorgan, and Brecon. Some of them had already joined up together so as to form two big groups. One of the groups, known as the Amalgamated, owned all the issued shares in the Cleeves Western Valleys Anthracite Collieries, Limited, and the Gurnos Anthracite Collieries, Limited ; the former of which owned all the issued shares in the Gellyceidrim Collieries Company, Limited ; whilst another group, called the United, owned all the issued shares in the Caerbryn Anthracite Colliery, Limited, the Carway Collieries, Limited, the Gwendraeth Collieries, Limited, the New Rhos Collieries, Limited, and Pentremawr Collieries, Limited.

The number of mines owned by these various companies amounted to between 20 and 30. The Welsh anthracite area is a strip of land stretching across the counties above mentioned, about 27 miles in length and five miles in width.

The total reserves of coal remaining to be worked on the property are about 230,000,000 tons. Except for the small field to the north-east of Glasgow, the whole of the anthracite coal in the United Kingdom is contained in such area. . . .

No suggestion has been made by any shareholder, and no person has come before us to raise any objection, upon the first part of the case—namely, as to whether the proposed allotment of shares is a proper one in the interests of the various constituent companies. It will be recollected that it is the duty of the Court to take into consideration any objection to the scheme which may be lodged by any person or by any class or body of persons, and that the Court may confirm the scheme provided that the terms of the scheme are fair and equitable to all persons affected thereby (section 7 (2)).

We have come to the conclusion that, so far as the terms of the scheme are concerned, they are fair and equitable to all persons affected. We have had the evidence of two very distinguished witnesses who have explained the terms to us, and there has been no dissentient shareholder appearing to object.

We now pass on to a more difficult part of the case, for it is further provided by the Mining Industry Act, 1926, that the Commission shall confirm the scheme if satisfied that it would be in the national interest to do so. Upon this point we did have an objector in the person of a Mr. Crankshaw, a mining engineer now residing at Bath, but at one time a managing director of one of the collieries concerned—namely, the Ammanford Colliery. He called as a witness a Mr. Thomas Gibbon Davies. We propose to discuss this opposition when we have set out the facts.

The main difficulty in which the Court finds itself in deciding this question is to come to a satisfactory conclusion as to the meaning of the words " national interest," which is further complicated by the fact that we have no independent assistance upon this point either by counsel or by the witness. When we say this, we must not be thought to be in any way impugning the good faith of the promoters, but they are interested parties and naturally think that a scheme which provides in a great measure for their own interest is also in the interest of the nation.

Now, in considering what is the national interest, various questions at once emerge. It is obvious that, as coal is a source of light, heat, and power, it is a commodity which is necessary for the life of the nation, and that it is in the interest of the State that it should be won and used to the best advantage. Any scheme which substantially increases the economy and efficient production and user of coal, provided that it is satisfactory in other respects, can be said to be in the national interest. We do not think that it would be desirable, even if it were possible, to lay down an exhaustive definition of what is in the national interest. As has been said in another set of circumstances, " The fact that opinion, grounded on experience, has moved one way does not preclude the possibility of its moving, on fresh experience, in the other. Nor does it bind succeeding generations when conditions have changed. After all, the question whether a particular thing is in the national interest is a question of the times, and it is a question of fact."

This question is more fitting for the High Court of Parliament than for the High Court of Justice. After all, what is in the national interest is rather a question of policy to be pursued by Parliament from time to time than a question for legal decision, and, as above pointed out, a Court is likely to be embarrassed when considering a topic of this sort. It hears one side—namely, the side of those who, with perfect good faith, desire to persuade the Court that what is obviously in their own interest is in the national interest—but it does not bear adverse criticism.

We agree with three of the main tests which were proposed by the applicants themselves, and, in considering a scheme of this character, we think it right to satisfy ourselves that, first, the workers, whether manual or clerical, who are engaged in the undertaking should receive not merely a living, but a reasonable, wage for their exertions ; secondly, that those who are willing to risk their capital in such an undertaking should receive a reasonable return for the money they lend ; and, thirdly, that the persons who are to use the article produced—that is to say, the consumers—should be able to get such article at the lowest rate, having regard to the first two propositions.

It is not necessary to enlarge upon these topics. A judicial mind would, we think, recognize the justice of all of them.

One other topic may have to be considered, as was admitted by Sir Alfred Mond, who is the originator of this scheme and who gave evidence before us. It may well happen that, in the not very distant future, it will be in the national interest to consider the international position of the coal industry ; but upon that we do not propose to say anything at present except when we come to refer to one of the export markets of the Welsh anthracite coalfield.

In the application the following advantages are claimed as being likely to accrue should the Court see its way to sanction the scheme. It is said that the result will be a more economical and efficient working, treating, and disposing of coal over a large and important area ; that the various undertakings will be controlled by a single policy and establishment charges will be substantially reduced ; that amalgamation will (i.) pool the financial resources of the whole of both groups and render them available in aid of any individual colliery which may at any time require further capital outlay ; (ii.) eliminate uneconomical and wasteful competition ; (iii.) reduce overhead charges ; (iv.) afford facilities for the pooling of wagons ; (v.) permit of the installation of joint power plant ; (vi.) enable coal reserves to be reallocated so that they can be worked more efficiently and quickly at another neighbouring colliery ; (vii.) give greater flexibility to boundaries between collieries, enabling major faults of the coalfield to be adapted in substitution of barriers of solid coal which would otherwise have to be left ; (viii.) enable large-scale breaking, washing, and cleaning plant to be installed ; (ix.) permit of centralized control and standardization ; (x.) give opportunities for the application of scientific and technical research. So far with regard to the actual working of the coal.

Another equally, if not more, important advantage claimed is on the sales side of the business. It has, unfortunately, been considered in the past that English coal sells itself. That may have been true when our foreign competitors were not so numerous and so well equipped as they have now become. As Sir Alfred Mond pointed out, propaganda is necessary both in the home and in the export market. Indeed, he said in striking language that up to now "anthracite has not been sold at all." It is claimed and, as we think, justly claimed, that this amalgamation will provide the following, amongst other, advantages on the sales side :—(i.) Increased efficiency in marketing, through greater specialization ; (ii.) improved facilities for maintaining and extending present and developing new markets ; (iii.) efficient production of standard qualities ; (iv.) increased opportunities for stabilization of both prices and markets ; (v.) reduction of selling costs.

One of the greatest benefits which could accrue to the coal industry would be to equalize the running of pits and so to produce a regularity of employment by stabilizing production. It is plain that, if you narrow your selling area, the coal industry is a seasonal one and there are times, therefore, when there is much less employment and times when there is much more employment. It may not be easy to provide large storing places for coal so as to produce these desired results, but Sir Alfred Mond pointed out a way in which they could be attained by discovering whether one market wanted coal at a time when another market could do without it. For example, it may well be that France and Italy want anthracite at one time and Canada may want it at another ; and, indeed, Sir Alfred has managed, by following this train of thought, to foster a Canadian export trade from Wales at a time when anthracite is not so urgently needed in the nearer foreign market. If this policy can be pursued, it no doubt would go far to decasualize the industry—a position which certainly would be greatly to the interests of those engaged in it, who must suffer from a system which at one time of the year may give them quite good wages and at another time of the year a remuneration entirely inadequate for their weekly necessities.

So far as to the effects which amalgamation may produce in the winning of the coal and in improving the position of those who are engaged in the process. There is still one equally, if not more, important consideration remaining, and that is the opportunity which amalgamation offers for research and experiment. We are satisfied, on the evidence before us, that a great field is open here. It can hardly be doubted that the use and consumption of coal in this country are productive of great loss and great waste. This is an evil for which no particular class of society is responsible, and to which everybody is a party. An amalgamation of this character will enable research to be made for the best way of using the great national asset which the country is fortunate in possessing. Such research and such experiment cannot be carried on by small individual concerns, but must be the result of the larger and stronger unit. The result may be put in the answer given by Mr. Forster Brown in his evidence : "Any reorganization of financial and administrative control is in the national interest. It enables the national resources of the country to be produced and conveyed to the consumer at a lower cost than if that reorganization had not taken place, and always upon the understanding that that reduced cost is not arrived at by asking Labour to take less wages or to work longer hours."

Both Sir Alfred Mond and Mr. Forster Brown were of opinion that this amalgamation would produce these results. If that is so, as we are disposed to think it is, it is obvious that this Court, by sanctioning this scheme, will be benefiting not only the workmen employed but also those who are risking their capital in the undertaking, and last, and by no means least, although his position is not always considered by the other two parties, the interest of the consumer.

We now say a few words about the opposition. As previously stated, it was conducted by Mr. Crankshaw, a former manager of one of the collieries, and his witness was a Mr. Davies, who was formerly employed at the Ammanford Colliery and was chairman of the Miners' Lodge, but who, after a recent strike in which the safety men were withdrawn, has failed to find employment at the colliery. The point urged by Mr. Crankshaw was that the collieries have been over-capitalized and that when they were nationalized this might induce the Government to pay too much for their acquisition. The point made by Mr. Davies was that an amalgamation resulted in the lowering of men's wages and therefore should not be encouraged.

We do not desire to say a single word about the bona fides of either of these gentlemen. Indeed, we do not question it; but we must point out that Mr. Crankshaw is at the present moment the defendant in a libel action brought against him for using, as it is alleged, very opprobrious language against some of the directors, and Mr. Davies naturally feels rather bitter that he is no longer in the employment in which he was for so many years.

With regard to Mr. Crankshaw's point, we can leave it safely to the good sense of some future Government. With regard to Mr. Davies's point, if we were satisfied that amalgamation would result in a general lowering of wages, or if we thought that the object of the amalgamation was to enable its promoters to make more profits at the expense of the workmen, we should not hesitate to withhold our approval of the scheme; but we must point out that there was no satisfactory evidence in this case that either of these events was likely to happen, or, indeed, has happened in the partial amalgamation which has already taken place.

For these reasons we give judgment for the applicants and confirm the scheme proposed by them.

Sir Lewis Coward.—I desire to add only one word, on the question of wagons. It was with regret that I learnt that in this amalgamation, in which it was represented to the Court that exceptional national advantages accrued, the present primitive means of transport in 10-ton and 12-ton wagons was to be continued, and, further, that the number of the existing wagons was apparently thought to be sufficient. One would have thought that, with an amalgamation launched by such an influential company and directorate, some evidence would have been forthcoming upon this question—namely, the increased capacity of wagons, which, in my judgment, has been and always will be one of the most vital questions in the development of colliery enterprise. The recent Report of the Royal Commission presided over by Sir Herbert Samuel stated that in France, in Belgium, and in the Ruhr the standard wagon now used is a 20-ton wagon, and that the 10-ton and 12-ton wagons, which are the wagons used here, are rapidly disappearing.

I trust that this great amalgamation will take immediate steps in considering the construction of new wagons, which are certainly required; and that they will pay careful attention to and carry out the recommendation of the Royal Commission, more especially as Mr. Forster Brown, a mining engineer of over 27 years' experience, who gave evidence before us, said at page 24 of the second day's evidence as follows: "If the result of the amalgamation of railways has the effect of hanging up the circulation of wagons, what was an adequate wagon capacity before the amalgamation will not be adequate now; but I am assuming that the amalgamation of railways will not be so disastrous as it has been up to the present time to the trader."

W. ANGLISS AND CO. (AUSTRALIA) PROPRIETARY, LIMITED v. P. AND O. STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.*

Carriage of Goods by Sea—Damage by oil fuel—Unseaworthiness—Design of ship—Bad workmanship—Leakage from oil bunker—Non-responsibility of shipowners.

The plaintiffs shipped a quantity of carcasses of lamb for carriage from Australia to London by a new oil-fuel steamer built for the defendants. The bills of lading incorporated the rules in the Schedule to the Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, by which the carrier is not liable for damage from unseaworthiness unless caused by want of due diligence to make the ship seaworthy. During the voyage some of the rivets between an oil bunker and the hold became loose, and oil leaked through and tainted the meat. In an action for damages the plaintiffs contended that the ship was unseaworthy, in the sense of being unfit for the carriage of the particular cargo, by reason of inefficient design or of bad workmanship, and the defendants pleaded that the unseaworthiness (if any) was not owing to any want of due diligence on their part.

Held, that the damage was caused by defects of design, and, although in view of recent experience the particular design was unsatisfactory, yet the adoption of it, at the time when the ship was built, did not involve any lack of due diligence on the part of the defendants, and that, although bad workmanship did to some extent contribute to the damage, yet, as it was not such as could have been discovered by the defendants' inspectors, and as the shipbuilders were not servants or agents of the defendants, the defendants were not liable for it, and therefore the action failed.

In this action the plaintiffs claimed damages for breach of contract and/or duty in the carriage of a shipment of meat from Australia to England.

Mr. Miller, K.C., and Mr. David Davies appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. Harold Stranger for the defendants.

In October, 1925, the plaintiffs shipped on a steamer of the defendants, the Cathay, some 10,000 carcasses of lamb for carriage from Australia to London. The plaintiffs alleged that the lamb was shipped in good order and condition, but that when it was delivered in London 5,711 of the carcasses were found to be tainted by oil.

By their defence, the defendants pleaded that if any of the carcasses were delivered damaged (which they denied) the damage was due to perils excepted by the bills of lading. They said that during the voyage a number of rivets in a bulkhead between an oil bunker and the hold in which the carcasses were stowed became loose owing to the straining of the Cathay in heavy weather and, as a result, oil leaked through the rivet holes and tainted the meat. They also pleaded that the bills of lading under which the meat was carried incorporated the terms of the Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, and the rules in the schedule to that Act. Those rules provided, inter alia, that the carrier should not be liable for loss or damage arising from perils of the sea.

A large amount of evidence of a technical character was called dealing with the design of the Cathay and the workmanship of her builders.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT, in the course of his considered judgment, said that, although the sum claimed amounted only to £1,672 odd, the case had occupied the Court for many days and, although it might be that other cases would depend on the decision in this case, it was surprising that business people on both sides should have been willing to incur so much expense in contesting the matter. Perhaps the explanation was that the action was an underwriters' action; for it had long been the practice of underwriters to enforce claims against shipowners arising out of allegations of unseaworthiness or breach of contract.

The Cathay at the material time was homeward bound on her second round voyage to Australia and back. She was a new ship, built by Barclay, Curle and Company, a well-known firm of high reputation, and she had the highest class at Lloyd's. He was satisfied on the evidence that there were no extraordinary features on this voyage; there was some bad weather, but nothing worse than might reasonably have been anticipated and nothing which ought to have caused the damage complained of.

The defence put in was that the damage was caused by perils of the seas, for which the defendants were not responsible. To that the plaintiffs replied that the ship was unseaworthy, in the sense that she was unfit for the carriage of this particular cargo. By rejoinder, the defendants pleaded that even if the ship were unseaworthy in fact, which they denied, the unseaworthiness was not due to any want of due diligence on their part.

In the course of the case the defendants had really abandoned the theory that bad weather had caused the damage, and the real dispute had been whether it had been caused by inefficient design of the Cathay or by bad workmanship in the building of her. The decision as to which cause, if either, was responsible would decide how far the defendants could succeed on their plea of no want of due diligence.

His Lordship then discussed the expert evidence in detail, and pointed out that similar trouble had been experienced with other vessels carrying oil fuel in the same way as the Cathay. The practice of carrying oil fuel in that way was comparatively new.

Lord Sumner laid down in Bradley and Sons, Limited v. Federal Steam Navigation Company (27 Ll. L., 395) that the warranty of seaworthiness was not absolute, but must be judged by the state of knowledge prevailing at the time. He held, therefore, that, although in view of recent experience the design was unsatisfactory in fact, the adoption of that design at the time when the ship was built did not involve any lack of due diligence on the part of the defendants.

There remained the question of bad workmanship. If there were bad workmanship in the building of the Cathay, did it contribute to the damage in this case; and, if it did, could it have been detected by the inspectors of the defendants if they had exercised reasonable skill and care?

His Lordship then examined the evidence as to the riveting, caulking and other matters and said:—I summarize my findings of fact as follows. (1) The design of the bar and of its fitting was defective, and there should have been a cofferdam. These defects of design involved no failure of due diligence on the part of any person concerned. (2) There was some bad workmanship both in riveting and in fitting the bar to the bulkhead. That was entirely the fault of the individual workmen employed by the builders and could not have been detected by any reasonable care on the part of the defendants' inspector or by Lloyd's inspector or the Board of Trade inspector or by the builders' foremen. (3) The damage to the plaintiffs' cargo was due to the defects of design, though it may have been contributed to by the bad workmanship.

I have to consider the law in relation to these findings. The bill of lading recites receipt of the goods in apparent good order and condition, the goods to be delivered in London subject to the contract. The contract for material purposes is to be found in the provisions of the Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, which by the clause paramount in the bill of lading is embodied in the Act. That Act is identical with the English Act in that it, like the English Act, embodies a schedule containing the rules relating to bills of lading. Section 5 of the Australian Act, practically in identical terms with section 2 of the English Act, provides as follows: "There shall not be implied in any contract for the carriage of goods by sea to which this Act applies any absolute undertaking by the carrier of the goods to provide a seaworthy ship." Article II. of the Schedule is in the following terms: "Subject to the provisions of Article VI., under every contract of carriage of goods by sea the carrier, in relation to the loading, handling, stowage, carriage, custody, care, and discharge of such goods, shall be subject to the responsibilities and liabilities, and entitled to the rights and immunities hereinafter set forth." Article III. (1) is in these terms: "The carrier shall be bound, before and at the beginning of the voyage, to exercise due diligence to—(a) Make the ship seaworthy: (b) Properly man, equip, and supply the ship: and (c) Make the holds, refrigerating and cool chambers, and all other parts of the ship in which goods are carried, fit and safe for their reception, carriage, and preservation." It is subsection (c) which is material in this case. Then Article IV. (1) is as follows: "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be liable for loss or damage arising or resulting from unseaworthiness unless caused by want of due diligence on the part of the carrier to make the ship seaworthy, and to secure that the ship is properly manned, equipped, and supplied, and to make the holds, refrigerating and cool chambers and all other parts of the ship in which goods are carried fit and safe for their reception, carriage, and preservation in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of Article III. Whenever loss or damage has resulted from unseaworthiness, the burden of proving the exercise of due diligence shall be on the carrier or other person claiming exemption under this section." "Carrier" is defined in Article I. (a) as including "the owner or the charterer who enters into a contract of carriage" (as by bill of lading) "with a shipper." The obligation of the carrier to exercise due diligence to make the ship fit is clearly not limited to his personal diligence. The carrier may be a company, and in any case, in the complication of modern affairs and by reason of the widely scattered situation of seaports, must act by agents or servants, which is the phrase employed in Article IV. (2) (q). The question is, how wide is the category of agents or servants in reference to the obligation in question? It is contended by the plaintiffs that as the primary obligation on the carrier is to provide a seaworthy ship the carrier cannot delegate any part of that obligation so as to relieve his personal liability, and hence must account for lack of due diligence on the part of the shipbuilders and their workmen, who are to be deemed to be the carrier's agents to make the ship seaworthy and fit; and that accordingly the defendants must be held liable for the bad workmanship of which I have found the shipbuilders' men were guilty. I do not think that this contention is sound. The Carriage of Goods by Sea Acts have introduced a new and obligatory code of responsibility and immunities as affecting carriers under bills of lading in place of the former rule that carriers by sea, while under the liability of common carriers, were free by contract to vary and limit their liabilities. In particular the Acts have expressly abolished the previous obligation to provide a seaworthy ship and have substituted an obligation to use due diligence to that effect. The carrier may not be the owner of the ship but merely the charterer; he may not have contracted for the building of the ship but merely have purchased her, possibly years after she has been built. In the two latter cases the builders and their men cannot possibly be deemed to have been the agents or servants of the carrier, and it is illogical that there should be such a difference in the carrier's obligations merely because he has bought the ship by contracting with the builders to build it for him. In addition, if the carrier were held liable for the bad workmanship of the builders' men, he might equally be held liable for bad workmanship by the men employed by the various sub-contractors who supply material for the builders, such as steel workers in furnaces and rolling mills, or who supply special articles such as castings, pumps or proprietary machines, which would involve an almost unlimited retrogression.

Under the old rule the only relevant question was whether the ship was seaworthy or unseaworthy. That rule no doubt was well adapted to more simple days when ships were not very complicated wooden structures of a few hundred tons, but in modern times, when ships are complicated steel structures full of complex machinery, the old rule imposed too serious an obligation on carriers by sea, and I think that the new Acts intended to emphasize the growing specialization and, also, have emphasized the distinction between carrier and shipowner and limited the carrier's obligation to due diligence in his capacity as carrier. He is to be liable for all such duties as appertain to a provident and careful carrier acting as such by the servants and agents in his direct employment. If he has a new vessel built he will be liable if he fails to engage builders of repute and to adopt all reasonable precautions; for instance, requiring the builders to satisfy one of the well-known classification societies, such as Lloyd's, and engaging skilled naval architects to advise him and skilled inspectors to supervise the work. In the same way, if he buy a ship he may be required to show that he has taken appropriate steps to satisfy himself by appropriate surveys and inspections that the ship is fit for the service in which he puts her. But I do not think in any case that the carrier can be held guilty of want of due diligence simply because the builders' employees have put in some bad work which in fact, though concealed, renders the vessel unfit.

In the present case the defendants employed an inspector to supervise the work. I have held that that inspector used due diligence. It may well be that if he had negligently passed bad work which he saw, or even perhaps which he ought to have seen, the carrier would be liable for want of due diligence on the part of one to whom he had delegated the task of inspecting the work. Similarly, he might be held liable if the naval architect whom he employed to supervise the design failed to detect a definite error in design, though I do not think he would be so liable for an error on the part of one of the classification societies, such as Lloyd's, which occupy a public and quasi-judicial position. He might also be liable if, either personally or by his scientific advisers, he chose a special form of construction which involved a risk; for example, if he chose to dispense with a cofferdam in order to increase his cargo space though the best opinion was that a cofferdam was necessary. Again, the need of repairing a ship may cast on the carrier a special duty to see, as far as reasonably possible, by special advisers for whom he is primarily responsible, that the repairs adequately make good the defects.

It was argued that the obligation only attached in respect of matters at the port of loading, the words being "before and at the beginning of the voyage" and the obligation being only on the shipper and dating at earliest from the time of the material contract of carriage. In a sense I think this is true, but if the vessel were in fact unfit owing to some earlier breach of due diligence by the carrier, his agents or servants, I think the carrier would be liable on the ground of actual or imputed knowledge of the defects or failure to use due diligence.

In matters pertaining to the actual conduct of the voyage a somewhat different principle may apply as to the carrier's liability for acts of servants of sub-contractors: for example, for the negligence of stevedores' men; but to load or discharge is part of the definite acts undertaken by the carrier in his capacity of carrier, and he is necessarily liable for the due performance of such acts by the persons who may do them on his behalf.

I have thought it better to deal with the question involved in the construction of the Act itself because it is a new departure on new principles and it has been applied by other countries not necessarily conversant with the English case law. Nor have counsel professed to refer me to any authorities likely to afford me much assistance. I have been referred to two cases under the Harter Act in which the meaning of due diligence to make the ship seaworthy has been discussed, but under that Act the absolute obligation to provide a seaworthy ship is left unabrogated. In the Fitzgerald case (212 Federal Reporter, 678) a shipowner was held liable in respect of an obvious defect in a vessel. In the Abbazia case (127 Federal Reporter, 495) a shipowner was debarred from relying on surveyors' certificates given under circumstances known to the master and engineer to be inconsistent with proper inspection. These cases seem rather to accord with what I have said above. In the English case of Dobell and Co. v. Steamship Rossmore Company, Limited (11 The Times L.R., 501; [1895] 2 Q.B., 408) a shipowner was held responsible for the failure of the ship's carpenter to close a porthole the closing of which was necessary for the seaworthiness of the ship; this was clearly a failure of due diligence on the part of the carriers' servant. In London Rangoon Trading Company, Limited v. Ellerman Lines, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 284) Mr. Justice Sankey held under a charterparty that there had been a failure of due diligence on the part of the shipowners' own servant in not observing an obvious defect, but he indicated that the ship repairers might be regarded as the shipowners' agents to do the repairs. But it appears from Ellerman Lines, Limited v. Smith's Dock Company (18 Ll. L., 172) that the ship repairers had limited instructions and were not instructed to repair the particular defect.

I did not gather that reliance was placed on the exception of "latent defects not discoverable by due diligence," which is contained in Article IV. 2 (p) of the Schedule. Assuming that that refers to defects in the ship, it seems to me to involve the same question of the range of persons whose due diligence is involved, and would also raise the difficult question of the exact meaning of "latent," as to which I may refer to a case in the Court of Appeal, The Dimitrios N. Rallias (128 L.T., 491).

The result is that there will be judgment for the defendants.

GLEED v. GLEED.*

Divorce — Husband's petition — Obligation to make alleged adulterer a co-respondent—Power of Court to grant dispensation—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 177.

In this summons, adjourned into Court, Mr. G. Tyndale asked for leave to dispense with a named co-respondent in a Poor Person's divorce petition.

The President said that this was an application by the petitioner to be relieved of some of the difficulties arising out of the provisions contained in section 28 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and now embodied in section 177 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, whereby a peremptory obligation was imposed on a husband petitioning in divorce to make the alleged adulterer a co-respondent unless, on special grounds to be allowed by the Court, he should be excused. That matter had given rise to difficulties. Questions of the same kind were constantly coming before the Registrars and he had therefore adjourned this summons into Court.

In this case the petitioner in 1923 received an admission from his wife that she had been guilty of adultery with one Bert Morgan, during that year. The petitioner had no knowledge of the identity of Bert Morgan and, if he had known anything about him, probably he would not have discovered his whereabouts after the long interval which elapsed before he became aware of the Poor Persons' Department and was in a position to take any steps.

Unless special grounds could be established to the satisfaction of the Court the petitioner could not proceed without naming a co-respondent. He (his Lordship) had come to the conclusion that it would be a denial of justice in these circumstances to insist on the usual procedure in this case. The petitioner might have been given leave to serve Bert Morgan by substituted service, by way of advertisement, but the alleged adulterer was said to be in Australia and it would be difficult to know in what State of that Commonwealth and in what newspapers such an advertisement could be inserted to be effective. It was quite clear that the provisions referred to for the administration of the divorce law were precautionary and intended to secure a proper observance of the law as to collusion and other matters.

In this case he saw no advantage in putting this litigant to the expense of advertising either in England or in Australia and he directed that, on the facts of the case, leave be given to dispense with the naming of a co-respondent.

ALLIANCE FILM CORPORATION, LIMITED v. KNOLES.*

Companies — Call—Company in liquidation—Action for call previously made—Sums alleged to be due from company to shareholder—No right of set-off.

In a common law action by a company, which is in liquidation, against a shareholder for a call made before the liquidation, the defendant has no right of set-off in respect of sums alleged to be due to him from the company.

Brighton Arcade Company, Limited v. Dowling (L.R., 3 C.P., 175) not followed.

In this action the Alliance Film Corporation, Limited (in liquidation), of 61 and 62, Lincoln's Inn-fields, W.C., sought to recover from Mr. Harley Knoles, a producer for the company, £3,375 and interest in respect of a call of 5s. per share on £13,500 shares, made before the company went into liquidation. Counsel said that the figures would need adjustment. Mr. Knoles claimed to set off various sums which he alleged to be due to him from the company in respect of income-tax and supertax agreed to be paid by the company, commission, and expenses.

Mr. H. S. G. Buckmaster appeared for the plaintiffs; the Hon. S. O. Henn Collins for the defendant.

Mr. Buckmaster referred to Palmer's Company Law, 12th Edition, page 432; and Buckley on Companies, 10th Edition, page 396. Brighton Arcade Company, Limited v. Dowling (L.R., 3 C.P., 175) must now be regarded as overruled. Grissell's case (L.R., 1 Ch., 528) decided that there could be no set-off against calls made in the winding up, and Calisher's case (L.R., 5 Eq., 214) that there could be no set-off against a call made before the winding up.

Mr. Henn Collins said that had this been a proceeding by the liquidator in the winding up he could not have disputed that proposition. But this was, in form, a common law action for debt in the name of the company and, therefore, the ordinary defences were open to him. All the cases in which it had been held that there was no right to set-off were in the winding up Court, but Brighton Arcade Company,

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Limited v. Dowling (supra), where the right was allowed, was the only common law action on the point. To exclude the right of set-off might deprive the defendant of his rights under section 165 (3) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—That only applies to a call made in the liquidation after all the creditors have been paid in full. This call was made before the liquidation, and there is no evidence that the creditors have been paid.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON, in giving judgment for the plaintiffs, said that he thought that the point raised by Mr. Henn Collins, though ingenious, could not prevail. He had urged that the action being, in form, a common law action there arose a right of set-off which did not exist in other proceedings. His argument was that, though the action was, in substance, a claim by the liquidator in the liquidation, it was, in form, a common law action by the company, and, therefore, he had the common law rights which were not available in proceedings taken under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. He (his Lordship) did not think that in these days such an extremely barren technicality ought to prevail, and, anyhow, the defendant would not be excluded from any rights under section 165 (3), which had no application to the present case.

There would be judgment for the plaintiffs for an amount to be adjusted.

JAMES DURNFORD AND SONS, LIMITED v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Contract — Indemnity — Undertaking to indemnify against all claims—Whether inclusive of claims by the persons giving the undertaking —Claim for negligence—Whether the damage arose out of such negligence.

The plaintiffs took a lease of premises from the defendant railway company, and, by an agreement supplemental to the lease, the defendants gave the plaintiffs permission, on certain terms, to use for the transport of materials a portable gangway which could be moved over certain of the defendants' railway lines. One of the terms was that the plaintiffs "agree and undertake to indemnify the said [railway] company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway." When the plaintiffs were using the gangway some trucks were shunted down the line, and the gangway was destroyed. In an action for damages for negligence and/or breach of duty the defendants denied liability and pleaded the aforesaid term of the supplemental agreement. On a preliminary point as to the construction of the agreement,

Held (Sargant, L.J., dissenting), that the undertaking was only one to hold the defendants harmless against claims by third parties, and the preliminary point must be decided in favour of the plaintiffs.

Decision of MacKinnon, J. (43 The Times L.R., 527), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon (43 The Times L.R., 527), which raised the question whether an agreement by the plaintiffs, James Durnford and Sons, Limited, to indemnify the defendants, the Great Western Railway Company, in respect of a certain matter "against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever" operated only to protect the defendants in the case of a claim by third parties, or whether it nullified a claim against the defendants by the plaintiffs themselves—the indemnifiers.

An action had been brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for negligence. An order was made that before dealing with the claim on the facts a preliminary point of law, turning on the true construction of an agreement between the parties, should be tried before the Judge taking the Special Paper.

The facts out of which the case arose were the following:—

In 1914 the Great Western Railway Company let certain premises to the plaintiffs at Bristol. The plaintiffs were contractors, and in the course of their business required to move large quantities of materials by rail. To facilitate the transport of materials they constructed a portable gangway which could be moved over certain railway lines belonging to the Great Western Railway Company. The railway company gave them permission to use the gangway upon certain terms, which were embodied in a memorandum drawn up in 1921 and indorsed on the plaintiffs' lease.

The plaintiffs proceeded to make use of the gangway, and on August 27, 1926, they were using it for the purpose of discharging a load of lime from a motor-lorry into a railway truck when shunting operations were in progress on the railway. While the lorry was on the gangway some trucks were shunted down the line over which it was standing, and the result was that the gangway was struck and destroyed and the motor-lorry was thrown to the ground and so badly damaged that it was rendered useless.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for negligence and/or breach of duty. The Great Western Railway Company denied liability and relied on a condition in the memorandum of 1921. The condition was in the following words:—

"[The plaintiffs] agree and undertake to indemnify the said company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway. . . ."

The railway company submitted that the expression "claims and demands or liability whatsoever" covered every kind of claim, whether made by third parties or by the plaintiffs themselves. "Whatsoever" was equivalent to "however caused and by whomsoever made." The wording of the condition showed that the defendants intended to protect themselves against that very kind of accident.

The plaintiffs contended that the words of the clause in question were not apt to release the railway company from a claim by the plaintiffs themselves, and that the words must be construed strictly against the company, and it was for them to show that the words were apt to give the protection desired, and the plaintiffs further contended that the accident did not arise out of the user of the gangway, but from the negligence of the defendants' servants.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon said that there were three questions :—(1) Did the undertaking to "indemnify" include the abandonment of any claim which the plaintiffs themselves might have against the company ? (2) Did the words "all claims whatsoever" include a claim arising out of negligence by the servants of the railway company ? (3) Did the damage in this case arise out of or in connexion with the user of the gangway ? He held that the words of the indemnity were wide enough to cover negligence by the company's servants and that the damage did arise through the user of the gangway. On the first question he adopted the plaintiffs' suggestion. At the least the expression was, in his opinion, ambiguous and must be construed contra proferentem.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., Mr. Wilfrid Lewis, and Mr. J. A. Stainton appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. E. H. C. Wethered for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls, after stating the facts, said that the words used did not seem apt to bar a claim by the plaintiffs themselves. He could see that words might have been used to the effect that the user of the gangway should be entirely at the plaintiffs' risk and that the railway company should not be responsible in any way for the user. But, taking the clause as a whole, that did not seem to be the effect of the actual words used. It was curious that the words "from and against all claims," &c., were not used. Exactly what the clause might be construed to mean he hesitated to say, but he agreed with Mr. Justice MacKinnon that the words were not apt to defeat a claim by the plaintiffs themselves.

Lord Justice Scrutton delivered judgment to the same effect.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he had the misfortune to differ. A study of the circumstances indicated that the grant of the user of the gangway involved extra danger for the company, and it seemed to him that the company only granted permission to use the gangway on condition that the plaintiffs guaranteed them against any consequences which might arise from its overlapping the railway line. The defendants' contention was not that the plaintiffs had no claim, but that they (the defendants) were indemnified so that they could recover from the plaintiffs anything which they were forced on the claim to pay to the plaintiffs. The Judge below had dealt with the matter as if it were a question of the release of the plaintiffs' claim, whereas it was really a question of the defendants' counterclaim under the terms of the indemnity.

The words used in the indemnity clause seemed to him (Lord Justice Sargant) to be as wide as possible. There was no exception as to any claim by the plaintiffs themselves, and nothing to limit the liability to indemnify to the case of a claim by third parties. If a man insured another against all risk in respect of the latter's motor-car and the motor-car knocked down and injured the insurer, it seemed to him that the injured insurer would be left to find an indemnity from his own insurance.

FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE COMPANY v. WESTERN AUSTRALIAN INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER.*

Insurance (Marine)—Reinsurance—Payment on original policy — Non-liability by reason of unseaworthiness — Failure of claim against reinsurers.

The plaintiffs insured a consignment of gunpowder on a voyage and reinsured with the defendants. Both the original policy and the reinsurance policies covered perils of the sea and jettison and were expressed to be "warranted free from loss arising from . . . destruction . . . in a port of distress or otherwise." The original policy contained no admission of seaworthiness, but the reinsurance policies did contain such an admission, and they provided that the defendants would "pay as paid thereon," and that the payment should be subject to the same terms as in the original policy. The vessel carried, in addition to the gunpowder, 3,000 drums of sulphuric acid, and owing to heavy weather some of the drums burst and the acid disabled the machinery, with the result that the ship had to put in to a port of distress. There the required repairs could not be carried out with the gunpowder on board, and it was thrown overboard and became a total loss. The plaintiffs paid the owners as for a total loss and claimed to be reimbursed by the defendants.

Held, that as the way in which the sulphuric acid was stowed and loaded affected the safety of the ship and rendered her unseaworthy, the plaintiffs were under no liability on the original policy, and therefore they could not recover from the defendants on the reinsurance policies.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs, the Fireman's Fund Insurance Company, claimed, as original insurers, to be reimbursed by the defendants, the Western Australian Insurance Company, Limited, and the Atlantic Assurance Company, Limited, as reinsurers, in respect of a loss under a policy of marine insurance.

Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. Simey appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. David Davies for the defendants.

The plaintiffs had insured a consignment of 300 cases of gunpowder on a voyage from New York to La Plata, and had reinsured their risk with the defendants.

The gunpowder was shipped on a wooden steamer belonging to the United States Shipping Board and chartered by them to charterers. In the course of the voyage the gunpowder was jettisoned. Besides the 300 cases of gunpowder a large quantity of other explosives, not concerned in the present action, including T.N.T., dynamite and detonators, and nearly 3,000 drums of sulphuric acid, were put on board. The steamer met with heavy weather which caused some of the drums of sulphuric acid to burst. The acid spread about the ship, corroding the woodwork and disabling the pumps and machinery, and the steamer had to put in to Barbados in distress. The repairs which the master wanted to be done could not be carried out with the gunpowder on board. By direction of the harbourmaster it was thrown overboard and became a total loss.

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In October, 1921, the plaintiffs paid the owners as for a total loss and claimed to be reimbursed by the defendants.

Both the original policy and the reinsurance policies covered the risks of, inter alia, perils of the sea and jettison.

The plaintiffs contended (1) that, even if the shipping of sulphuric acid in drums which were dangerously weak rendered the vessel unseaworthy at the beginning of the voyage, the reinsurance policies contained a statement that the seaworthiness of the vessel was admitted, and this amounted to an estoppel by agreement and barred the defendants from pleading unseaworthiness; (2) that the reinsurance policies provided that the defendants would "pay as paid thereon," and, if the original insurer in such a case honestly paid a claim, he could recover from his reinsurers even though it was found on further discovery of the facts that he would have had a good defence against the claim; (3) that even if an insurer believed that the vessel was unseaworthy he was not bound to take the defence of unseaworthiness against an innocent cargo owner; (4) that the burden of showing unseaworthiness was on the defendants and all that they had been able to prove was that the sulphuric acid had been improperly stowed; (5) that the harbourmaster did not in fact order, but only requested, that the gunpowder should be jettisoned, and even if he had given the order his position was not such as would make the order a restraint of princes; and (6) that the captain would have thrown the gunpowder overboard without any request, because by that time the adventure was lost and he could not get repairs done as long as the gunpowder remained on board.

The defendants originally put in a defence that the gunpowder was not lost by any of the perils insured against, but subsequently they amended by adding a plea that the steamer on which the gunpowder was carried was unseaworthy at the beginning of the voyage; that both the original policy and the reinsurance policies were expressed to be "warranted free from loss arising from restraint . . . or destruction . . . whether . . . occurring in a port of distress or otherwise . . ."; and that the jettison took place by order of the harbourmaster of Bridgetown, Barbados.

Mr. Dunlop, for the plaintiffs, said that the owners of the gunpowder had nothing to do with the shipping of the sulphuric acid. There was no allegation that the settlement between the plaintiffs and their insured was not an honest settlement. An underwriter must not pay unless his insured made out a prima facie case, but if the insured did prove facts showing a prima facie case the underwriter could waive any defence that he might have, provided that in doing so he acted honestly and reasonably in the circumstances.

On the point of seaworthiness, it had never been decided that the claim of a shipper of innocent cargo could be defeated on the ground that the ship was unseaworthy by reason of loading the dangerous cargo of some other owner. In fact, the ship, as a ship, was perfectly seaworthy when she began to load the sulphuric acid, and as between an insurer and an insured it had never been decided that bad stowage amounted to unseaworthiness. What would amount to unseaworthiness as between shipowner and cargo owner need not be unseaworthiness as between an innocent cargo owner and his insurer.

The steamer in this case was sufficiently repaired at Barbados to enable her to get back to the United States, and there she was sold for $900, being worth practically nothing. The trouble here arose from the fact that the sulphuric acid was badly stowed, and when rough weather was met with the drums broke loose and burst.

As to the law, even if the vessel was not seaworthy at the beginning of the voyage the defendants could not rely on that fact as they had admitted seaworthiness by their contract, Parfitt v. Thompson (13 M. and W., 392); Phillips v. Nairne (4 C.B., 343); Cantiere Meccanico Brindisino v. Janson (28 The Times L.R., 564; [1912] 3 K.B., 452).

Mr. Porter, interposing, said that a contract of reinsurance was only a contract to indemnify the insured against claims which he was legally bound to pay, and if the person insured under the reinsurance policy chose to pay a claim to which he would have had a good defence he could not recover from his reinsurer.

Mr. Dunlop submitted that the admission of seaworthiness in the reinsurance policies was an admission between the plaintiffs and the defendants for all purposes whatever, and as a result of that admission even if the vessel was unseaworthy at the beginning of the risk the defendants were estopped from relying on that fact, whether the original insurers could have relied on it or not.

Further, in view of the covenant in the reinsurance policy to "pay as paid thereon" the reinsurers here were bound to recompense the reinsured for any payments honestly and reasonably made by the reinsured, and the reinsurers could not refuse to pay because the reinsured might have resisted payment to their own assured by raising defences such as non-disclosure, &c. Chippendale v. Holt (12 The Times L.R., 50); Western Assurance Company of Toronto v. Poole ([1903] 1 K.B., 376, at pp. 385-6); Marten v. Steamship Owners' Underwriting Association (18 The Times L.R., 613); Nelson v. Empress Assurance Corporation, Limited (21 The Times L.R., 555; [1905] 2 K.B., 281); Scottish Metropolitan Assurance Company, Limited v. Groom (40 The Times L.R., 676; 41 The Times L.R., 35).

The plaintiffs here insured the gunpowder against loss by the perils insured against, and what they reinsured was, not their liability to pay on the original policy, but the risk of the gunpowder being lost by a peril insured against; and in the events which happened the gunpowder was lost by the perils insured against. Section 34 (3) of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, expressly provided that an insurer could waive a breach of warranty, and the only case that he had been able to find which dealt with the right of a reinsured to waive conditions in the contract between himself and his own assured was Fire Insurance Association, Limited, and Others v. Canada Fire and Marine Insurance Company (2 Ont. Rep., 481). Underwriters on cargo did not in practice take the defence of unseaworthiness, Sleigh v. Tyser (16 The Times L.R., 404; [1900] 2 Q.B., 333, at p. 336). A contract of reinsurance was not a contract of indemnity, but was a new insurance of the thing originally insured (Arnould on Marine Insurance, section 323); British Dominions General Insurance Company, Limited v. Duder (31 The Times L.R., 361; [1915] 2 K.B., 394, at p. 400).

There was the further question, whether this was a loss by restraint of princes. A harbourmaster was not a "ruler" or "prince," and this harbourmaster did not in fact give any order which prevented the carrying out of the adventure. His request did not amount to a "restraint."

Mr. SIMEY followed, and submitted that, on the question of seaworthiness, the goods owner warranted his insurer that the ship was fit to take the particular cargo, and warranted that the result of putting his cargo on board should not endanger the ship, Biccard v. Shepherd (14 Moore, P.C., 471), but he did not make any warranty with reference to cargo put on board by other persons.

He referred to the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, section 40 (1), (2), and to Elder, Dempster and Co., Limited v. Paterson, Zochonis and Co., Limited (40 The Times L.R., 464 ; [1924] A.C., 522, at pp. 561-2).

Mr. PORTER, for the defendants, submitted that the fact that without exceptionally heavy weather, the cargo of acid was adrift within a few hours of leaving New York, was prima facie evidence that the vessel was unseaworthy for this adventure. It was known that sulphuric acid was a dangerous cargo and should either be carried on deck, so that if any trouble arose it could be at once jettisoned, or, if carried in a hold should be packed in some absorbent material so that if leakage should occur the escaping acid would be absorbed before it could do any damage. Here neither of those precautions had been taken.

The unseaworthiness which in fact existed was due to three causes : the drums were of too weak construction ; some of the drums were leaking at the start ; and the whole of the drums were badly stowed. Bad stowage which endangered the ship amounted to unseaworthiness, Kopitoff v. Wilson (1 Q.B.D., 377) ; Ingram and Royle, Limited v. Services Maritimes du Tréport (29 The Times L.R., 274 ; [1913] 1 K.B., 538). The standard of seaworthiness required was shown by section 39 (4) of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, and that applied whether the insurance was one of a ship or of goods. So far as unseaworthiness was concerned the warranty was the same both in a bill of lading and in an insurance, Becker, Gray and Co. v. London Assurance Corporation (34 The Times L.R., 36 ; [1918] A.C., 101, at p. 114).

A contract of reinsurance was only a contract to indemnify the original insurer against the sum which he actually had to pay, it was not an independent insurance of the goods for the voyage, British Dominions General Insurance Company, Limited v. Duder (supra). The reinsurance contract might be defined as a contract of insurance on goods, limited to the liability of the original insurer. Section 1 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, expressly limited the contract of marine insurance to indemnity. A reinsurer was only liable if the original insurer was liable, St. Paul Fire and Marine Insurance Company v. Morice (22 The Times L.R., 449).

As to the words, "pay as paid thereon," those words had never been held to create an obligation to pay unless the original underwriter was legally compellable to pay, except that if the original underwriter had made a reasonable settlement the reinsurer could not dispute it. The original underwriter had no right to be generous with other people's money. There was a provision also in this reinsurance policy that the payment should be subject to the same terms as in the original policy.

On the point of restraint of princes, the original policy contained a warranty free from capture, seizure . . . restraint . . . destruction . . ., and so, if the action of the harbourmaster was a restraint, it was not covered by that policy. And the evidence showed that the gunpowder was really thrown overboard by order of the authorities, or in consequence of their refusal to allow it to be landed.

He referred to Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (19 The Times L.R., 331 ; [1903] 1 K.B., 712, at p. 720).

Mr. SIMEY replied. It was the condition of the steamer, not the request of the harbourmaster, that put an end to the adventure. The fate of the gunpowder would have been just the same if the harbourmaster had not done anything at all.

MR. JUSTICE BATESON, in his considered judgment, said that he must decide for the defendants on the ground that, these being policies of reinsurance, there was no liability under them unless there had been liability under the original policy, and, in fact, there had been no liability under that policy, because the vessel was unseaworthy.

His LORDSHIP read clauses from the original policy and from the reinsurance policies. He said that they all included perils of the sea and jettison, but the original policy did not contain any admission of seaworthiness. It was clear that the reinsurance policies covered the liability of the original insurer and it was also clear that the original insurer could have avoided payment if the goods were lost owing to the ship being unseaworthy.

He then dealt with the facts and held that the ship was so loaded and stowed as to be unseaworthy at the beginning of the adventure. Sulphuric acid was a dangerous cargo and the way in which it was stowed and loaded in this case affected the safety of the ship, as a ship, and rendered her unseaworthy. For the plaintiffs, it was contended that it was not the gunpowder which caused the unseaworthiness and that the owner of the gunpowder could not be made to suffer because the ship had been made unseaworthy by the cargo of someone else. There was no authority for drawing that distinction and section 39 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, was against the contention.

It was also said that, on the facts, this was only a case of bad stowage and not one of unseaworthiness, but he could not agree with that. It was further contended that the words "seaworthiness admitted" in the reinsurance policies estopped the reinsurers from taking any point as to unseaworthiness ; but the answer to that was that a reinsurance policy covered only the liability of the original insurers and if the original insurers never were liable the reinsurers also were not liable.

Then it was said that the words "to pay as paid thereon" made the reinsurers liable because the original insurers had in fact paid and were entitled to waive any defences which they might have against their assured provided that they acted honestly and reasonably. The plaintiffs, in fact, did not "waive" anything ; they paid apparently without knowing or caring what defences they might have to the claim. In any case an insurer could not waive defences without the consent of his reinsurer if by so waiving he extended the reinsurer's liability. The Court had nothing to do with the statement that it was contrary to respectable business practice for underwriters to take a defence of unseaworthiness against the owner of a parcel of innocent goods. The ship here was, in fact, unseaworthy, and it would be improper to hold that the word "unseaworthy" had a meaning in a policy different from its meaning in a contract of carriage, Becker, Gray and Co. v. London

A contract of reinsurance was a contract to indemnify against losses suffered by the original insurer, not against gifts made by him ; the original insurer must have both paid and been liable to pay. The words "to pay as paid thereon" only covered payments for which the original insurer was legally liable and, if the original insurer wished to be covered in respect of payments which he might voluntarily make, he must stipulate to that effect. No doubt the original insurers in this case would have had a right over against the carrier, but, unfortunately, the carrier was insolvent. That, however, gave the original insurers no right against the reinsurers. The Canadian case, Fire Insurance Association, Limited, and Others v. Canada Fire and Marine Insurance Company (2 Ont. Rep., 481), which had been referred to in argument, was quite different in its facts and had no application here.

He decided the case on the ground that the ship was unseaworthy. That made it unnecessary to deal with the further point which was raised of restraint of princes, and he said nothing about that.

There must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

COOPER v. MIRRON AND ANOTHER.*

Practice — Poor persons—Costs—Admission to sue or defend as a poor person—Change in financial position before hearing—No obligation on poor person to inform the Court—R.S.C., Order XVI., rr. 22-31 H.

Observations on the omission, from the Poor Persons Rules, of an obligation on a person admitted to sue or defend as a poor person to inform the Court that his income or assets have undergone a change which would take him out of the class of persons for whom the Poor Persons Rules were intended.

In this action Mrs. Alice Jane Cooper, a widow, of 2, Belmont-road, Clapham, S.W., claimed from Mr. Gabriel Mirron, a registered dentist, of 24, Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury, W.C., and Dr. Alfred Joseph Chiappa Sinclair, of 30A, Wimpole-street, W., damages for the death of her daughter, Edith, aged 30, which, she said, was caused by the negligence of the defendants, in connexion with the extraction of her daughter's teeth at the National Dental Hospital, Great Portland-street, W.

Mr. Mirron was the house surgeon and Dr. Sinclair was the medical superintendent at the hospital, which was now the dental department of University College Hospital, and the evidence showed that on May 22, 1925, Miss Cooper had a tooth extracted under gas by a student. In the course of the operation a piece of the tooth broke off, and, passing down her windpipe, became embedded in the right bronchus. She was not informed of the accident and pneumonia supervened, from which she died on August 27, 1925.

Both the defendants denied that they were guilty of negligence. The jury, however, found that Mr. Mirron had been guilty of negligence which had resulted in Miss Cooper's death and they awarded the plaintiff £150 damages against him. They found no negligence by Dr. Sinclair.

Leave had been granted to Mrs. Cooper to sue and to Mr. Mirron to defend as poor persons. After the jury had returned their verdict, it was stated that Mr. Mirron was admitted to defend as a poor person on March 5, 1926, when his means came within the necessary limits, but, a month later, he obtained an appointment as a dentist's assistant at a salary of £6 10s. a week and lived rent free in the dentist's house. He had not informed his legal advisers or the Court of his change of means and his Lordship said that he would postpone entering judgment.

Mr. A. T. Denning and Mr. E. H. O'Donnell appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. F. W. Wallace and Mr. P. B. Showan for Mr. Mirron ; and Mr. A. A. Pereira for Dr. Sinclair.

Mr. PEREIRA asked for an order that Dr. Sinclair's costs should be provided for. Had it not been, he said, for the fact that both Mrs. Cooper and Mr. Mirron had been admitted as poor persons his Lordship would probably have made an order that Mrs. Cooper should pay Dr. Sinclair's costs and that she should be able to recover them from Mr. Mirron (see Bullock v. London General Omnibus Company, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 62 ; [1907] 1 K.B., 264). Order XVI., rule 28, however, which provided that, in the absence of a special order, a poor person should not be liable to pay costs to another party, rendered an order in that form in Dr. Sinclair's favour useless to him. But his Lordship had a full discretion under Order XVI., rule 29, to make an order regarding the costs without fully "depauperizing" Mr. Mirron.

MR. JUSTICE MCCARDIE.—There seems to be a defect in these Poor Persons Rules. Under Order XVI., rule 31, "should the conducting solicitor discover at any time that the poor person . . . is possessed of means beyond those stated in the certificate he shall at once report the matter in writing to the Court and to the committee which nominated him," but I can find nothing in the Rules which provides that an admitted poor person who becomes possessed of means which, prima facie, would prevent him from being a poor person, is under any obligation to inform anyone of the change in his position. The result is amazing. A man may get leave to sue as a poor person on the footing that his wages are not more than £2 a week and that he is not worth more than £50, and within a month he may become entitled to a fortune of £10,000, and no obligation is imposed on him to say a word about it to his solicitor, or his counsel or the Court. That is a very serious omission.

Mr. PEREIRA said that a litigant in that position had a moral obligation to disclose the change in his means and if he did not discharge it his Lordship could exercise his discretion as he thought fit.

Counsel added that, if his Lordship had not a discretion, Dr. Sinclair would have to pay the costs of an action in which he had been successful and would have no redress against any one. No action would have been brought against Dr. Sinclair if Mr. Mirron had not thrown the blame entirely on him. He asked his Lordship to order that Mr. Mirron should pay Dr. Sinclair's costs direct, or to order specially that Mrs. Cooper should pay the full costs and should be able to recover them from Mr. Mirron. He referred to the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 50, subsection 1, and The Esrom and The Wills, No. 66 ([1914] W.N. 81).

Mr. WALLACE agreed that his Lordship had a full discretion to deal with the matter. Mr. Mirron's conduct, however, was not open to any reprehension or criticism. He had made a full disclosure of his means when he was admitted as a poor person and there was on him no obligation, moral or legal, to disclose the subsequent acquirement of means. There was no reason to depart from the ordinary procedure in poor persons' cases which was that a plaintiff did not get an order for costs against an unsuccessful poor person defendant. Bullock v. London General Omnibus Company, Limited (supra) was a very different case. There both the defendants expressly alleged negligence against each other. In the present case Mr. Mirron had to mention Dr. Sinclair when he stated the facts bona fide, and Dr. Sinclair was made a party to the action, not to establish Mrs. Cooper's case against Mr. Mirron, but as a second string to her bow. Mr. Mirron had succeeded on two out of three issues.

Mr. O'Donnell submitted that Mr. Mirron could be ordered to pay Dr. Sinclair's costs direct, but he asked that an order should be made for such payment only after Mr. Mirron had paid the damages. There was no question that Mrs. Cooper was in greater financial need than Dr. Sinclair.

Mr. Pereira said that Dr. Sinclair had no desire to be in any way oppressive to Mrs. Cooper.

Mr. Justice McCardie, in giving judgment, said that under the Poor Persons Rules, prima facie, Mrs. Cooper would get no costs against Mr. Mirron, and Mr. Mirron was not liable to pay costs in the absence of a special order (Order XVI., rule 28 (1)). If Mr. Mirron had in any way misled the Court he (his Lordship) would not have hesitated to discharge the certificate entitling him to defend as a poor person. The Court must always punish dishonesty, but the statements which Mr. Mirron had made in his application were quite correct, and there was no dishonest suppression of any fact.

The Poor Persons Rules were seriously defective in the respect to which he had referred. They should contain a definite and imperative obligation on every person admitted to sue or defend as a poor person to inform the Court of any change in his income or assets which would take him out of the class of persons for whom the Poor Persons Rules were intended. One would have thought that those who drafted the Rules must have been alive to that point, but the only statement dealing with the matter was the duty of the consulting solicitor to inform the Court of a change of means which had come to his knowledge (Order XVI., rule 31). The view of the draftsman of the Rules clearly was that the Court should be informed at once of any change in the litigant's financial position.

It had been said that there had been a moral obligation on Mr. Mirron to disclose his increased means. But the phrase "moral obligation" was a broad one and in the present case there was no moral obligation which ought to be enforced. His (his Lordship's) own view was that it had never occurred to Mr. Mirron to inform any one of the improvement in his means. No one had ever suggested to him that he should do so. In the circumstances it would not be right or just to "depauperize" him.

No costs, therefore, would be given for or against Mr. Mirron in the absence of a special order. The facts of the present case precluded the application of Bullock v. London General Omnibus Company (23 The Times L.R., 62; [1907] 1 K.B., 264). He was not satisfied that section 50 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, read in conjunction with Order LXV., rule 1, empowered him to make a direct order of the kind indicated by Mr. Pereira, but, in any event, as a matter of discretion he would not make such an order because of the peculiar circumstances of the case.

His Lordship, therefore, made no special order regarding costs. Judgment was entered for Mrs. Cooper against Mr. Mirron for £150 damages, without any order regarding costs save those appropriate to poor persons' cases. Judgment was entered for Dr. Sinclair.

IN RE HARRINGTON MOTOR CO., LIMITED.*

Companies — Winding-up — Insurance of company against claims — Judgment against company—Subsequent liquidation—Payment by insurers to liquidator — Whether amount available for general creditors.

The applicant obtained judgment against a limited company for damages for personal injuries and costs. Afterwards the company went into liquidation, and the insurance company with which the company in liquidation was insured paid the amount of the damages and costs to the liquidator.

Held, that the applicant was not entitled to have the amount in question paid to him direct by the liquidator, but it formed part of the assets for distribution among the general creditors, including the applicant.

This was a summons taken out by Mr. Walter Chaplin, of Galleywood, Chelmsford, against the liquidator of the Harrington Motor Company, Limited.

Mr. Chaplin had recovered £324 damages for personal injuries in an action in the King's Bench Division. He now asked for a declaration that that sum, together with the costs—£273—both of which had been paid over to the liquidator by the insurance company in which the motor company was insured, did not form part of the assets of the company available for distribution among the creditors in the winding up.

Mr. W. N. Stable appeared for the applicant; Mr. Bischoff for the liquidator.

Mr. Stable said that the damages which the applicant had recovered had been paid over by the insurance company in which the motor company was insured to the liquidator. The applicant claimed that they were payable to him direct and were not available for the general creditors.

Counsel referred to In re Richardson ([1911] 2 K.B., 705); and British Union and National Insurance Company v. Rawson (32 The Times L.R., 665; [1916] 2 Ch., 476). There were, however, two authorities on the other side—namely, In re Law Guarantee and Trust Society, Limited—Liverpool Mortgage Insurance Company's case (30 The Times L.R., 616; [1914] 2 Ch., 617); and In re Law Guarantee and Trust Society, Limited—Godson's Claim ([1915] 1 Ch., 340). But those cases, he submitted, were distinguishable. When insolvency arose there was an equity to apply this money in a particular way. Again, even though the third party had no legal or equitable right as against the liquidator, it was one of those cases which fell within the principle of Ex parte James (L.R., 9 Ch., 609). Moreover, his Lordship had jurisdiction to allow a judgment creditor to levy execution on the assets of an insolvent company, even after the winding-up order.

Mr. BISCHOFF said that the judgment in the King's Bench Division was obtained before the liquidation and the applicant was, therefore, a creditor in the liquidation and entitled to share in the assets. The authorities showed that it was not sufficient to say that this was money recovered with respect to an indemnity. But there was another method of recovery, and that was by appealing to a Court of Equity, when the Court would only act on the footing that justice should be done. That was the case of In re Richardson (supra) on which the applicant relied. But this case came within the Liverpool Mortgage Insurance case (supra) ; Anglo-Baltic and Mediterranean Bank v. Barber and Co. ([1924] 2 K.B., 410) ; and Godson's Claim (supra).

Mr. STABLE replied.

MR. JUSTICE EVE, in giving judgment, stated the facts and said that the case had given rise to an interesting discussion, but, in his opinion, the questions involved were concluded by authority. All that In re Richardson ([1911] 2 K.B., 705) decided was that a liquidator or trustee who was under an obligation to account to a third party was in no better position than the original party. It was quite impossible here to make out that the applicant, with whom they all must sympathize, had any claim at law or in equity against the moneys in the hands of the liquidator. It was said that it was unfair or unrighteous that this money should be applied for the benefit of others. But the difficulty was that the law stated that the assets, unless subject to a legal or equitable lien, were to be distributed among the creditors. He must assume that the legislature in so directing had considered that less injustice would be worked by a pari passu distribution than by giving particular creditors preference. The question was, Was there any special case made out for interfering with that distribution ? He thought not. Having arrived at that conclusion, he would be acting contrary to it were he to say that the applicant should be at liberty to levy execution after the winding up. That might give him a preference to which he was not entitled. He (his Lordship), therefore, had no alternative but to dismiss the summons. It was not a case for dismissal with costs unless the liquidator pressed for them.

Mr. BISCHOFF said that his client did not ask for costs.

MUSMANN v. ENGELKE.*

International Law — Diplomatic privilege — Action to recover rent—Entry of appearance under protest—Plea of privilege by defendant —Evidence—Consular secretary attached to German Embassy — Extent of privilege — Right of cross-examination — Intervention of Attorney-General on behalf of Foreign Office.

In an action for arrears of rent due under a lease of a dwelling-house the defendant entered a conditional appearance under protest, and pleaded that being an official of the German Embassy he was protected by diplomatic privilege. It appeared that he was a "consular secretary" formerly working at the German Consulate, but that he had been transferred to the German Embassy. The Attorney-General upon the instructions of the Foreign Office appeared and informed the Court that the defendant was recognized by the Foreign Office as being on a list comprising the suite of the German Ambassador. The plaintiff disputed the claim of privilege, and obtained an order from Shearman, J., for the cross-examination of the defendant.

Held (Lord Hanworth, M.R., dissenting), that as a consul and a consular official are not within the diplomatic privilege of immunity from process, and the Foreign Office Diplomatic List was not conclusive upon the point, the question was one ultimately of fact, and the exact facts ought to be ascertained by cross-examination, to which the defendant was bound to submit.

Duff Development Company v. Government of Kelantan (40 The Times L.R., 566 ; [1924] A.C., 797) distinguished by Scrutton, L.J.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Shearman allowing an appeal from the order of a Master, and ordering the defendant to attend for cross-examination. The action was brought to recover arrears of rent due on the lease of a house in Hampstead. The defendant, Herr Hermann Gustav Constantine Engelke, who entered a conditional appearance, claimed that all proceedings should be set aside on the ground that he was a consular secretary on the staff of the German Embassy, and as such was entitled to the diplomatic privilege of immunity from civil process. Other interlocutory proceedings were taken which are referred to at length in the judgments below. The claim of the defendant was supported by the Foreign Office, which instructed the Attorney-General to appear and argue the case. The defendant's affidavit having been disputed by the plaintiff, who contended that he was merely a consular official doing consular work which had been transferred to the German Embassy, the Master ordered that the defendant should be allowed to put in his affidavits without being cross-examined, and refused an order for cross-examination, which Mr. Justice Shearman allowed. The full facts and arguments appear from the judgments.

Mr. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. W. T. Monckton appeared for the appellant ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Drucquer for the Foreign Office ; and Mr. Giveen and Mr. J. B. Blagden for the respondent.

LORD HANWORTH, M.R.—On July 28, 1926, the plaintiff in this action issued a writ against Hermann Gustav Constantine Engelke, claiming, in the statement of claim upon the back of the writ, arrears of rent due under a lease dated August 18, 1924, made between the plaintiff and the defendant whereby the plaintiff let to the defendant certain premises known as "The Oaks," No. 3, Frognal, Hampstead, together with other items stated therein. The writ was served upon the defendant and on July 30, 1926, his solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors informing them that the defendant is "an official of the German Embassy duly registered on the list of officials kept by the Foreign Office and our client is therefore entitled to diplomatic privilege. May we refer you to the Diplomatic Privileges Act (7 Anne, c. 12) ?" and adding: "Will you kindly inform us that in these circumstances you will withdraw the writ and give notice of discontinuance ?" The plaintiff's solicitors declined to accede to this request and said: "If your client intends to set up the plea of diplomatic privilege we must put him to strict proof." The defendant entered a conditional appearance on August 5, and on August 12 a summons was issued on behalf of the defendant for an order to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings "on the ground that the defendant is a consular secretary on the staff of the German Embassy since November 25, 1920, and has been notified as such to the British Foreign Office and that the defendant's name appears in the Diplomatic List issued by the British Foreign Office." This summons was accompanied and supported by an affidavit made by the defendant's solicitor affirming the above facts and exhibiting a certificate to the same effect, dated August 5, under the hand and seal of the German Chargé d'Affaires in London. When the summons was heard on August 26, the Senior Master made an order, as asked, setting aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings. From this order an appeal was taken to Mr. Justice Talbot on October 18, when the learned Judge, acting upon the materials then before him, allowed the appeal and ordered that the plaintiff should be at liberty to proceed with his action. The learned Judge further ordered that the defendant should have leave to appeal, and also ten days' further time to apply to set aside the writ. This latter portion of the order gave the defendant an election. He decided not to appeal, but to make another application to set aside the proceedings and issued a summons the same day, October 26, to set aside the writ and all proceedings "on the ground that the defendant is in the service of the Ambassador of the German Empire at the Court of St. James's, London, since November 25, 1920, and had been notified as such." On November 3 the defendant swore an affidavit stating that he held the position of consular secretary on the staff of the German Embassy; that in all his work he was answerable only to the German Ambassador; and "Further, I perform general duties which fall upon the staff of the Embassy, such as the coding and decoding of telegrams."

* Reported by H. LANGFORD LEWIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On November 9 notice was given on behalf of the plaintiff that on the hearing of this second summons to set aside the writ, application would be made for leave to cross-examine the defendant upon the affidavit sworn by him.

On December 3, 1926, a certificate was obtained from the Foreign Office, signed by an Assistant Under-Secretary of State and sealed with the seal of the Foreign Office, stating that the name of the defendant appeared in June, 1921, in the Foreign Office list of persons composing the diplomatic establishments and households of each Embassy and Legation, and thereafter till 1924, as assistant clerk on the staff of the German Ambassador, and since then as consular secretary on the staff of the German Ambassador.

On December 8 the defendant swore a further affidavit repeating the statements made in his former one, and stating in paragraph 2: "I am exclusively employed on the staff of the Embassy, and have no duties save on the said staff and am not allowed to do any work apart from my duties at the Embassy. I am in every way a regular member of the Embassy Staff and am responsible to the Ambassador for every part of my work." He also exhibited the notification to the British Foreign Office of his having taken the place in the German Embassy of a predecessor, whose return to Germany was therein officially notified. That notification was dated November 30, 1920.

The above affidavits were controverted by the plaintiff, who affirmed that the defendant was a consular secretary, doing consular work only, which had now been transferred to the German Embassy at Carlton House-terrace from 21A, Bedford-place.

On December 9 the Master ordered that the defendant should be allowed generally and without specific attention to their contents to put in his affidavits without being cross-examined upon them; but on appeal Mr. Justice Horridge remitted the matter to the Master again to decide, upon the contents of the affidavits, whether the defendant should attend for cross-examination.

On February 15, 1927, on the matter thus coming before him for further consideration upon the affidavits, the Master refused to order the defendant to be cross-examined, and on March 4 Mr. Justice Shearman allowed an appeal from the Master's order and ordered "that the defendant do attend for the purpose of cross-examination." He has given leave to appeal to this Court, as he considered the matter of such importance that it should be decided after argument in Court, and the defendant has appealed, asking that the order of the Master refusing to order cross-examination may be restored.

The case was heard on April 11 and 12 and May 30. On the first of those days the Attorney-General attended, instructed by the Treasury Solicitor, to give information to the Court. The plaintiff in the action, the respondent to the present appeal, contends that the defendant's duties were and still are consular in their nature, or at any rate of such a kind that he is entitled to subject him to cross-examination in order to ascertain what his duties and position are, although he does not exclude the possibility that after the defendant's position has been ascertained it may be found that he is entitled to diplomatic privilege, for Mr. Giveen does not dispute that if it is properly proved that the defendant does perform diplomatic duties he is entitled to exemption. The appellant in this Court, the defendant in the action, contends that he has adduced materials, reinforced and amplified by the presence of and information given by the Attorney-General, sufficient to entitle him to that privilege without more inquiry.

It is not contended before this Court that the defendant would be entitled to diplomatic privilege if he is to be considered as a consul or merely performing consular duties. Such persons are not within the privilege. See Heathfield v. Chilton (4 Burrows, 2016) and Viveash v. Becker (3 M. and S., 284).

It is also clear that as to the status of a foreign potentate or foreign Power the proper course is that the Court should apply to his Majesty's Government, and that in any such matter it is bound to act on the information given to it through the appropriate department. "Such information is not in the nature of evidence: it is a statement by the Sovereign of this country through one of his Ministers upon a matter which is peculiarly within his cognizance." See per Lord Finlay in Duff Development Company v. Kelantan Government (40 The Times L.R., 566; [1924] A.C. 797, at p. 813) ; and at page 815 he adds : "There is no ground for saying that because the question involves considerations of law these must be determined by the Courts. The answer of the King, through the appropriate department, settles the matter whether it depends on fact or on law."

The same principle applies to the person of an ambassador to the Court of St. James's. Who is to determine who is the ambassador of a foreign country ? Surely that must be decided upon information obtained from the Foreign Office, information which when received cannot be questioned in a court of law. The ambassador is accredited to the Court of St. James's and is presented to and received by his Majesty. It is the home Sovereign who has the power and right of recognition. The reasoning of Lord Dunedin in the above case then applies (p. 820) : "If our Sovereign recognizes and expresses the recognition through the mouth of his Minister that another person is a Sovereign, how could it be right for the Courts of our own Sovereign to proceed upon an examination of that person's supposed attributes to examine his claim and, refusing that claim, to deny to him the comity which their own Sovereign had conceded ? "

The present case, however, is not easy to decide upon the above rules. The evidence before the Court offers ground for the contention that the defendant falls within the definition of a consul—a consular secretary—who was at one time employed at the office where the consular work of the Germans was centred, No. 21A, Bedford-place. On the other hand, there is evidence that he is "exclusively employed on the staff of the Embassy and has no duties save on the said staff," and that he performs general duties which fall upon the staff of the Embassy, and in particular the coding and decoding of telegrams. This latter duty was taken as a test in the case of Parkinson v. Potter (2 The Times L.R., 184 ; 16 Q.B.D., 152), where it was held that diplomatic privilege, if otherwise to be conceded, was not lost because the diplomat was also a consul.

It is not claimed that the certificate of the Foreign Office dated December 3, 1926, is conclusive. If the matter rested upon that certificate alone further information might be required, even though it does appear to state that the defendant is accepted by the Foreign Office as being upon the staff of the German Ambassador, and recognition by the Foreign Office was accepted as establishing immunity in Macartney v. Garbutt (6 The Times L.R., 214 ; 24 Q.B.D., 368).

Our attention was called to a number of cases where the question whether the claimant was entitled to diplomatic immunity was decided by the Court upon the facts contained in the evidence before it. In Darling v. Atkins (3 Wils., 33) a purser of a ship of war was held not to be a bona-fide servant of an ambassador. In Novello v. Toogood (1 B. and C., 554), where the servant of an ambassador did not reside in his master's house but rented and lived in another, part of which he let in lodgings, it was held that his goods in that house, not being necessary for the convenience of the ambassador, were not exempt from distress. In Fisher v. Begrez (1 Cr. and M., 117) the affidavit as to exemption fell far short of what was required to establish it. The decision in Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin (2 E. and E., 94) was upon a demurrer, so the mode of ascertaining the fact that the defendant was a public minister did not arise. Lord Campbell, however (pp. 103 and 114), pointed out that what was to be avoided was "coactio" to the ambassador.

According to modern procedure cross-examination could and might be allowed to clear up the ambiguity as to the nature of the defendant's duties which appears from the affidavits filed. Whether that course would be satisfactory may be doubtful. More facts might be elicited, and then it would become a question of law whether those facts justified the claim of privilege ; and meantime, if privilege is ultimately accorded, the holder of it would have been subjected to processes from which the comity of international intercourse releases him. However, it may not be possible to avoid it, and the cases cited above seem to show that where doubts arise, and there is no special information afforded to the Court, its usual procedure must be followed, even though by section 3 of the statute of Anne all writs and processes against any public minister and his servants are to be adjudged utterly null and void. This must be so when a simple question of fact has to be decided, such as whether the person in question has, or has not, ceased to hold his position, and ceased, consequently, to preserve his immunity. But the immunity given by diplomatic privilege belongs to the ambassador or minister in whose service it is claimed. It is not the immunity of the particular individual. It is the ambassador who throws his cloak over his attaché or servant and all persons associated in the performance of the duties of the embassy or legation. As Mr. Justice Wills said in Parkinson v. Potter (supra, at p. 159) : "It is not for us to measure the quantum of the services, either required from or rendered by him," where no question of bona fides is raised.

As Lord Sumner says in the Duff Development case (supra, at p. 824) the Court must act on the best evidence. In reference to the status of a foreign ruler, he says : "It is the prerogative of the Crown to recognize or to withhold recognition from States or Chiefs of States, and to determine from time to time the status with which foreign Powers are to be deemed to be invested. This being so, a foreign ruler, whom the Crown recognizes as a sovereign, is such a sovereign for the purposes of an English court of law, and the best evidence of such recognition is the statement duly made with regard to it in his Majesty's name. Accordingly, where such a statement is forthcoming no other evidence is admissible or needed." This reasoning would, in my opinion, apply if the question was, who is the ambassador of a foreign country accredited to this country ?

Diplomatic immunity depends upon the comity of nations. It has often been said that the statute of Anne was declaratory of the common law and did not alter it. How, then, is this immunity to be determined ? It is clear that the Court could ask for and might be given information from a Secretary of State, which would then be authoritative and conclusive. In the present case the Attorney-General, moved thereto by the Foreign Office, has attended and has in his own person informed the Court that the defendant has been, and is, recognized by the Foreign Office as a member of the suite of the German Ambassador. The Foreign Office might have made no intervention, or replied that it is a question of fact that they are unable to determine, and have left the matter to take its course in the King's Courts. But where they have definite information to give, and give it through the Attorney-General, who takes upon himself the responsibility of conveying that information, with full appreciation of the importance of that responsibility, I find it impossible to neglect or pass over such intervention and to hold that in spite of it the matter is left in such uncertainty that cross-examination of the defendant ought to be ordered. There is before the Court the certificate from the Foreign Office dated December 3, 1926, signed by an assistant under-secretary to the effect that the defendant is one of the persons composing the diplomatic establishment and household and upon the staff of the German Ambassador.

This statement has been rendered unequivocal by the statement of the Attorney-General. What better evidence as to the status of the defendant could be forthcoming? If he were cross-examined, and the Master or Judge or Court before whom the issue was to be determined came to the conclusion that the defendant was not entitled to diplomatic privilege, the divergence deprecated by Lord Dunedin (supra, at p. 820), between the decision of the Court and the comity extended by the department charged to exercise such in the name of his Majesty, would become apparent.

In In re Suarez (34 The Times L.R., 127; [1918] 1 Ch., 176), the Foreign Office afforded information that the defendant had ceased to be the Minister of the Bolivian Government and had lost any title to diplomatic privilege. The certificate of the Foreign Office was treated as conclusive.

The case of Aksionairnoye Obschestvo A. M. Luther v. Sagor and Co. (37 The Times L.R., 777; [1921] 3 K.B., 532) offers an illustration that the information supplied by the Foreign Office may not be conclusive, but may be information only for the purpose of the Court's deciding upon the materials supplied. But that case and Fenton Textile Association, Limited v. Krassin (38 The Times L.R., 259) show that the source of information resorted to by the Courts upon the question of diplomatic status was the Foreign Office.

The presentment of the attitude of the Foreign Office by the Attorney-General was treated as correct and authoritative by the Court of Appeal in The Gagara (35 The Times L.R., 259; [1919] P., 95), and in particular see the observation of Lord Justice Bankes at pages 103, 104 as to the effect of the deliberate statements of the Law Officers of the Crown, which if not accepted and acted upon, "there would be a divergence of action as between the Courts of this country and the statements that have been made by the Government of the country as to the attitude which this country was prepared to take."

The Attorney-General has stated that his intervention in the present case has been dictated in view of that very possibility and because the German Ambassador made communications to the Foreign Office on behalf of one of his staff, the defendant, who has been recognized as such by that department, and he has claimed their assistance.

The view of Lord Mansfield as to such an intervention has been expressed in Heathfield v. Chilton (supra, at p. 2017): "I find this is not an application by the Attorney-General by the direction and at the expense of the Crown. That indeed would have shown that the Crown thought this person entitled to the character of a public minister." If obiter, that dictum is entitled to respect and is in accord with the observations made in this Court quoted above. To act in accordance with such information thus conveyed is not a petitio principii, but to adopt the best evidence that can be adduced.

No doubt the Foreign Office and the Attorney-General undertake a serious responsibility in the adoption of this course. The Foreign Office will no doubt have considered that in so doing they might be depriving one of his Majesty's subjects of his ordinary right of suit against one whom he claims to be his debtor, and if the defendant is a debtor to the plaintiff the debt ought to be paid. But while representations might be made to the Foreign Office to withdraw their recognition from the defendant, or to represent to the German Ambassador that exception must be taken to one particular member remaining upon the staff, that does not alter the duty of the Court to act in accordance with the principle of the common law and of the statute of Anne, that so long as that recognition exists international comity requires that effect should be given to it. This is the answer to the argument of Mr. Giveen, that the Foreign Office, or the Attorney-General, may be acting upon insufficient or even incorrect appreciation of the true facts. They need not take action. They might reject the appeal of an ambassador and refuse to intervene. They might submit the facts and leave the Court to draw the inference in law. But if with the responsibility upon them they do intervene and communicate to the Court the status of the diplomat through the Attorney-General, that evidence is conclusive, and as Lord Sumner says: "Where such a statement is forthcoming no other evidence is admissible or needed."

For these reasons, in my judgment, the appeal ought to be allowed and the order of the Master restored, but as I have the misfortune to differ from my colleagues the order of the Court will be that directed by Lord Justice Scrutton.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This case in form is only an appeal from a discretionary decision under Order XXXVIII., Rule 1, that a gentleman who makes an affidavit in a pending proceeding shall be cross-examined on his affidavit. He appeals, alleging that such an order cannot be made against him, or at any rate that it ought not as a matter of discretion to be made.

Mr. Engelke's name appears in the Diplomatic List furnished by the English Foreign Office to sheriffs under the sixth section of the Act of Anne. It appears in June, 1921, as that of an assistant clerk, and so continues till 1924, when it appears as that of a consular secretary. At some time since the war all or part of the consular service of Germany has been put under the control of the German Ambassador for the country in which the consular service exists. It appears that the German Government contends that as to the consular service so transferred it has now acquired a diplomatic immunity which as consular service it did not before possess. This was the first contention put forward by counsel for Mr. Engelke before Mr. Justice Shearman; before us, another counsel appearing did not insist on this, though he said that the German Embassy attached great importance to the contention, but counsel argued that at any rate Mr. Engelke had diplomatic immunity. The Attorney-General informed us: "His Majesty's Government are not prepared to accept the view that merely because for convenience, or economy of administration, Germany has chosen to amalgamate those two departments, she is thereby entitled to claim immunity for persons who perform purely consular functions." Obviously, therefore, it is important that the exact facts as to Mr. Engelke's position should be ascertained to decide what his exact status is, and whether it confers diplomatic immunity.

Mr. Engelke appears to have rented a house in England. The landlord, Mr. Musmann, alleges that Mr. Engelke has not paid his rent and has broken the covenants of his lease. I understand Mr. Engelke to dispute these allegations, but to take the preliminary point that he is immune in England from any legal proceedings to ascertain whether he has broken his contract. He, however, offers, apparently seriously, that these questions as to whether an English contract as to a house in England made between persons in England, and depending on English law, shall be decided not by an English Court, knowing the English law, in the place where the witnesses are, but by a German Court which does not know English law except as a question of evidence, in a place where the witnesses are not resident. I appreciate that it is desirable that diplomatic immunity should be maintained, and that the remedy for avoiding legal obligations may be complaint direct or through the English Foreign Office to the Government or Ambassador of the person claiming diplomatic immunity, but it can hardly be desirable that foreign subjects resident in England shall make contracts and then break them without effective remedy.

To understand the question before us it is necessary to state exactly what proceedings have been taken. On July 28, 1926, Musmann issued a writ, alleging that under a lease from him to Engelke, dated August 18, 1924, of premises at Hampstead, rent due had not been paid, and sums were due for dilapidations, and damages for premature termination of the tenancy. On August 12, 1926, the defendant took out a summons to set aside the writ on the ground "that the defendant is a consular secretary on the staff of the German Embassy in London since the 25th November, 1920, and has been notified as such to the British Foreign Office, and that the defendant's name appears in the Diplomatic List issued by the British Foreign Office." It now appears that it was not the fact that he was consular secretary between 1920 and some date in 1923 or 1924. The summons was supported by an affidavit by the solicitor for Mr. Engelke, who is also solicitor to the German Embassy, deposing that he was informed by the Embassy and believed that Engelke had been consular secretary since 1920 and had been notified as such to the British Foreign Office, and that his name appeared in the Diplomatic List issued by the Foreign Office, and exhibiting a certificate from the German Chargé d'Affaires to that effect. As already stated, it now appears that both information and certificate were inaccurate, as Engelke was not consular secretary till some date in 1923 or 1924. On this summons and evidence Master Bonner on August 26, 1926, made the order asked for. An appeal was brought before Mr. Justice Talbot on October 18, 1926, who after being referred to a number of decided cases reversed the Master, but gave the defendant leave to appeal, and in the alternative leave to renew the application on further evidence. The leave to appeal was not used—I think wisely. I understand Mr. Justice Talbot to have decided on the earlier authorities that it is not enough to give immunity (1) that the ambassador claims it for a defendant, or (2) that the name of the defendant having been supplied by the ambassador is put by the Foreign Office on the list issued by the Foreign Office to sheriffs under the Act of Anne. I think the authorities referred to by Mr. Giveen support this view, and that to obtain immunity it must be proved that the actual position occupied by the defendant and the actual work done by him brings him within the class of servants or suite of the ambassador who are immune from legal proceedings, as distinguished from the consular staff, who are not. The description "assistant clerk" or "consular secretary" does not seem to elucidate the question. The correctness of Mr. Justice Talbot's decision is, however, not before us, as the defendant did not use the leave to appeal, but took out another summons on fresh evidence. This summons came before Master Moseley on December 9. Meanwhile Mr. Engelke had sworn an affidavit on November 3, repeating the inaccuracy about his being "consular secretary from 1920," and stating that he performed the duties which before the war were performed by the Consul-General, and other commercial matters, being answerable for his work to the German Ambassador, and that he also performed general duties, such as the coding and decoding of telegrams. Count Bernstorff also filed an affidavit. Thereupon the plaintiff gave notice on November 9 that he would apply for an order for cross-examination of Mr. Engelke and Count Bernstorff on their affidavits. The application was stated to be made under Order XXXVII., Rule 20, which was apparently a mistaken reference to Order XXXVIII., Rule 1. Count Bernstorff's affidavit was thereupon withdrawn. This application came before Master Moseley on December 9, when, we were informed, he took the view that without looking at the contents of the affidavits at all he would refuse to order cross-examination of the defendant. Against this refusal there was an appeal to Mr. Justice Horridge, who on December 20 remitted the matter to the Master to look at the affidavits and decide whether there should be cross-examination. When it went back the Master had before him the following material which had not been before Mr. Justice Talbot: (1) a certificate, dated December 3, from the British Foreign Office that Mr. Engelke's name as returned by the German Ambassador to the Foreign Office appeared in the Foreign Office List of 1921, 1922, and 1923 as assistant clerk to the German Ambassador, and in and since 1924 as consular secretary on the staff of the German Ambassador. It is not a certificate by the Foreign Office that Engelke does in fact hold such a position, or that such a position gives diplomatic immunity, even if such a statement is admissible. This had produced a second affidavit of Mr. Engelke: (1) correcting the mistakes in his previous affidavit and (2) setting out that the duties performed before the war by a Consul or Consul-General were now performed by the German Ambassador and his staff "in all cases where a German Ambassador is appointed," a statement the exact meaning of which is not very clear; that he is employed as a member of the staff of the commercial department of the Embassy and assists the Ambassador in his work in regard to all commercial matters. He does not repeat the statement about coding and decoding telegrams. There was also an affidavit by Mr. Musmann deposing that up to some time in 1926 the German Ambassador carried on work at Carlton House-terrace and that the consular work was carried on at 21A, Bedford-place, and that Mr. Engelke was employed at 21A, Bedford-place, and suggesting that if the defendant is now at Carlton House-terrace it is because his consular work has been transferred from Bedford-place. On these materials Master Moseley refused, on February 15, to allow cross-examination, and appeal was made to Mr. Justice Shearman. Mr. Stuart Bevan for Mr. Engelke argued as his first proposition that now that consular duties were performed by the Ambassador all members of the consular staff had ambassadorial privileges. The learned Judge allowed the appeal and ordered the defendant to appear for cross-examination, taking the view, as I understand, that the claim of privilege was so important that the exact facts as to the work done should be established, and that this could best be achieved by cross-examination of the witness on the affidavit which he proposed to use. From this order an appeal was made to this Court, which is the matter for decision.

The position before this Court is different in two respects. First, Mr. Pritt, now appearing for Mr. Engelke, did not take up the broad position that all consular servants, when transferred to the control of the ambassador, had diplomatic immunity, though they were not immune before the transfer. Though, he said, the German Embassy attached great importance to this position, he as counsel took the responsibility of basing his arguments on the facts relating to this particular case. Those facts, of course, were what cross-examination was intended to ascertain. But, secondly, something happened of much more importance as a general question. The Attorney-General appeared and made a statement to the Court. It is not a case where, as in the case of questions as to an "independent sovereign," the Court had asked for information from the best source of information and treated it as conclusive. In this case the German Ambassador approached the Foreign Office, which thereupon instructed the Attorney-General to attend and give the Court information which appears on page 26 of the Notes. The President of the Court thereupon asked the Attorney-General whether he himself was satisfied as to the information which he had given. He answered that he derived his information from the appropriate department for giving him information and he adopted it as Attorney-General. It appears on page 29 that the information was to the effect that, while the Foreign Office did not accept the position that all consular servants if under the control of the ambassador had diplomatic immunity, the Foreign Office had investigated the line between consular service and ambassadorial service and were satisfied that Engelke did some service on the "right side of the line." The Attorney-General agreed that the fact that the defendant was on the Diplomatic List was not conclusive.

I am not at all satisfied that this procedure was admissible, still less that it is conclusive. In certain matters, notably the status of sovereigns, or of ambassadors, their representatives, the Courts are accustomed to seek information from the Secretaries of State as representing the King and to accept a definite answer as conclusive. I refer to the recent judgments of the House of Lords in Duff Development Company v. Government of Kelantan (40 The Times L.R., 566 ; [1924] A.C., 797). There was a difference of opinion between Lord Finlay and Lord Sumner as to whether the same principle applied to the boundaries of foreign States, and I respectfully refer to the very instructive remarks of Lord Sumner on the subject. But I am not disposed to enlarge the cases coming within this rule of practice. The Crown and Government know whom they have recognized as independent Sovereigns, though the actual facts in the Kelantan case (supra) do not strengthen one's belief in the efficacy of the Courts' procedure in eliciting the real position. They know whom they have received or ceased to receive as an ambassador (In re Suarez, 34 The Times L.R., 127 ; [1918] 1 Ch., 176). But the Foreign Office appear to have no knowledge of the internal arrangements of an embassy, as for instance whether a particular person is a chorister or a cook, or what exact work he does, except such as they derive from statements by the ambassador or his representatives. To say that a British subject, suing on a British contract, is to be deprived of his right to enforce his contract in a British Court because a department of the Government holding an inquiry not on oath, at which the plaintiff is not represented, has arrived at a conclusion that the defendant has immunity from process, and, without being asked by the Court for information, instructs the Attorney-General to inform the Court of the conclusion at which the department has arrived, without the plaintiff's having an opportunity of questioning the decision or ascertaining the facts for himself, in my opinion is a most unsatisfactory position and not warranted by any authority. It appears to be admitted that a mere claim by an ambassador that a particular person is privileged, even if the name of that person is put on the Diplomatic List, is not conclusive. There are embassies and embassies ; a statement by Embassy A may have different weight from one by Embassy B ; the Courts must decide each case on the evidence, and obviously cannot say : "We will accept all statements by all accredited representatives of States as conclusive." If very recent events did not show the impossibility of that position, a reference to the odd claims made unsuccessfully in old cases by various minor embassies and their staffs will prove it. I am quite unable to accept the Attorney-General's statement of the result of the Foreign Office investigation as binding and conclusive on this Court. To do so would be to substitute a department of the Government for the Courts in a class of case where such substitution has never hitherto been recognized. I do not find any case where the Court has asked the Foreign Office for information as to the position of the servant of an embassy, or where the Attorney-General has attended to give the Court such information, and I am not disposed to make a precedent.

What, then, is the position ? The consular service has never hitherto been granted the immunity which applies to the diplomatic service. I am not inclined at present to accept the position that the transfer of control to the Ambassador confers that immunity on the officials transferred. I quite realize that a transferred official may have sufficient diplomatic work given him to confer on him diplomatic immunity. I am inclined to think that colourable or slight transfer would not be sufficient if his principal work is consular. I do not think that it is desirable to extend the class of persons in a country who can disregard the laws without legal consequences. But I should wish to decide any question of the position of a former consular official with full knowledge of the relevant facts. It appears to me that cross-examination on general statements is one of the best means of getting at the exact truth. I see no danger that the Court will allow cross-examination that will drag out diplomatic secrets, and I regard as fantastical the suggestion that Mr. Engelke could be compelled to disclose the contents of any particular cipher telegram which he alleges that he sent.

The case strikes me in this way : Mr. Engelke occupies a position the exact effect of which depends on the facts of his service. To give him immunity it is necessary accurately to ascertain those facts. He files two affidavits containing general statements, one of them containing a substantial and careless inaccuracy. It appears to me to be most desirable to test the generality of his statements by the cross-examination to which any person who makes an affidavit is liable. If once you accept that a mere claim by him or his Ambassador is insufficient, it follows that the accurate facts must be ascertained.

I am not deciding that Mr. Engelke is not entitled to immunity : it is very possible that when the facts are ascertained by regular methods he will be held immune. In that case it is to be hoped that the Ambassador will satisfy himself that one of his staff has not inflicted a legal wrong on a citizen of the country to which he is accredited, for which wrong there is no legal redress in that country. What I am deciding is that the question of immunity shall be decided only when the relevant facts have been ascertained in the usual way, and that cross-examination of a person who makes an affidavit is in this case necessary for that end. It might be enough to say that Mr. Justice Shearman used his discretion, and there being no relevant change of facts I cannot interfere with it, but as I have come to the same conclusion as Mr. Justice Shearman, I think it my duty to express it. The appeal, in my opinion, should be dismissed with costs in any event.

Lord Justice Sargant.—I have had an opportunity of considering the judgment that has just been read by Lord Justice Scrutton, and I agree with it.

LOOKER AND ANOTHER v. LAW UNION AND ROCK INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Life)—Proposal—Statement of good health — Acceptance subject to payment of first premium and to health remaining unaffected—Illness of assured—Cheque sent for premium—Acceptance by insurance company —Death of assured—Action on policy.

On July 10, 1926, one L. sent to the defendant insurance company a proposal for an insurance on his life, stating on the form that he was free from disease or ailment. On July 15 the defendants sent him the following acceptance :—"I beg to inform you that the proposal made by you to this company to effect an assurance on the life of yourself (whole world) for the sum of £5,000, with profits, has this day been accepted, and if the health of the life proposed remains meanwhile unaffected, the policy will be issued on payment of the first premium as under, subject to satisfactory evidence of age being furnished. . . . The risk of the company will not commence until receipt of the first premium; and the directors meanwhile reserve the power to alter or withdraw this acceptance." On July 20 L. became ill and on July 22 he signed a cheque for the first premium, but the cheque was not sent that day. On July 23 pneumonia was definitely diagnosed. On July 24 the cheque was sent. On July 26 the defendants received the cheque and sent the following certificate :—"I certify that the proposal made by Dr. W. Looker to effect an insurance on the life of himself for the term of whole life has been accepted by this company for £5,000, and the first quarterly premium having been paid a policy will be delivered in due course." On July 27 L. died of pneumonia, and the bank did not pay the cheque. In an action by L.'s executors on the policy,

Held, that as there had been, between the proposal and the acceptance of the premium, a change in the risk, and as the acceptance was on the faith of the continued truth of the statements in the proposal, the action failed.

This was an action in which Mrs. Rosanna Looker, of 54, Elm Park-gardens, S.W., and Mr. Henry Watkins, of 41, Colehill-lane, Fulham, S.W., administrators with the will annexed of the late Dr. William Looker, an osteopathic surgeon, claimed from the Law Union and Rock Insurance Company, Limited, £5,000 on a policy of assurance on the life of Dr. William Looker.

It was alleged that on or about July 10, 1926, Dr. Looker made a proposal for a policy of life assurance with the defendant company for £5,000 with profits. On July 15 the defendants accepted that proposal at a yearly premium; on July 20, by letter to Dr. Looker's agent, they agreed to accept quarterly payments of £47 18s. 4d. in lieu of annual premiums, the risk to attach from receipt of the first premium. On July 24 a cheque dated July 22 and signed by Dr. Looker was posted (as appeared from the postmark) before 7.30 p.m. It was received by the defendants on Monday, July 26, and on that date they sent a certificate of acceptance of the proposal with a promise to send the policy in due course.

On July 27, before the cheque was cleared, Dr. Looker died, and owing to his death the bank did not pay the cheque. A tender of the premium in cash on August 11 was refused.

In these circumstances the defendants refused payment. They denied the agreement to accept the proposal; they admitted that the cheque was sent, but denied that they accepted it as payment of the premium. They said that if the certificate sent on July 26 was a receipt for the premium it was conditional on the cheque being honoured. They had never, in fact, received the premium.

They further alleged that if they accepted the proposal the acceptance was subject to the express conditions (a) that the risk was not to commence till the premium was paid; (b) that the health of the assured should remain unaffected between the proposal and the payment of the first premium; and (c) that satisfactory evidence of Dr. Looker's age should be furnished. They said, as to (a), that the premium was never received because the cheque was returned; as to (b), that on or about July 20 Dr. Looker had a severe attack of pneumonia and remained in a precarious condition till his death, and no information was given to the defendants; and as to (c), that no evidence of age was given to the defendants. They also alleged that there was concealment of a material fact in the non-disclosure of Dr. Looker's illness.

Mr. Hawke, K.C., and Mr. H. H. Hanworth appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Birkett, K.C., and Mr. Harold Murphy for the defendants.

Mrs. Looker, giving evidence, described the progress of her husband's last illness. He went to lie down about 2.30 p.m. on July 20, and about 7.30 said that he did not feel inclined to get up. Dr. Shah was sent for next day, and said that her husband would be all right. He was not told at any time that he had pneumonia, and she did not think pneumonia was mentioned till Sir Bruce Bruce-Porter was called in on July 24.

In cross-examination the witness said that her husband's estate was valued for probate at £873. He left legacies of £250 to a Miss Edith Alice Moore, his secretary, and of £1,000 to her sister, Miss Dora Moore, his bookkeeper. Miss Annie Moore, a third sister, was a witness, with Dr. Shah, to the will dated July 17, 1926. Miss Annie Moore, said the witness, was a trained nurse and osteopath, and came on July 23 to help to nurse her husband. She did not remember Miss Annie Moore coming on July 17.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Colonel Lyon, a pupil-assistant to Dr. Looker, gave evidence that he looked after Dr. Looker's patients during his illness. He did not become anxious till July 24; on Sunday, the 25th, Dr. Looker was much worse. He (the witness) thought that pneumonia set in on the Saturday evening about 8.30. He was present at the interview between Dr. Looker and Commander Verner, the defendants' agent, at which the insurance proposal was discussed.

On July 22 he asked Dr. Looker if he had sent the premium. Finding that he had not, he got Dr. Looker to sign a cheque, which the witness filled in, and asked Miss Edith Alice Moore to forward it with a covering letter to the defendants. On Saturday, July 24, the witness asked her if the cheque had gone, and she said that she was sorry that she had forgotten it. She then put the cheque with the covering letter into an envelope and the witness posted it.

In cross-examination the witness said that he posted the cheque before he thought pneumonia had set in. He was under the impression that Dr. Looker was already assured from the acceptance of his proposal. Had he known that Dr. Looker was not assured he would not have dreamt of asking him to sign a cheque in bed for the premium. He would have regarded it as tricking the insurance company.

Re-examined, the witness said that he did not have any fear for Dr. Looker's life till the Sunday night or Monday morning.

Miss Annie Moore gave evidence that she called at 54, Elm Park-gardens on Friday, July 23, and was told that Dr. Looker was not well, as he had a cold. She saw him and thought that he was not looking his usual self. He asked her to stay and look after him. She did so, and he seemed to get a little worse on the Saturday afternoon.

Cross-examined, she said that the will was signed in the bed room on July 24 about 2 p.m. Dr. Looker held the pen without assistance. He became delirious late the same evening.

His Lordship.—I want to know who wrote the date "July 17" when the will was in fact made on July 24.

Counsel said that they would take the necessary steps to secure the production of the original will from Somerset House.

The witness said that Dr. Looker asked her if she would mind witnessing the will, and she thought that it was brought up by her sister, the secretary. She did not know why it was dated July 17. Nor did she know that her sisters were to receive legacies, or that, apart from the insurance money, there was not enough to pay them.

When Nurse Morriss came on the Saturday evening the witness said to her that pneumonia was suspected. She said that Dr. Looker was very ill, but did not remember saying that she thought he would never recover. The doctor ordered cupping on the Saturday. She thought that Dr. Looker was suffering from influenza, not pneumonia.

Dr. Abdul Majid Shah said that he knew Dr. Looker as a friend, and was called in professionally on July 21. Dr. Looker was not suffering from pneumonia on that day, nor on Thursday, July 22. The witness thought that it was influenza. He began to suspect pneumonia on Friday, July 23. During the course of that morning he was certain.

Cross-examined by Mr. Birkett, Dr. Shah said that the will was signed in his presence in Dr. Looker's bed room on Saturday, July 24, 1926. Dr. Looker simply asked him to sign, and he signed. Dr. Looker signed quite easily, though he was lying down. He was not propped up for the purpose. Dr. Looker read the will through, and appeared to alter it here and there, and then signed it. The witness was unable to remember whether Miss Annie Moore was present. She did not sign at the same time as the witness. "Dr. Looker signed it, then I signed it, and no one else signed it at that particular moment. Nurse Moore may have signed possibly three or four hours later."

He did not speak to Dr. Looker about the gravity of his illness or of putting his affairs in order. He just told Mrs. Looker that his condition was very serious. When Nurse Moore came on the Friday, he told her that it was a case of pneumonia, but might not have told her that it was serious at that time. Delirium did not set in till the Saturday night.

Mrs. Looker, recalled, said that the first time that she was told that her husband's condition was serious was on the Sunday, after Sir Bruce Bruce-Porter had seen him. Dr. Shah did not tell her on the Saturday.

Mr. Hawke said that he must withdraw the statement that there were sufficient assets at the bank to meet the cheque. Dr. Looker's passbook, which he now had before him, showed a balance of £43 against the cheque for £47 18s. 4d.

Mr. Birkett said that the defendants would call no evidence. He submitted that the material date was July 26, 1926. Down to that date the company could refuse to go on with the matter. Till then the representations must be treated as continuing, and if Dr. Looker was not in fact in good health it was immaterial that he did not know it. Secondly, there was a duty to inform the defendants of any change in Dr. Looker's health. Thirdly, it was a condition of acceptance that between July 15 and July 26 the health of Dr. Looker should remain unaffected. Fourthly, it was an express condition that the risk should not attach till the first premium was received, and it never was received.

Mr. Justice Acton.—I am troubled by the question whether Dr. Looker, who intended to send a cheque on July 22, authorized the sending of it on July 24. If by that time he realized his condition he would presumably have acted as an honourable man, just as Colonel Lyon had said that he would not have posted the cheque had he known that Dr. Looker had pneumonia.

Mr. Birkett.—If he knew of his condition, it was fraud; if he did not know, the cheque was sent without authority. If necessary, he would ask leave to amend the pleadings to cover that issue.

Continuing his submission, Mr. Birkett referred to Canning v. Farquhar (2 The Times L.R., 386; 16 Q.B.D., 727), and Harrington v. Pearl Life Assurance Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 613). On July 26 the real question for the insurance company was, "Shall we enter into this contract, or not?" Manifestly, if they had known the facts, they would not. That they completed the contract showed that they were relying on the truth of the representations made in the proposal accepted on July 15.

Mr. Hawke opposed any amendment. The authority given by Dr. Looker, who signed the cheque, had not been withdrawn, and his agent was entitled to act on it. As to non-disclosure, Dr. Looker did not know of the fact which was alleged to be material: if he did, admittedly it did not matter whether he knew it to be material. If Dr. Looker had continued in good health and on the morning of July 27 had been run over by an omnibus and killed, would the company have been able to say that there was no contract? The representation as to health in the proposal form could only relate to the date at which it was made—i.e., July 10. As Lord Esher said in Canning v. Farquhar (supra), no one could make representations as to his health a month hence.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—Lord Esher is saying that the representation is a continuing representation up to the time when the contract is made.

MR. HAWKE.—Down to the acceptance of the premium the defendants were entitled to decline to go on because there was no contract. But by acceptance of the premium they waived the condition as to the continuing state of health. Canning v. Farquhar (supra) had nothing to do with a case where the contract was completed. The sole decision in that case was that there was no contract. He asked that there should be judgment for the plaintiffs.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON, in his considered judgment, said that Dr. Looker, a man about 44 years of age, and of exceptionally strong physique, had American degrees in osteopathy and medicine, and practised as an osteopathic surgeon. On July 10, 1926, he sent a proposal for life assurance to the defendants. One of the questions on the proposal form was: "Are you now free from disease or ailment?" and this was answered, "Yes." It also contained the usual declaration as to the truth of the answers, which were to be the basis of the contract. On July 15 the company sent Dr. Looker a conditional acceptance in the following form:—

"Sir,—I beg to inform you that the proposal made by you to this company to effect an assurance on the life of yourself (whole world) for the sum of £5,000, with profits, has this day been accepted, and if the health of the life proposed remains meanwhile unaffected, the policy will be issued on payment of the first premium as under, subject to satisfactory evidence of age being furnished. . . . The risk of the company will not commence until receipt of the first premium; and the directors meanwhile reserve the power to alter or withdraw this acceptance."

On Wednesday, July 21, Dr. Looker began to feel indisposed. He worked in the morning as usual. It was not his practice to work on Wednesday afternoon, but on this occasion he lay down because he felt ill. About 4 p.m. a friend and pupil, Colonel Lyon, called, and spoke about the payment of the premium of assurance, in which he had a financial interest. He thought, as he said, that the assurance was already effected. About 8 p.m. a doctor was sent for.

On July 22 Colonel Lyon, who saw Dr. Looker in bed and again spoke about the premium, filled in a cheque, which Dr. Looker signed in bed, and gave it to the secretary to be sent. For some reason it was not sent till July 24. On Friday, July 23, Dr. Shah came with Dr. Barber. Pneumonia was then quite definitely diagnosed, and it grew steadily worse till it terminated in the death of the patient. From July 23, then, he was suffering from pneumonia. On that afternoon Miss Annie Moore, a sister of the secretary, and a trained nurse, called, and Dr. Looker asked her to stay and nurse him. Dr. Shah took a grave view of the case on July 23 and 24.

On the afternoon of July 24 Dr. Looker, who was then in such a state of health that he could not be propped up, had a will brought to him and signed it lying down. It was witnessed by Dr. Shah and Nurse Moore. Dr. Looker's signature was very shaky—a strong contrast to the signature on the cheque. The date inserted in the will was erroneous—July 17 instead of July 24. He (his Lordship) regarded that incident as significant from every point of view. About 6.30 p.m. on the same day Dr. Taylor, another friend, called and suggested a second opinion, and mentioned Sir Bruce Bruce-Porter.

About 6 p.m. Colonel Lyon asked the secretary if she had sent the cheque, and, finding that she had not, he posted it himself. Colonel Lyon, who gave his evidence with great candour, said that he would certainly not have done so had he realized that the assurance was not already effective. Dr. Looker had given no authority to anyone to send the cheque on July 24. On that evening he became delirious, and Nurse Morriss was sent for.

On Sunday, July 25, Sir Bruce Bruce-Porter saw the patient and told Mrs. Looker that he was suffering from pneumonia and ordered oxygen. Early on Monday morning there was a very severe crisis which was almost fatal, but the patient pulled through it. On that same morning, July 26, the cheque was received by the defendants in the ordinary course of post, and they sent the following certificate:—

"I certify that the proposal made by Dr. W. Looker to effect an insurance on the life of himself for the term of whole life has been accepted by this company for £5,000, and the first quarterly premium having been paid a policy will be delivered in due course."

On the following morning Dr. Looker died of pneumonia, from which he had quite definitely been suffering since Friday, July 23. He (his Lordship) had no doubt that from that time Dr. Looker himself and those with him knew that he was seriously, but not necessarily that he was dangerously, ill.

This was one of those cases in which, between the proposal and the acceptance of the premium, there was a change in the risk, in that at the date of the proposal Dr. Looker was, as he truly stated, in good health, while at the date of the acceptance of the premium he was in a critical state.

Mr. Birkett said that the acceptance was made on the faith of the continued truth of the statements in the proposal. The authority for that was to be found in Canning v. Farquhar (2 The Times L.R., 386; 16 Q.B.D., 727), and in Harrington v. Pearl Life Assurance Company, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 613). It was also said that the position of the defendants was strengthened by the terms of their acceptance of July 15 and by the fact that on July 26, when they accepted the risk, the assured was dying and they would not have dreamed of accepting the risk had they known. Mr. Birkett also claimed that there was non-disclosure by Dr. Looker. Reference might usefully be made to the judgment of Mr. Justice Channell in Yager v. Guardian Assurance Company, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 53; 108 L.T., 38), where he said:—

"I think it is clearly settled that the law as to fire insurance and life insurance is the same as it is in reference to marine insurance, and that is that a policy is not binding if any material fact is not disclosed, and that that is so whether or not the person who does not disclose it knows that it is material. . . . The question depends upon whether the fact is material or not, and not upon whether the person supposed it to be material. Then the time up to which it must be disclosed is the time when the contract is concluded. Any material fact that comes to his knowledge before the contract he must disclose."

In his opinion, Mr. Birkett's contention on that point also was sound, but in this case the insurance company had protected themselves by express terms, which rendered it unnecessary to consider whether, if these terms had been absent, the principle laid down by Mr. Justice Channell would have applied.

Other points which had been taken, and which he would only mention and leave them to be dealt with elsewhere if necessary, were :—(1) That the first premium was never in fact received by the defendants; (2) that Dr. Looker's bank balance was not in fact sufficient to meet the cheque ; (3)—a point which was taken by his Lordship himself—that there was no authority from Dr. Looker for the sending of the cheque on July 24.

In these circumstances there must be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.. (Viscount Haldane, Viscount Sumner, Lord Shaw of Dunfermline, Lord Darling, and Lord Warrington of Clyffe.) 1927. July 4.

LAFFER v. GILLEN.*

Australia—Crown lands for discharged soldiers—Conditions and forfeitures—Ejectment for arrears.

If a person holding Crown land in South Australia under the Australian Discharged Soldiers' Settlement Act, 1917, and amending Acts fail to carry out the conditions laid down in his agreement with the Government, he can be ejected without a judicial or quasi-judicial inquiry.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Australia of December 17, 1925, reversing a decree of the Full Court of South Australia and restoring the judgment of Mr. Justice Poole, the Trial Judge.

Mr. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. F. Villeneuve Smith, K.C. (of the Australian Bar), appeared for the appellant ; Sir Herbert Cunliffe, K.C., and Mr. A. Andrewes-Uthwatt for the respondent.

Lord Warrington of Clyffe, delivering their Lordships' judgment, said :—

By the Crown Lands Act, 1915, of South Australia it was provided (section 9, xiii.) that the Commissioner of Crown Lands might authorize any person to take possession of lands, messuages, or tenements belonging to the Crown whereon any person is in unauthorized possession or occupation and forcibly eject every person therefrom.

Early in May, 1923, the appellant, as Commissioner, purporting to act under the aforesaid statutory power, authorized certain constables to take possession of the lands now in question and forcibly eject the respondent therefrom ; they took possession of such lands accordingly, and ejected the respondent therefrom.

Shortly afterwards the respondent, as plaintiff, instituted the present action against the appellant, as defendant, claiming damages for the entry and ejectment, alleging that it was wrongful.

The appellant pleaded the above-mentioned statute, alleging that the respondent was in unlawful possession or occupation of the lands in question.

The question, then, is whether the respondent at the time of his ejectment therefrom was in lawful possession or occupation of the lands.

The action was tried, on the question of liability only, by Mr. Justice Poole, who by his judgment dated April 17, 1924, decided in favour of the respondent.

On appeal to the Full Court this judgment was reversed by Chief Justice Murray and Justices Angus Parsons and Napier, who by their judgment dated August 12, 1924, allowed the appellant's appeal and ordered the respondent to pay the costs of the action.

The respondent appealed to the High Court of Australia, who, on December 17, 1925, by a majority (Mr. Justice Higgins dissenting), allowed the appeal with costs and restored the judgment of Mr. Justice Poole.

The present appeal is brought by special leave of his Majesty in Council, the appellant undertaking to pay the respondent's costs of the appeal as between solicitor and client in any event.

There has thus been a very considerable difference of opinion in the Courts of the State and Commonwealth, and even those Judges who came to a conclusion favourable to one side or the other were by no means unanimous in their reasons for their decisions.

At the conclusion of the war the Government of South Australia was faced with the problem of dealing with numbers of discharged soldiers, and determined, amongst other things, to make provision for the settlement of such men on unoccupied Crown lands and for advances out of public funds to men so settled, and for this purpose obtained the passing of the Discharged Soldiers' Settlement Act, 1917, and subsequent amending Acts. The administration of these Acts was entrusted to the Minister of Repatriation, a corporation sole created by the Act of 1917.

The appellant at all material times held the two offices of Commissioner of Crown Lands and Minister of Repatriation.

It is obvious that for the success of such a scheme two main objects were in view—the proper cultivation and development of the land and the advantage of the men settled thereon. Superintendents and inspectors were appointed whose duty it was to inform themselves of the conduct and prospects of the settlers and to report thereon to the Minister.

The respondent, a discharged soldier, who had had some training on a Government training farm, by a letter dated February 9, 1918, applied for a grant of the lands in question, and on February 25, 1918, he was informed by letter of the Minister that his application was granted and of the conditions on which the land would be held. Except that the letter stated that for the first 12 months his occupancy of the land would be strictly probationary, it is unnecessary to set out its terms, inasmuch as they were embodied in the formal agreement to be presently mentioned.

The respondent appears to have been let into possession of the lands on March 1, 1918. On April 25, 1920, he made a formal application for the grant to him of an agreement over the land.

The agreement is dated March 1, 1919, the day on which the probationary period expired, but it was not actually sealed by the Minister or signed by the respondent until February 26, 1921. It was treated before this Board as common ground that for purposes of construction and effect the date of the agreement is March 1, 1919.

The agreement purports to be made between the Minister of Repatriation of and for the State of South Australia contracting for and on behalf of his Majesty the King (thereinafter called the vendor) of the one part and the respondent (thereinafter with his executors, administrators and assigns called the purchaser) of the other part. It may be observed in passing that it is clear from the contract that in every passage material to the case "the vendor" means the Minister and not his Majesty himself.

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

The agreement was to be for a term of 65 years, and thereby the vendor agreed to sell and the purchaser to purchase the land as therein described for £2,106, subject to a reservation of minerals.

It is desirable to set out the provisions for payment of purchase money and interest. They are as follows :—

"3. The purchaser shall pay the said purchase money and interest thereon by instalments as follows :—

"(i.) No instalments shall be payable for the first year of the term of this agreement.

"(ii.) During the succeeding four years of the term of this agreement the purchaser shall pay interest on the said purchase money at the following rates :

"For the second year at the rate of £2 10s. per cent., for the third year at the rate of £3 10s. per cent., for the fourth and fifth years at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum.

"Such interest shall be payable by equal half-yearly instalments of £26 6s. 6d. during the second year, of £36 17s. 1d. during the third year, and of £52 13s. during the fourth and fifth years of the said term, such instalments to be paid on the 31st and 28th days of the months of August and February respectively in each year.

"(iii.) During the remainder of the term of this agreement the purchaser shall pay the said purchase money and interest on the balance thereof for the time being unpaid at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum by half-yearly instalments of £55 10s. 11d., such instalments to be paid on the days of the months lastly hereinbefore mentioned in each and every year until the whole of the said purchase money and interest shall have been paid."

Then follow certain conditions as to residence, the proper cultivation and improvement of the land, and other matters not material to be set forth in detail.

Clause 22 is as follows :—

"If at any time within the period of ten years from the date of this agreement the vendor is satisfied on such evidence as he deems sufficient that by reason of incompetency or personal disability the purchaser is incapable of managing the said land with advantage to himself, or that the purchaser has neglected to work the land satisfactorily or has been guilty of serious misconduct during his occupation thereof, the vendor by notice in writing given to the purchaser may determine this agreement upon and subject to such terms and conditions as the vendor thinks fit [and] upon the expiration of three months from the giving of such notice, this agreement and the right of the purchaser to complete the purchase and to possession of the said land shall cease and determine and be void, anything in this agreement to the contrary notwithstanding."

After a provision in clause 23 for return in the event of surrender or forfeiture of instalments of purchase money already paid and for certain allowances for improvements, clause 24, so far as it is material, is as follows :—

"And it is hereby declared that if any of the instalments hereby reserved shall be unpaid and in arrear for more than six months after the day whereon the same is hereby made payable the purchaser having had at least three months' previous notice in writing demanding its payment this agreement may be cancelled by the vendor . . . and the vendor may thereupon insert a notice in the Government Gazette declaring this agreement to be forfeited and such notice appearing in the Government Gazette shall in all Courts and elsewhere and under all circumstances be taken to be conclusive evidence that this agreement has been legally cancelled and forfeited."

The respondent never paid any of the instalments of interest payable under clause 3 (ii.) of the agreement, and on December 21, 1921, there remained due the following, viz :—

The payment due on August 31, 1920, £26 6s. 6d. ; that due on February 28, 1921, £26 6s. 6d., and that due on August 31, 1921, £36 17s. 1d. It will be observed that of these payments the first two only were then six months in arrear.

On December 21, 1921, the Assistant Secretary for Lands wrote and sent to the respondent the following letter :—

"I am directed by the Hon. Commissioner for Crown Lands to advise you that it is intended to cancel Soldiers' Acquired Agreement No. 30 and to re-offer the land unless all arrears are paid within two months from this date.

"In the event of forfeiture taking place as indicated, you will be liable for payment of amounts due up to the date of actual cancellation."

Payment due 31/8/20 .. £26 6s. 6d. }
„ 28/2/21 .. £26 6s. 6d. } and interest thereon.
„ 31/8/21 .. £36 17s. 1d. }

Agreement No. 30 is the agreement in question.

After some correspondence the Secretary for Lands on November 15, 1922, wrote to the respondent a letter in which he informed him that the agreement had been cancelled and the land was then Crown land and would be dealt with at an early date.

In the Government Gazette of December 7, 1922, there was published the following notice dated December 6, 1922 :—

"Notice is hereby given that the lease and agreements mentioned and described at the foot hereof have been cancelled by the Commissioner of Crown Lands in terms of section 63 of the Crown Lands Act of 1915 and are hereby declared forfeited."

"(Signed) GEO. R. LAFFER.

"Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration."

There then follows a reference to the agreement in question and the words "non-payment of arrears."

Finally, to complete this part of the story, on December 22, 1922, the appellant, as Commissioner of Crown Lands, signed a notice addressed to the Registrar-General and expressed to be given in pursuance of section 94 of the Real Property Act, 1886, that the Crown lease therein mentioned, being the agreement in question, had been lawfully and wholly determined.

This notice was sent to the Registrar-General on January 9, 1923, and on January 17, 1923, a memorial thereof, as provided by section 94 above mentioned, was duly entered in the Register of Crown Leases as provided by section 94 above mentioned, by being endorsed on the copy of the agreement filed in such Register as provided by section 93 of the same statute. Section 94 is in the following terms :—

"The Registrar-General on receipt of notice from the Commissioner of Crown Lands that any Crown lease has been lawfully forfeited or determined in whole or in part, shall make an entry to that effect in the Register of Crown Leases, and such forfeiture or determination shall thereupon have effect."

On January 11, 1923, the appellant, having been informed by the respondent's solicitors that in their opinion the notice of cancellation was not in order, consulted the Attorney-General, and was advised that it would be unsafe to rely on the document of December 21, 1921, either as a notice in writing demanding payment within clause 24 of the agreement or as a notice in writing within the meaning of clause 22. He thereupon sent the respondent the following notice :—

"The Minister of Repatriation of and for the State of South Australia for and on behalf of H.M. King George the Vth, hereby gives you notice that he is satisfied upon evidence which he deems sufficient that you have neglected to work satisfactorily the land which by agreement for sale and purchase, No. 30, Register Book, vol. 645, fo. 10, you have agreed to purchase, namely, block 372 in the Hundred of Wongyarra, and block 340 in the Hundred of Gregory, and the said Minister accordingly hereby determines the said agreement, and gives you notice that upon the expiration of three months from the giving of this notice the said agreement and your right to complete the purchase and to possession of the said land will cease and determine and be void.

"Dated the 24th day of January, 1923.

"(Signed) GEO. R. LAFFER,

"Minister of Repatriation.

"To Francis Arnold Gillen."

This notice was duly posted, addressed in accordance with the provisions in that behalf of the agreement, and was registered at the Post Office. The respondent refused to take it in, and it was ultimately returned through the Dead Letter Office.

After the three months had expired the appellant, as already mentioned, caused possession to be taken of the land, and ejected the respondent therefrom.

On these facts the appellant makes the following submissions :—

1. That the letter of December 21, 1921, was a sufficient three months' previous notice in writing demanding payment of the arrears, and that as default was made in such payment he was, as vendor, justified in cancelling the agreement, which was accordingly lawfully forfeited or determined.

2. That whether it was so or not such forfeiture or determination had effect under section 94 of the Act of 1886 upon the entry above mentioned being made in the Register of Crown Leases pursuant to the notice of December 22, 1922.

3. That whether the agreement had already determined or not it was so determined at the expiration of three months from the date of the notice of January 24, 1923.

4. That if he establishes any one of these submissions the respondent was on May 1, 1923, in unauthorized possession of the land in question and his ejectment therefrom was justified by section 9 (xiii.) of the Crown Lands Act, 1915.

As the appellant's final proceedings were based upon the provisions of clause 22 of the agreement and the notice of January 24, 1923, their Lordships propose to deal with this point first.

The contention of the respondent on this point is that before deciding to terminate the agreement it was incumbent upon the appellant to institute some judicial or quasi-judicial inquiry, or at the least to communicate to the respondent the information he had received and his intention to act thereon and give him an opportunity of stating his case in answer thereto.

The question is entirely one of construction, and in common with all such questions can only be properly answered after a consideration of all the surrounding circumstances, the position of the parties to the agreement, its subject-matter, and the apparent purpose and object thereof, and in particular of the provisions to be construed.

In the present case the transaction to which the agreement related was effected under the provisions of Acts of Parliament specially passed for the purpose of providing for discharged soldiers, and in particular by settling them on unoccupied lands for the twofold purpose of developing such lands and at the same time affording to the soldier settlers the opportunity of making good in life.

The administration of the Acts was entrusted to a special Minister called the Minister of Repatriation, who was, of course, responsible to Parliament for his conduct in the matter.

The clause in question was inserted in the agreement in pursuance of an imperative regulation made under the Acts in question and having the force of an Act of Parliament (see Record, p. 169, Regulation 13 (h)).

It is obvious that the authorities contemplated that amongst the more or less experimental cases there would be a certain number of failures, and it seems not unreasonable to conclude that they intended to put into the hands of the responsible Minister means whereby such cases might be readily dealt with, and, if necessary, a fresh start made.

Turning to the words of the clause, it is provided that the power in question may be exercised by the vendor, viz., the Minister acting on behalf of his Majesty the King. The only conditions are that it must be exercised within the first ten years, and that the vendor is satisfied on such evidence as he deems sufficient that one or the other of the specified grounds exists. There is nothing in the words used to suggest as essential to the satisfaction of the vendor any particular form of inquiry, judicial or other. It may fairly be assumed that those who required the clause to be inserted in every agreement of the kind were well aware that the vendor would be assisted by officers whose duty it would be to ascertain and report to him the conduct and prospects of the soldier settler, and that he would thereby be furnished with evidence which he might well deem sufficient to enable him to form a judgment. Merely to inform the person affected of what was in contemplation would be useless unless he was also given some particulars of the information on which the vendor proposed to act and to give such information, if it consisted, as it probably would, of reports from the Minister's officers, would render their position impossible, and the knowledge that such might be the result would tend to defeat the object with which they were appointed, viz., the obtaining of honest and true reports. Their Lordships agree with Mr. Justice Higgins in thinking "that nothing is further from the intendment of this clause than a judicial or quasi-judicial inquiry." They also agree with the following passage in his judgment :—

"The power is confined to the first ten years, as years of probation ; the contract is one in which the chief object of the vendor is to benefit the purchaser because the purchaser is a man who has served the country in the Great War ; the facts of which the Minister is to be satisfied involve issues of such a character as might lead to endless debate ; and the Minister as administrator is under a duty to other returned soldiers to see that the first holder is not blocking them without advantage to himself and under a duty to the State to see that its generosity is not wasted."

In their Lordships' opinion the cases referred to in argument have no bearing on the present case. The vendor is under this clause exercising a merely administrative function, and is entitled to form an opinion on such materials as he himself thinks sufficient.

There is no suggestion that the appellant in the present case acted otherwise than in absolute good faith.

There appears at page 23 of the Record at line 24 a passage of the appellant's evidence in which he gives a general description of the materials before him, and this shows that he acted with great care and deliberation.

On the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that on this point the appellant is entitled to succeed.

The Board having come to this conclusion, it may be said that a decision on the other points is unnecessary. But they have been argued and various opinions thereon have been expressed in the Courts below, and their Lordships therefore think it right to state their own views upon them.

On the first point their Lordships have no hesitation in saying that the letter of December 21, 1921, was not a sufficient demand in writing within clause 24 of the agreement. It was, moreover, open to other attacks: it only purported to give two months for payment instead of three, one of the three sums for default in payment of which cancellation was threatened was not six months in arrear, and no distinction was made between it and the other sums, so that if the letter was, in fact, a demand, it would require payment of a sum to which the clause did not apply at all. Counsel for the appellant hardly pressed his submission on this point.

As to the effect of section 94, this is a more difficult question, but their Lordships are of opinion that the appellant's contention is correct. The Registrar is directed to make the entry in the Register by which effect is given to the forfeiture or determination on receipt of the notice from the Commissioner that the Crown lease in question has been lawfully forfeited. In this respect the Crown lease is placed in a different position from that occupied by an ordinary lease. In this case the lessor, seeking to have registered the fact of re-entry, has to prove the fact, and that it has taken place in manner prescribed by the lease to the satisfaction of the Registrar. The Registrar is then to make an entry in the Register, and the estate of the lessee in the land is then to determine (see Real Property Act, 1886, section 126).

If the view of the appellant is not correct, then the Crown is in a less favourable position than the ordinary person. In the latter case when once he has satisfied the Registrar and the necessary entry has been made in the Register, the validity of the re-entry cannot be questioned, for the statute provides that the estate of the lessee in the land shall thereupon determine, whereas in the case of a Crown lease, if the respondent is right, the validity or otherwise of the forfeiture or determination might remain an open question until it should be decided whether it was lawful or not. It is more reasonable to suppose that in this case the duty of deciding the point was cast upon the responsible Minister, whose view was to be taken as final so far as the Register is concerned. The two cases would then be on the same footing, except only that in the one case the decision affecting the Register would be that of the Registrar, in the other that of the Commissioner.

The Judges in the Courts below who decided against the appellant on this point did so on the ground that the forfeiture or determination which is to have effect is a lawful forfeiture or determination. Their Lordships cannot agree with this view; the forfeiture or determination is that above referred to, viz., one which the Commissioner in his notice says has been lawfully effected. It may be worth noticing that this is apparently the view taken by the Registrar, for in the endorsement on the agreement he says that it "has been lawfully determined as appears by the notice from the Commissioner."

It has been suggested by the appellant that any hardship to individuals deprived of land by erroneous entries on the Register is met by the provision in the Act contained for compensation either by the person responsible for an erroneous entry (section 203) or out of the assurance fund (section 208). Beyond saying that there appears to be something in the suggestion, their Lordships express no opinion on the matter, as the point was not really before them.

In their Lordships' view, therefore, the appellant fails on his first point but succeeds on his second. As he also succeeds on the third point he establishes his case on the fourth. Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and the order of the High Court of Australia discharged, the order of the Full Court of South Australia being thus restored. As to the costs of this appeal the appellant, pursuant to his undertaking, must pay the costs of the respondent as between solicitor and client. Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

IN THE ESTATE OF CAIE.*

Will—Probate—Motion to exclude clauses—Alleged offensiveness—No defamation of an individual—Motion refused.

This was a motion by the widow of William James Caie, a medical practitioner, late of Highbury House, Bury St. Edmunds, to exclude certain clauses from the probate copy of his will.

Mr. Talbot-Ponsonby, who appeared for the applicant, said that the clauses contained no testamentary dispositions and were offensive and objectionable to persons professing the Christian religion.

Mr. Justice Hill.—Is that a ground for omitting them from the probate? Suppose that a convinced Mahomedan writes in his will:—"I am convinced that every other religion is false," can I omit the words? Can I leave out part of a man's will because I do not like it?

Mr. Talbot-Ponsonby referred to In the Estate of White (30 The Times L.R., 536; [1914] P., 153).

Mr. Justice Hill.—That case merely decides that the Court has power to omit from the probate copy words which are scandalous and defamatory. In the present case there is nothing of the kind. In the first clause which I am asked to omit the testator merely states the age at which he would like his children to choose the Christian body to which they belong. Another clause is merely an exhortation to become a Freemason. In the clauses sought to be omitted the testator expresses various views on religious subjects, but there is nothing defamatory of any individual. The applicant apparently desires their omission from the probate because the views expressed do not happen exactly to coincide with hers. She appears quite to have misunderstood the law on the subject. The motion will be dismissed.

In another motion, in which the words were highly defamatory of a living individual, his Lordship directed that they should be omitted from the probate.

THE YURI MARU. THE WORON.*

Canada—Admiralty jurisdiction—Claims under charterparties—No local residence of parties impleaded—No cause of suit arising within the local jurisdiction—Whether process in rem competent—Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 27), s. 2 (2).

Under s. 2 (2) of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, apart from local legislation, a Court of Admiralty in Canada cannot, irrespectively of the residence of the defendant or place of origin of the alleged cause of action, be called upon by arrest of a vessel within its area to adjudicate upon all claims of plaintiffs suing under any charterparty made in respect of the vessel. Similarly, throughout the Empire, outside England, litigants in Courts of Admiralty jurisdiction have, apart from local legislation, no right of proceeding by process in rem in respect of like claims, in like circumstances of the absence of local residence of parties impleaded and the non-existence of any cause of suit arising within the local jurisdiction. The above Act defines as a maximum of jurisdictional authority for the Courts to be set up thereunder the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England as it existed at the time when the Act was passed. The Act therefore does not include in such jurisdictional authority the jurisdiction in claims on charterparties which was for the first time conferred on the Admiralty Division of the High Court in England by s. 5 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1920.

These were appeals by the plaintiffs from judgments of the Exchequer Court of Canada in Admiralty, which raised important points in regard to Admiralty jurisdiction throughout the Empire.

Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Barton appeared for the first appellants and Mr. W. Martin Griffin (of the Canadian Bar) for the second. The respondents were respectively represented by Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. W. Lennox McNair, and by Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske.

Lord Merrivale, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—These appeals are brought against judgments of the Exchequer Courts of Canada in Admiralty by plaintiffs who had sued out in the District Court of British Columbia writs in rem and warrants of arrest with a view to the trial at Victoria of claims for damages under charterparties made and alleged to have been broken outside the local area of jurisdiction by parties not resident within that area.

In the case of the s.s. Woron the arrest was in respect of damages stated at about $18,000. The plaintiffs are the Canadian American Shipping Company, Limited, a Canadian company. The owners of the ship appear to be a joint-stock company registered in England. The Woron was said to have been chartered for a voyage from ports in British Columbia to Yokohama, and it was alleged that her master had wrongfully deviated upon the agreed voyage and thereby caused loss to the plaintiffs.

In the case of the s.s. Yuri Maru the plaintiffs are an Italian corporation, Snia Viscosa Società Nazionale Industria Applicazioni Viscosa. The vessel is Japanese, registered at Kobe, the property of owners domiciled in Japan, who have alleged (inter alia) that they became owners since the accrual of the alleged cause of action of the plaintiffs and that judgment in respect thereof had already been recovered by the plaintiffs against their predecessors in title. The claim of the plaintiffs in respect of which the arrest was made was $290,000 for damages for breaches of a charterparty for nine months made in December, 1919.

In each case the owners of the arrested ship moved to set aside the writ and warrant of arrest for want of jurisdiction. These motions respectively were dismissed by Mr. Justice Martin in the District Court, but upon appeal were allowed in the Exchequer Court of Canada.

In view of the fact that the substantial question for argument was the same in each of the appeals, counsel for both appellants and both respondents were heard by their Lordships in the course of one hearing. The question which is immediately raised in both cases is whether, irrespectively of residence of the defendant or place of origin of the alleged cause of action, a Court of Admiralty in the Dominion may by arrest of a vessel within its area be called upon to adjudicate upon all claims of plaintiffs suing under any charterparty made in respect of the vessel.

Incidentally, the further question arises whether, throughout the Empire, there is a like right of litigants in Courts of Admiralty jurisdiction of proceeding, by process in rem, in respect of like claims, under like circumstances of absence of local residence of parties impleaded and non-existence of any cause of suit arising within the local jurisdiction.

The claim of the appellants is that by virtue of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, which provides for the establishment in British possessions overseas of Courts of Admiralty jurisdiction in lieu of the Vice-Admiralty Courts theretofore existing, and the Canadian statutes which have brought that Act into operation in the Dominion and invested with Admiralty jurisdiction thereunder the Exchequer Court of Canada, whatever jurisdiction in Admiralty is from time to time exercisable in the High Court of Justice in England is exercisable in Canada in the Exchequer Court. The jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in Admiralty is exercised in the maritime provinces of Canada by district Judges, of whom the Judge sitting in British Columbia is one.

By the Act of 1890 every Court of Law in a British possession, which (a) is declared by the local legislature to be a Court of Admiralty or (b) has unlimited civil jurisdiction, is constituted a Court of Admiralty, with the jurisdiction defined in the Act in terms the meaning of which is now in question. The Act provides further (section 17) for the abolition, on the "commencement" of the Act in any British possession, of every Vice-Admiralty Court in the possession which theretofore had exercised Admiralty jurisdiction.

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

The due investment of the Exchequer Court of Canada in Admiralty with the jurisdiction defined in the Act of 1890 and the competence of the district Judge in British Columbia to exercise that jurisdiction are not in dispute.

The jurisdiction in Admiralty of the High Court of Justice in England did not extend to claims upon charterparties at the time when the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, became law. Jurisdiction over such claims was given in the first instance by the Administration of Justice Act, 1920, section 5, in terms which have no apparent reference to Courts out of England, since a proviso in the section limits the costs of actions recoverable thereunder in certain events by the amount of the costs which "might have been recovered if the proceedings had been brought in a County Court." The Act of 1920 was among the numerous jurisdictional statutes extending in date from 1873 onward which are consolidated in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. The jurisdiction so conferred on the High Court in England is that on which the appellants rely.

In the statutes of 1920 and 1925 there are no words indicative of any express intention on the part of the Legislature of conferring any extended jurisdiction on Admiralty Courts overseas.

The words for construction in the Act of 1890 are these, in section 2 (2):—"The jurisdiction of a Colonial Court of Admiralty shall . . . be over the like places, persons, matters, and things as the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England, whether existing by virtue of any statute or otherwise." The appellants claim that these words can only be understood as applying to conditions which are to come into being upon and after the passing of the Act. They offer, in effect, to make the meaning clear by reading into the sentence before the word "existing" the words "from time to time." The respondents, on the other hand, contend that the jurisdiction defined by the section is sufficiently and indeed unmistakably described as the jurisdiction of the High Court in Admiralty "existing" at the point of time when the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, became law.

Inasmuch as the use of words in the English tongue is not so rigidly governed by rule as to render impossible either of the alternative constructions of the parties, counsel on both sides properly discussed the subject-matter, origin, and scope and apparent policy of the Act of 1890, with a view to demonstrate the true intent of the language used.

The establishment, in the overseas dominions of the Crown, of Courts of Admiralty jurisdiction under one common system, in place of the pre-existent Vice-Admiralty Courts called into being as occasion dictated in course of two or three centuries at the discretion of the home authorities, is the most prominent of the facts in question. In a material passage in the judgment of Mr. Justice Martin in favour of the appellants the view taken by the learned Judge as to the nature and scope and apparent intention of this transaction is thus stated:—

"The Vice-Admiralty Courts in Canada were abolished upon the coming into force of this Court as established under the Canadian Act of 1891, but if those former Courts were still in existence and exercising locally the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, it would, I apprehend, be clear that their jurisdiction would march with that of the said High Court and increase or decrease as the case might be in accordance with Imperial legislation affecting that Imperial Court. Such being the case, it follows, to my mind, that the present Admiralty Court of Canada . . . likewise marches in the same jurisdiction, and it would require clear language to the contrary to deprive it of the same continuous jurisdiction as is cumulatively possessed by the Imperial Court for the local exercise of whose jurisdiction it is in reality the local machinery and nothing more."

To appreciate the extent to which the jurisdiction of the old Vice-Admiralty Courts was subject to automatic enlargement in harmony with an expanding jurisdiction in the High Court of Admiralty in England it is necessary to bear in mind the relation of the Vice-Admiralty Courts to the High Court during their period of development, the circumstances under which the ambit of the authority of the High Court and of the overseas Courts has been enlarged, and the mode in which as to each the process of expansion has gone on.

The extension of the powers of the High Admiral and his lieutenants or deputies in order to meet the needs which resulted from the growth of the Empire does not need to be described with particularity. (See Marsden, Law and Custom of the Sea, Vol. I., xiii.) Selden gives the early form of the commission of the High Admiral, when the jurisdiction had been centred in one officer of State under this title. (Mare Clausum, p. 196.) Marsden sets out the first commission which, in 1643, extended beyond "England, Ireland, and Wales, and the Dominions and Isles of the same." It included "all the islands and English plantations within the bounds and upon the coasts of America." (Marsden, p. 531.)

The creation of Vice-Admiralty Courts overseas is also dealt with by Marsden (Marsden, Law and Custom of the Sea, Vol. II., pp. xiv., xv.); and Brown's Civil Law and Admiralty, published in 1802, presents from the standpoint of a learned civilian a broad view of the then existing system of Vice-Admiralty Courts constituted under commission of the High Admiral or the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. The substance of the matter, as things stood before 1890, is concisely presented by an experienced public servant, Sir Henry Jenkyns, in these terms (Jenkyns, British Rule and Jurisdiction Beyond the Seas, p. 33):—

"In civil matters, the most important branch of extra-territorial jurisdiction, that of the Admiralty Court, was, until 1890, mainly exercised by Vice-Admiralty Courts established by an instrument under the seal of the office of Admiralty, issued in pursuance of authority given to the Commissioners of the Admiralty in England by a commission under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom. In practice, a Judge of the Superior Court of the possession was always made Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, but he held that office by virtue of an appointment from the British Admiralty and not by virtue of his position as Judge of the possession. His jurisdiction was vested in him personally, and not in the colonial court."

The jurisdiction exercised by the Vice-Admiralty Courts was commonly that of the High Court of Admiralty. The area of the exercise of the jurisdiction was enlarged as the Empire grew. Its juristic extent was not. For centuries that had been stabilized and strictly limited so far as the High Court of Admiralty was concerned by the vigilant supervision of the Court of King's Bench. The High Court of Admiralty never shared the inherent capacity for development which marked the English Courts of law and equity.

Great extensions of the Admiralty jurisdiction in England were made during the nineteenth century, before the passing of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890. Notable extensions had also been made during the same period by Acts of the Imperial Parliament in the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Courts. It would be wholly incorrect, however, to suppose that these were extensions of jurisdiction granted to the High Court of Admiralty here and thereupon automatically operative in the Courts overseas. Parliament made its separate grants to the High Court of Admiralty as an English Court. Dr. Lushington, as Judge of the Court, pointed out as early as 1859 that the extensions so made had no effect in the Vice-Admiralty Courts. (See The Rajah of Cochin, Swabey, 473.) At this Board in the same year the conclusion was stated (The Australia, 13 Moore, P.C., 132, at p. 160). Parliament in fact legislated for the High Court and the overseas Courts by numerous unconnected statutes.

The Admiralty Court Acts of 1840 and 1861 conferred specific powers, carefully identified and limited, upon the High Court in England. The Vice-Admiralty Courts Acts of 1863 and 1867 (26 and 27 Vict., c. 24 ; 30 and 31 Vict., c. 45) extended the powers of the Admiralty Courts overseas, not by reference to the powers of the High Court in England, but by scheduled statement of the causes of action in respect of which jurisdiction was newly conferred and specification of other amendments.

So far as the appellants' case rests upon a theory that without statutory action there was before 1890 a historic and progressive growth of Admiralty jurisdiction which was common to the High Court and the Vice-Admiralty Courts, or upon a supposition that any statutory enlargement of the jurisdiction of the High Court in England operated automatically to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Courts, it cannot be sustained.

How then did Parliament, by the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, deal with the condition of affairs which had grown up under the old law ?

The Act has three outstanding characteristics. So far as the "instance" jurisdiction is concerned, its plain intent is the establishment as part of the machinery of self-government within each autonomous area of Courts locally constituted wherein Judges locally nominated should exercise such a measure of jurisdiction in Admiralty within prescribed limits as the Government on the spot might think convenient. Subject to specific reservations the statute applied to the Empire, and it provided that on the commencement of the Act in any British possession, and subject to its provisions, every Vice-Admiralty Court in the possession should be abolished.

By section 2 (1) and section 3, the Legislature of an overseas possession is enabled, at its will, to declare a Court of unlimited civil jurisdiction within its area to be a Court of Admiralty ; to limit territorially or otherwise the extent of the jurisdiction in Admiralty to be exercised in such Courts ; and to confer partial or limited jurisdiction in Admiralty upon subordinate or inferior Courts. In the absence of local legislative action, a Court of "original unlimited civil jurisdiction" in any possession is constituted a Court of Admiralty. And by section 2 (1), "Where in a British possession the Governor is the sole judicial authority, the expression 'Court of law' for the purposes of this section includes such Governor."

Incidentally to the fact that the Act of 1890 empowers self-governing communities to decide for themselves within defined limits what shall be the ambit of the jurisdiction to be exercised by their Courts by means of process in rem, it is necessary to bear in mind that, even in England, conflict of opinion long existed as to the advantage of extending the availability of this process, and that the right of trial within a local jurisdiction of actions arising elsewhere is not always an unmixed benefit. Opinion may well differ between State and State as to whether, e.g., a port which is chiefly a port of call will be benefited by the existence of a power in all and sundry to arrest vessels found within its limits in order that strangers may litigate in the local Court questions which have arisen elsewhere.

The Act of 1890 empowers the Legislature in any of the dominions to determine by its own statute, subject to the Royal Assent on the prescribed special reservation, what shall be the extent of the Admiralty jurisdiction of the Courts for which the local legislation provides. Yet, if the contention of the appellants in this case is sound, an Act of the Imperial Parliament, purporting on the face of it to apply to England and the High Court in London, has without any choice of the self-governing States in the Empire peremptorily enlarged the jurisdiction of their Courts in Admiralty, subject only to a power in them under section 3 of the Act of 1890 to limit such jurisdiction anew by a new local law, after compliance with the conditions of section 4 whereby such a law, unless previously approved by a Secretary of State, must be "reserved for the signification of her Majesty's pleasure thereon, or contain a suspending clause."

The present case arises upon an enlargement by the Imperial Parliament of the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England. But the fact cannot be overlooked that during the last half-century the distribution of business in the High Court in England has been the subject of very numerous enactments, and there is involved in the question now presented for determination the further question whether the withdrawal of any cause of action from Admiralty process in England would ipso facto operate a corresponding diminution in Admiralty jurisdiction in the Courts overseas. A construction of the statute of 1890, which would have the singular effect of introducing by an automatic process unasked changes in the jurisdiction and procedure of the Courts of self-governing dominions, with possible power in the local Legislature by a cumbrous process to revoke an extension of jurisdiction in rem, but no power to undo an unwelcome abatement, manifestly could not be adopted unless the words of the statute should be found to leave no alternative.

Neither the early history of the overseas Courts, the course of modern legislation, continuity of policy, nor practical convenience appear to their Lordships to require that the jurisdiction defined in the Act shall be declared to be that "from time to time existing" in the High Court in England.

On the whole, the true intent of the Act appears to their Lordships to have been to define, as a maximum of jurisdictional authority for the Courts to be set up thereunder, the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England as it existed at the time when the Act passed. What shall from time to time be added or excluded is left for independent legislative determination.

Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that in their opinion these appeals fail. The costs of the respondents must be paid by the appellants.

METROPOLITAN MEAT INDUSTRY BOARD v. SHEEDY AND OTHERS.*

New South Wales—Debts due to the Crown—Claim to priority.

The Metropolitan Meat Industry Board was constituted in 1915 under an Act of the New South Wales Legislature, and it performed certain functions on behalf of the Government. It claimed from a company in liquidation sums for telephone services and sanitary and inspection fees, and submitted that the debt was one due to the Crown and had the right of priority of payment over the debts due to the general creditors of the debtor.

Judgment of the Equity Judge in New South Wales affirmed, as the debt could not be recognized as due to the Crown.

This was an appeal from an Order of Mr. Justice Long Innes, of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Equitable Jurisdiction).

Mr. W. A. Greene, K.C., and Mr. A. C. Nesbitt were counsel for the appellant; Mr. J. H. Stamp appeared for the respondents.

VISCOUNT HALDANE, delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—

The only question before their Lordships is whether a portion of a debt of £1,554 14s. 6d., due to the appellant Board from a company in liquidation named J. Carpenter Hales and Co., Limited, is a debt due to the Crown. If it is, the entire debt may have priority over the debts due to all other unsecured creditors of this company, but if it is not a debt due to the Crown no question of priority arises. There was another question as to whether the appellant Board as landlord is entitled in priority over other unsecured creditors to money due for rent, but this further question is not raised on this appeal. The first respondent is the liquidator of the company, and the other respondents have been appointed by order in the liquidation proceedings to represent all unsecured creditors of the company other than the appellant Board.

Their Lordships have arrived at the same conclusion as Mr. Justice Long Innes, from whose decision this appeal is brought, and who was the Judge of the Supreme Court of New South Wales in its Equitable Jurisdiction. They think that the debt cannot be recognized as a debt due to the Crown.

The whole of the amount due represented money owing to the appellant Board for telephone services and for sanitary and inspection fees. The real question is whether this amount is owing to the Crown, for as to the debt itself there is no doubt as to its validity. The appellant Board contends that if the debt is due to the Crown it is entitled to priority under the law of New South Wales relating to companies in liquidation. As the learned Judge who heard the case decided that the debt was not due to the Crown it was not necessary for him to go into this question, and he did not decide it.

The appellant Board was constituted under the Meat Industry Act of New South Wales, 1915. This Act provides for the maintenance and control of abattoirs and slaughter-houses, cattle sale yards, and markets in the County of Cumberland in which the City of Sydney is situated, and so extends to a part of the State around that city. The Act vests certain properties in the appellant Board, and provides for the regulation of the slaughter of cattle and for other ancillary purposes. Before 1915 the business of slaughtering animals for food in the State had been in the main carried on by private enterprise, subject to the control of a number of local authorities. The Act of 1915 altered, and in a large measure superseded, two statutes of 1902. One of them, No. 37, related to the area of the City of Sydney and three miles round it. The other, No. 36, related in the main to all parts of the State of New South Wales not being within the City of Sydney. Under these statutes the slaughtering of cattle, the supervision of abattoirs, the prevention of nuisances, and other cognate matters were provided for. The powers conferred by the two statutes were to be put into force in places outside Sydney by the Council of the Municipality where there was a municipality, and by the senior police officer of the district in other places. The statute No. 36 provided by section 4 that the Council of the City of Sydney might appoint inspectors of slaughter-houses and of cattle intended for slaughter. Elsewhere within the State such inspectors were to be appointed by the municipalities or by the Government, as the case might be. Under both the Act relating to Sydney and that relating to the rest of the State the existing Board of Health constituted by the Public Health Act, 1902, was to have a power of supervision and inspection, and was to make regulations and to appoint its own inspectors.

So far as the City of Sydney and the County of Cumberland were concerned, the Meat Industry Act, 1915, almost completely superseded this system. A new Board, called the Metropolitan Meat Industry Board, was established and incorporated. On its recommendation inspectors and other officers were to be appointed by the Governor of the State for the administration of the Act. This Board was to have power to hold and sell or purchase land and to adapt buildings, and to manage and maintain abattoirs and sale yards, and to deal, by purchase or sale, in cattle or meat. It was to regulate the slaughter and sale of cattle. By-laws were to be made by it and penalties were imposed for their breach. Many of the powers of the Municipal Council of Sydney relating to these matters were transferred to this new Board. Its powers were more extensive than those formerly exercised by the Board of Health.

The question in the present case is whether the debt is one due to the Crown so that it falls within the prerogative right of the Crown to priority of payment as against the general creditors of the debtor. If it does so this can only be on the footing that the prerogative of the Sovereign extends to a body such as the appellant Board. It is thus necessary to consider somewhat closely the scope of the Act of 1915, for this Act keeps alive, by section 4, the powers already vested in the Board of Health as at the date of the passing of the new Act, and also, instead of making expenses payable out of money to be provided by the Legislature, directs the levy of tolls and fees, to be levied by the new Board, and their payment into a fund out of which the expenses of carrying this Act into effect are to be met. In dealing with the question of liability to statutory poor law rate, the House of Lords, in Jones v. Mersey Docks (11 H.L.C., 443), laid down the principle of exemption in virtue of the prerogative in words which are important in this case because of the analogy they present to the principle involved here. Lord Cranworth, at page 508, says that when the Crown is not named in a taxing statute imposing a rate it is not bound by it, and that it follows that lands or houses occupied by the Crown, or by servants of the Crown, for purposes of the Crown, are not liable to the rate. There has been confusion, he adds, between property occupied for public purposes and property occupied by servants of the Crown. This principle, he goes on, exempts from rates, not only Royal palaces, but also the offices of the Secretaries of State, the Horse Guards, the Post Office, and many similar buildings. And on the same ground police courts, county courts, and even county buildings occupied as lodgings (for the Judges) have been held exempt.

But these decisions have all gone on the ground that these might all be treated as buildings occupied by servants of the Crown, and for the Crown, extending in some respects the shield of the Crown to what might more fully be described as the public government of the country. In Coomber v. Justices of Berks (9 App. Cas., 61) the House of Lords reaffirmed the principle where the justices of the county had, under statutory powers, erected assize courts, with the usual rooms and offices, and a county police station, with the usual accommodation for constables living there and for prisoners, and the buildings formed one block and were used for the administration of justice and for police purposes, and also for holding county and committee meetings, and various other occasional purposes, from which, however, no rent or profit was derived, that no income-tax was payable. The administration of justice, including police powers, was treated as belonging to the Crown. The language used by Lord Cairns as Lord Chancellor in moving the judgment of the House in the earlier case of Greig v. University of Edinburgh (L.R., 1 H.L. Sc., 348, at p. 350) was cited with approval :—

"The Crown not being named in the English or Scotch statutes on the subject of assessment, and not being bound by statute when not expressly named, any property which is in the occupation of the Crown or of persons using it exclusively in or for the service of the Crown is not rateable to the relief of the poor."

In delivering his opinion in Coomber v. Justices of Berks (supra), Lord Blackburn indicated that if the question had not been covered by authority, there would, in his view, have been considerable force in the argument that as the county might be occupying property in order to fulfil a duty to the Crown which the county was required to fulfil at its own expense, it was not occupying it for the Government or in its service. But he thought that this question was in such instances settled by a stream of authorities which should not be disturbed. It will be observed that the ground of the decision was simply the principle that if the Sovereign is not named in the statute it does not apply to the Crown or to the servants of the Crown acting in its service. The opinion of Lord Watson makes this clear.

But as the exemption was thus attributed to the quality of the prerogative, it is clear that each case had to be scrutinized in order to ascertain whether it really came within the scope of the principle so laid down. In Fox v. Government of Newfoundland ([1898] A.C., 667) such a question was brought before the Judicial Committee. It was held that balances in the books of a bank to the credit of the various local boards administering education in the Colony were not debts to which the priority applied that had been given to debts due to the Crown or the Government as revenues of the Colony. The reason was that the various Boards of Education were not mere agents of the Government for the distribution of money entrusted to them, but were to have, within the limits of general educational purposes, uncontrolled discretionary power in expending it. The service, in other words, was not treated as being the service of the Sovereign exclusively within the meaning of the principle, but their own service. Gilbert v. Trinity House Corporation (2 The Times L.R., 708 ; 17 Q.B.D., 795) further illustrates this aspect of the question.

In the statute before their Lordships they think it not immaterial to observe that under the previous legislation of 1902 the local authorities entrusted with the powers which the Act of 1915 readjusts were certainly not constituted servants of the Crown under the then existing Acts. Their Lordships agree with the view taken by the learned Judge in the Court below that no more are the appellant Board constituted under the Act of 1915 servants of the Crown to such an extent as to bring them within the principle of the prerogative. They are a body with discretionary powers of their own. Even if a Minister of the Crown has power to interfere with them, there is nothing in the statute which makes the acts of administration his as distinguished from theirs. That they were incorporated does not matter. It is also true that the Governor appoints their members and can veto certain of their actions. But these provisions, even when taken together, do not outweigh the fact that the Act of 1915 confers on the appellant Board wide powers which are given to it to be exercised at its own discretion and without consulting the direct representatives of the Crown. Such are the powers of acquiring land, constructing abattoirs and works, selling cattle and meat, either on its own behalf or on behalf of other persons, and leasing its property. Nor does the Board pay its receipts into the general revenue of the State, and the charges it levies go into its own fund. Under these circumstances their Lordships think that it ought not to be held that the appellant Board are acting mainly, if at all, as servants of the Crown acting in its service.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

DE FREVILLE v. DILL.*

Lunacy — Certification—Negligence—Detention under summary reception order — Form of action—Doctor employed by relative of alleged lunatic—Duty to take care in certification—Whether certificate cause of detention — Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict., c. 5), ss. 16, 330 (1).

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant, a medical practitioner, was called in by the husband and/or the father-in-law of the plaintiff to examine her mental condition. He formed the view that it was serious and he sent for the relieving officer, on whose arrival he filled up a certificate under section 16 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, in which he stated that he had come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment. The plaintiff was then taken by the relieving officer to a justice of the peace, who saw her but did not ask her any questions, and made a summary order for her reception in a mental hospital. In two days the plaintiff was released from the hospital on the ground that there was no cause for her detention.

The plaintiff accordingly brought this action, in which she claimed from the defendant damages for negligent certification. The jury found that the defendant had not acted with reasonable care—his good faith was admitted—and they assessed the damages at £50.

Held, that the plaintiff's action was in form an action on the case for negligence in certification causing her damage through detention in a mental hospital without just cause. On the balance of the authorities, (a) the defendant owed to the plaintiff the duty to take reasonable care in coming to the conclusion that she was of unsound mind, although no contractual relationship existed between them; and (b), the certificate given by the defendant was the cause of the plaintiff's detention in the mental hospital. The plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to judgment.

Hall v. Semple (3 F. and F., 337); Everett v. Griffiths (36 The Times L.R., 491; [1920] 3 K.B., 163; 37 The Times L.R., 481; [1921] 1 A.C., 631); and Harnett v. Fisher (42 The Times L.R., 486, 745; [1927] 1 K.B., 402; 43 The Times L.R., 567) examined and discussed.

In this action Mrs. May de Freville, of Lowther-road, Wokingham, Berkshire, the wife of Mr. Geoffrey Philip Herbert de Freville, son of the Rev. Frederick de Freville, of Oakridge Vicarage, Stroud, Gloucestershire, claimed from Dr. Alfred Vincent Dill, a medical practitioner, of The Bourne, Brinscombe, Stroud, damages for his alleged negligence in certifying her to be a lunatic on June 9, 1926. Damages were also claimed for alleged assault and false imprisonment.

Dr. Dill pleaded that he signed the certificate in good faith and that he acted with reasonable care.

Mrs. de Freville's case was that on June 9, 1926, she returned to Oakridge Vicarage after a visit to her father, and her husband put her out of the house. She was very angry and, as she wanted to see her little boy, she got into the house by the servants' entrance. Her father-in-law kept her in the servants' hall while he telephoned to Dr. Dill, who came and certified her as suffering from acute mania, with the result that she was taken to Gloucester County Asylum. On being examined next day she was declared to be of sound mind and was discharged.

Mr. J. W. J. Cremlyn and Mr. Comyn Maitland appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Singleton, K.C., and Mr. W. H. Gattie for the defendant.

Mr. Justice McCardie, in summing up, said that any suggestion of bad faith that might have been made against Dr. Dill had been wholly withdrawn, and the only issue which the jury had to consider was whether he had exercised reasonable care. The action was important from the point of view of Mrs. de Freville because it involved the liberty of the subject. It was important from the point of view of Dr. Dill because it affected his character and reputation as a medical man; but it was also important from the point of view of the public, to whom the administration of the lunacy law was of vital concern. Litigation of the character of the present case had not been infrequent in recent years, and it might be that, as a result of it, many medical men had refused to take any part in certifying patients under the Lunacy Acts. It might be, whatever was the verdict of the jury in the present case, that many more medical men would decline to give certificates if they might be made subject to litigation because they had become embroiled in embittered family strife with which they had nothing to do.

It was a serious matter that the Lunacy Acts contained no definition whatever of insanity, of unsoundness of mind, or of lunacy. They provided no test, they set no standard, they gave no guidance with regard to these matters. The keynote throughout the Act was, first, the welfare of the patient, and, secondly, the public safety, which might require that the patient should be put under care and treatment.

From the medical point of view, no text-book gave any definition of insanity, unsoundness of mind, or lunacy, and he had never, in the course of his experience at the Bar and on the Bench, known a doctor who was able to give a definition of these things. That illustrated the grave considerations which should be present to the mind of a jury who had to decide whether or not a doctor had acted with reasonable care. A doctor who was called in to deal with an alleged lunatic was dealing with the most difficult subject known to the medical profession. The forms taken by unsoundness of mind were many, diagnosis and classification were difficult, and not only did the forms and symptoms vary, but each varied in degree, in gravity, and in intensity. Symptoms and outbreaks might be intermittent, and might vary year by year, month by month, and day by day.

What was the position of a doctor who was dealing with a question such as that? He (his Lordship) felt that the matter had been put in the best and most practical working form for the consideration of a jury by Lord Haldane in Everett v. Griffiths (37 The Times L.R., 481; [1921] 1 A.C., 631, at p. 654), when he said of the plaintiff in that case: "To-day he is sane in his conduct, and probably was so very soon after the occurrences in question. But the point is whether at the time of these occurrences he had so lost his capacity for self-control as to be, temporarily at least, to all appearance of unsound mind within the meaning of a statute which takes account of his relations to others as well as to himself." The jury must remember that the Lunacy Acts had to be administered and certificates had to be given not only by London specialists and other experienced practitioners in great cities, but also often by ordinary country doctors.

It was one thing to come to a decision whether or not a certificate should have been given in the present case after a seven days' hearing of the evidence on both sides and the addresses of counsel; it was another thing to come to a decision in a room in a country vicarage. A general medical practitioner gave no warranty of special skill or knowledge. He was bound to exercise due care having regard to the skill and knowledge which he actually possessed.

After an absence of just over an hour the special jury gave a verdict in favour of Mrs. de Freville, assessing the damages at £50.

After Mr. CREMLYN had formally applied for judgment,

Mr. SINGLETON submitted that the giving of the certificate by Dr. Dill was not the cause of Mrs. de Freville's detention. The first requirement of section 16 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, under which the order for Mrs. de Freville's detention was said to have been made, and which provided that a lunatic who had been brought before a justice might be sent to an institution, was the appearance of the alleged lunatic before the justice. Thereafter there was a duty on the justice to call in a medical practitioner and to examine the alleged lunatic and to make such inquiries as he thought advisable. Then, if he were satisfied and if the medical practitioner who had been called in signed a certificate, the justice might take steps which would result in the detention of the lunatic in an institution. But, unless the conditions precedent had been fulfilled, the justice could not legally make a detention order. Throughout the authorities was found again and again the necessity for the justice to examine the alleged lunatic personally and, still more, to call in a medical practitioner of his own selection.

The question how far a certificate given under the Act brought about the detention of an alleged lunatic had been discussed, particularly in Everett v. Griffiths (in the Court of Appeal, 36 The Times L.R., 491; [1920] 3 K.B., 163; in the House of Lords, 37 The Times L.R., 481; [1921] 1 A.C., 631) and Harnett v. Fisher (42 The Times L.R., 486; in the Court of Appeal, 42 The Times L.R., 745; [1927] 1 K.B., 402; in the House of Lords, 43 The Times L.R., 567). In each of these cases the provisions of the Act had been complied with—in each case the doctor who gave the certificate was a person whose duty it was to do so under an order of the justice. In the present case Dr. Dill was not called in by the justice. No doctor was ever called in by the justice, and the justice, therefore, could not in law make an order for Mrs. de Freville's detention.

What Dr. Dill wrote on the certificate which he signed was merely an opinion, and it mattered not that that opinion was given on a form which was used for the purposes of the Lunacy Act, 1890. Nor did it matter what Dr. Dill's views or intentions were so long as he acted in good faith, which it was admitted he did. It was open to the relieving officer who was called in, (a) to take Mrs. de Freville before a justice under section 15 of the Act; (b) to take her to a workhouse or similar institution under section 20; or (c) to take no action in the matter. But Dr. Dill's opinion was not necessary before the relieving officer could take action if he chose to do so, and no order could legally be made by the justice on Dr. Dill's certificate alone.

In these circumstances Dr. Dill's opinion, whether given in the form of a certificate or not, could not be the causa causans of Mrs. de Freville's detention. Dr. Dill could not have foreseen that the justice would act without reference to the terms of section 16.

Counsel also referred to Thompson v. Schmidt (8 The Times L.R., 120); Reg. v. Whitfield (15 Q.B.D., 122); Morris v. Atkins and Brooker (18 The Times L.R., 628); Latham v. Johnson and Nephew, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 124); [1913] 1 K.B., 398); Hall v. Semple (3 F. and F., 337); and Harnett v. Bond (41 The Times L.R., 509; [1925] A.C., 669).

Counsel submitted that where there was the intervention of a responsible person between an act and a result no damage could result from the act if it were negligent. In the present case the relieving officer who was charged with duties under the Lunacy Act, 1890, acted on his own responsibility. If that was not so the justice certainly did.

Mr. SINGLETON further submitted that Dr. Dill owed no duty to Mrs. de Freville.

Mr. CREMLYN said that from the earliest times persons who had exercised certain callings of a public nature, including doctors, had been, by the common custom of the Realm, under a duty to take care. Quite apart from the Lunacy Act, 1890, Dr. Dill owed a duty at common law to take care in his treatment of Mrs. de Freville. It was an extraordinary proposition that, if Mrs. de Freville's husband or father-in-law called in Dr. Dill to treat her, they would be able to maintain an action against Dr. Dill arising out of breach of contract by him, but Dr. Dill could be as negligent as he liked in his treatment of Mrs. de Freville without her having any remedy against him. Mrs. de Freville would have an action on the case against Dr. Dill if he were negligent, irrespectively of the question who employed him and of the question who paid him: Pippin v. Sheppard (11 Price, 400). If Dr. Dill undertook voluntarily to make a proper and real examination of Mrs. de Freville and did so improperly, he was guilty of negligence at common law (see per Mr. Justice Willes in Skelton v. London and North-Western Railway Company, L.R., 2 C.P., 631, at p. 636), and his negligence was the direct cause of Mrs. de Freville's detention. In the circumstances of the case, however, the relationship of doctor and patient might well have arisen between Dr. Dill and Mrs. de Freville.

A third party might sue for the breach of a contract to which he was not a party where he had suffered a wrong for which he would have had a right of action although no such contract had been made: Longmeid v. Holliday (6 Ex., 761, at p. 767).

With regard to section 16 of the Act, counsel submitted that the provisions of that section had been substantially complied with because, although the justice did not call in a doctor late in the evening, in effect he called in Dr. Dill when he communicated with him earlier before Dr. Dill had signed the certificate. Mrs. de Freville's detention was due to Dr. Dill's certificate as much as to the order of the justice. A doctor's certificate was at least of considerable aid in assisting a justice to decide whether or not a reception order should be made.

Dr. Dill's own evidence showed that he certainly contemplated that Mrs. de Freville should be put in an asylum when he signed his certificate, and that he gave that certificate that she might be put in an asylum because he believed it to be necessary. He clearly contemplated that the justice would act on the certificate which he gave. Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (36 The Times L.R., 640; [1920] A.C., 956) was referred to.

Mr. SINGLETON replied.

MR. JUSTICE MCCARDIE read the following considered judgment:—The plaintiff is the wife of Mr. Geoffrey de Freville. The defendant is a medical man practising in the county of Gloucester. On June 9, 1926, the defendant certified in writing that the plaintiff was a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment. The plaintiff alleged (in substance) that the defendant was negligent in giving his certificate, and she further alleged that as a result of his negligence she was taken, although sane, to the Gloucester County Hospital on the night of June 9 and was detained at that institution for two days ere she was discharged. Hence her claim for damages.

In the earlier stages of the trial there was a suggestion by the plaintiff of bad faith on the part of the defendant. I am glad to say that before the conclusion of the trial the plaintiff's counsel fully and frankly admitted the absolute honesty and integrity of the defendant in all respects.

At the conclusion of the evidence it was agreed by counsel that one issue only (apart from damages) should be considered by, and left to, the jury, namely : Did the defendant act with reasonable care ? To that question the jury answered "No," and they assessed the damages at the sum of £50. Points of law had arisen during the hearing, and therefore, after the verdict had been given, I adjourned the case to a future day so that the arguments of counsel might be presented in the light of the decision of the House of Lords in Harnett v. Fisher (43 The Times L.R., 567).

With the prolonged family history and countless details of this unhappy case I need not deal. It is, however, necessary to state a few of the main facts in order that the points of law may be appreciated. The plaintiff married in 1917 the son of a Gloucestershire vicar. The marriage at first was a happy one. Grounds of difference, however, arose later. It was alleged by the defence that before 1926 the plaintiff had shown signs of serious mental and nervous disorder. This was denied by the plaintiff and her witnesses. Dr. Dill acted as the medical attendant of the vicar (the Rev. Frederick de Freville) and his wife, who was an invalid. It is well to state that the defendant was wholly unconcerned with and dissociated from the family differences and asperities which were revealed in Court.

In May, 1926, the vicar's wife (without the knowledge of the plaintiff) telephoned to the defendant to come to the Vicarage to see the plaintiff. He went, and at the Vicarage he had an interview with the plaintiff, although she resented his presence. He formed a view regarding her state later. He prescribed some simple sedative medicine for her which was sent to the Vicarage. On May 15, 1926, the defendant had a prolonged interview with the plaintiff's husband, who gave him certain information about the plaintiff's health and condition. On June 8 the defendant visited the Vicarage again and had a further long interview with the husband, who gave him further information. At this time the plaintiff was not staying at the Vicarage.

On June 9 the plaintiff returned to the Vicarage, and shortly before six o'clock the defendant received more than one urgent telephone message (from some member of the family other than the plaintiff) to go to the Vicarage. In response to the message the defendant went as asked, and he spent about five hours with the plaintiff. The evidence is conflicting about the condition of the plaintiff and about many other matters and incidents. The defendant honestly formed the view that the state of the plaintiff was serious. Therefore, shortly before nine o'clock, he telephoned to the relieving officer to come to the Vicarage. That official came soon after 10 o'clock, and he and the defendant had a conversation. A policeman, I may mention, had been at the Vicarage since seven o'clock that evening. The relieving officer brought with him a form of certificate appropriate to section 16 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. The defendant filled it up and signed it. The certificate states that the defendant had personally examined the plaintiff, and that he had come to the conclusion that she was a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment. It then proceeds to state : (a) the grounds observed by the defendant himself, and (b) the facts communicated to him by others. It added that the plaintiff appeared to the defendant to be in a fit condition of bodily health to be removed to a mental hospital. Such was the certificate. After it had been signed the plaintiff was led by the relieving officer and the police constable to a waiting motor-car. The plaintiff and the relieving officer entered the car with a female servant whose presence was, for obvious reasons, deemed desirable. The car then drove with its three passengers to the house of a Justice of the Peace, who was a judicial authority within the Lunacy Act, 1890. The Justice of the Peace saw the plaintiff, but apparently did not ask her any questions. Shortly afterwards he (the magistrate) signed the following order : "Order for reception of a pauper lunatic. I, Joseph William Alldridge, having called to my assistance Alfred Vincent Dill, of The Bourne, Brinscombe, a duly qualified medical practitioner, being satisfied that Muriel de Freville, of The Vicarage, Oakridge, in the county of Gloucester, married woman, is in such circumstances as to require relief for her proper care and maintenance, and that the said Muriel de Freville is a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment, hereby direct you to receive the said Muriel de Freville as a patient into your hospital. Subjoined is a statement of particulars respecting the said Muriel de Freville. (Signed) J. W. Alldridge, a Justice of the Peace for the county of Gloucester. Dated the 9th of June, 1926. To the Medical Superintendent of the Mental Hospital for the county and city of Gloucester." Appended to the order of the Justice of the Peace was a statement of particulars containing various details about the plaintiff. I need not set them out. That statement is signed by the relieving officer. After the magistrate had signed the order the motor-car, with the plaintiff, the relieving officer, and the female servant, drove to the Gloucester Mental Hospital. They reached it about midnight, and the plaintiff was received by the matron and two nurses.

The next day the plaintiff was examined by the medical superintendent of the hospital and also by another medical member of the staff. These gentlemen took the view that no ground existed for the detention of the plaintiff, and they decided that she ought at once to be taken from the hospital. On the evening of June 11 the plaintiff's father arrived at the hospital and took the plaintiff away.

Such are the facts, so far as I need state them for the present purpose. I have given them in brief outline only. A large body of evidence was given by and on behalf of the plaintiff. An equally large body of evidence was given by and on behalf of the defendant. It is not my function now to examine that evidence or to weigh the verdict of the jury. I held that there was evidence for the jury of a want of reasonable care by the defendant, and the jury have found against him. They are the tribunal on questions of fact. It is right to add that counsel for the plaintiff and defendant conducted the case and addressed the jury with clearness, force, and moderation. It is also right to add that, in my view, the verdict of the jury must be taken to indicate their opinion that the plaintiff was not in such a state of mental or nervous disorder on June 9, 1926, as to require her detention at a mental hospital.

There is one other thing I should say ere I deal with the points of law raised before me. It is, I think, clear upon the evidence that the defendant was never employed by the plaintiff. She never contracted with him. She never consented that he should be her medical adviser. She had never invited him to attend or to treat her. The defendant, in examining the plaintiff and forming his opinion on June 9, 1926, was acting on behalf of her husband, or her father-in-law (the vicar), and not on behalf of the plaintiff herself.

I now take the points of law. The first contention on behalf of the defendant was that he owed no duty of care to the plaintiff. This point has been raised and often discussed in well-known litigation during the past seven years, and almost all the relevant decisions and dicta have been, from time to time, cited. Many exhaustive judgments have been given which touch, either directly or indirectly, on the point. To review these judgments in detail would make my present judgment one of undesirable length. I shall, therefore, deal with the matter somewhat broadly and without citing in undue detail from the various reports. The question is one of great importance, for it stands on the threshold of such actions as the present. It is singular, therefore, that it has not received express and clear decision from the final appellate tribunal. I feel myself that it would have been desirable, long ago, to pronounce the exact causes of action (if any) in such cases as the present.

In the action now before me the statement of claim asks damages : (a) for negligent certification, (b) for false imprisonment, and (c) for assault. The case, however, at the trial before me was confined to head (a), and by agreement of counsel the only question left to the jury was, as I have said, whether the defendant had been guilty of a want of reasonable care.

In Hall v. Semple (3 F. and F., 337), it is worth noting, the two counts were (a) for assault, and (b) for that the defendant, without reasonable and probable cause and with intent to cause the plaintiff to be imprisoned and put under bodily restraint, did sign a certain certificate. Mr. Justice Crompton (who tried the case) seems to have felt the difficulty of formulation, but told the jury (at p. 354) that the true ground of complaint was "the negligence of the defendant and the want of due care in the discharge of the duty thrown upon him." The jury seems to have found (a) that the defendant acted negligently, (b) that he acted without probable cause, and (c) that the plaintiff had been sane, in point of fact, at the time when the defendant gave his certificate. They awarded damages, and the plaintiff got his judgment (see p. 368), apparently, as Mr. Justice Crompton said, "on the ground of culpable negligence and want of reasonable care or probable cause." Hall v. Semple (supra) is, in my view, somewhat ambiguous and unsatisfactory, but it appears to decide (a) that a doctor when certifying is bound, though not employed by the alleged lunatic, to use reasonable care, and (b) that the basis of a plaintiff's claim for wrongful certification is a particular form of action on the case. It seems clear from the facts in Hall v. Semple (supra) that the doctor who there certified was not under any contract with the plaintiff.

In Everett v. Griffiths (36 The Times L.R., 491 ; [1920] 3 K.B., 163 ; 37 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 631) the statement of claim apparently formulated two grounds of claim against the doctor concerned, namely (1) false imprisonment, and (2) negligence causing imprisonment, and the latter issue alone was left to the jury. See per Lord Justice Atkin (36 The Times L.R., at p. 498 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 200).

Lord Justice Scrutton refers to a claim for "negligent arrest and imprisonment" (36 The Times L.R., at p. 497 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 197). Lord Haldane said (37 The Times L.R., at p. 481 ; [1921] 1 A.C., at p. 640) : "It is therefore an action for damages for false imprisonment, based on alleged breach of duty. The real legal question is not whether the appellant was actually of unsound mind when he was so certified, but whether the respondents committed a breach of any obligation to be careful in so certifying." (See, too, [1921] 1 A.C., at p. 658.)

Upon the question of the cause of action I need only refer to one more case—namely, Harnett v. Fisher (supra). Two questions were there left to the jury—namely (1), Was Mr. Harnett of unsound mind on November 10, 1912, when he was certified by Dr. Fisher, and (2) Did Dr. Fisher act with reasonable care in certifying him ? So far as I can see, there was on appeal no challenge of the sufficiency or propriety of those two questions. I infer from the many dicta in the opinions delivered in the House of Lords and also from the decision itself that such an action as the present is to be regarded as an action on the case for negligence in certification causing damage through detention in a mental hospital without just cause.

I do not pause to analyse the curious and somewhat anomalous feature of this comparatively recent form of action on the case. I am not free to write upon a tabula rasa. I am beset by and subject to decisions and dicta.

If the cause of action be of the nature which I have indicated, and if, as I hold, there was no contract at all between the defendant and the plaintiff in the present case, did the defendant owe to the plaintiff the duty of care with respect to certification and the matters that preceded and surrounded it ? It is plain that a surgeon who operates negligently on the body of a patient is liable in damages, although there be no contract between the patient and himself. So, too, of a physician who administers medicine to the body of a patient. But here the defendant performed no operation at all, nor did he, on June 9, administer any medicine to the plaintiff. He only expressed in a certificate (the substance of which I have given) his honest view that the plaintiff was a "person of unsound mind, and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment." (See on this point per Lord Esher in Thompson v. Schmidt, 8 The Times L.R., 120.) Did, then, the defendant here owe the duty of care to the plaintiff with respect to certification ? If the answer be "Yes," then the singular result seems to follow that he would, apparently, have been liable to the plaintiff for not certifying if the plaintiff had been in fact of unsound mind and a proper subject, therefore, for detention in a mental hospital. Suppose that in the latter case the plaintiff, through the absence of certification and restraint, had inflicted injury on herself ? Could she have sued the defendant for damages ? "If not, it is curious" (as Lord Justice Scrutton has pointed out) "that when he (the doctor) has undertaken to examine he is liable for carelessness which certifies, but not for carelessness which does not certify." (See Everett v. Griffiths, 36 The Times L.R., at p. 497 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 196.) It may also be pointed out that if a doctor be liable in such a case as that now before me it might follow that a petitioner who frames and signs a petition under section 4 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, may also be liable for negligence in supplying the particulars required by the statutory form. (See per Lord Atkinson in Harnett v. Fisher (43 The Times L.R., at p. 573). But, as I have said before, I am not, I fear, in spite of the statements made to me by counsel on both sides on the point, free to express an independent opinion of my own.

How, then, do the authorities stand ? I take the House of Lords decisions first. In Everett v. Griffiths (supra) the opinions were uncertain and somewhat opposite. Lord Haldane says ([1921] 1 A.C., at p. 657) : "I only wish to say that while I think it probable that if the matter were argued out Anklesaria" (the doctor there concerned) "would be found to have been under a duty to the appellant to exercise care, the precise nature of this duty would require consideration before it could be exactly defined." Lord Finlay said (37 The Times L.R., at p. 486 ; [1921] 1 A.C., at p. 669) : "For the purpose of this case your Lordships assume without deciding that the defendant Anklesaria owed to the plaintiff the duty of ordinary care." Lord Cave said ([1921] 1 A.C., at p. 679) : "Upon the conclusion of the argument of the appellant your Lordships were of the opinion that, assuming that this defendant might in law be sued for want of reasonable care in examining and certifying the plaintiff, there was no evidence of such want of care to go to the jury." His Lordship added ([1921] 1 A.C., at p. 680) that he did not wish to cast any doubt upon the correctness of the opinion of Mr. Justice Crompton in Hall v. Semple (supra) "that a medical man who negligently signs a certificate of insanity upon which an order of detention is founded may be made liable in damages for any injury so caused, though," as the noble Lord added, "I express no final opinion upon that point." Lord Atkinson said (37 The Times L.R., at p. 486 ; [1921] 1 A.C., at p. 681) : "Even assuming the duties alleged and relied upon existed, which I am far from admitting, there is not, in my view, sufficient evidence to show that either of the respondents neglected to perform fully the duty he was alleged to owe to the appellant." Lord Moulton said ([1921] 1 A.C., at p. 697) : "I propose to assume in the plaintiff's favour that such negligence and want of care and skill would give to the plaintiff a good cause of action against such defendant, though I do not decide the point." Thus it will be seen that the House of Lords expressed no definite opinion on the point of law now before me.

In Harnett v. Bond (41 The Times L.R., 509 ; [1925] A.C., 669) the question of duty to take reasonable care in certification did not call for consideration.

In Harnett v. Fisher (supra), when in the House of Lords, the point ultimately turned on the Statute of Limitations. Incidentally, however, the question of the duty of reasonable care was mentioned. Lord Sumner said (43 The Times L.R., at p. 569) : "The respondent has not for present purposes disputed that a cause of action would arise at common law as for breach of duty towards the appellant [Harnett] if the respondent was actually wanting in reasonable care in his examination and in forming his conclusion as to the appellant's state of mind. I need therefore express no opinion on this question." Lord Atkinson said, at page 573 : "It may well be that a medical man who treats a patient, or purports to express an opinion on that patient's bodily or mental state of health, is bound to do the work he has undertaken to do with reasonable care and skill. . . . Negligence is a breach of duty, but the question is to whom this duty to use reasonable skill and care is owed. This action is founded on the assumption that it was owed to the appellant." Lord Carson and Lord Wrenbury agreed with Lord Sumner. Lord Blanesburgh, however, appears, at page 575, to have taken the view that the correctness of the ruling of Mr. Justice Crompton in Hall v. Semple (supra) was no longer challenged. As to Harnett v. Fisher (supra) I may say, as I said of Everett v. Griffiths (supra), that it contains no definite opinion on the question of the duty of reasonable care in certification.

I now turn to the views expressed in the Court of Appeal. Those views are to be found in Everett v. Griffiths (supra). I can summarize them in a sentence or two. Lord Justice Bankes held definitely that the defendant in such a case as the present owed a duty of reasonable care. Lord Justice Atkin expressed a clear opinion to the like effect. Lord Justice Scrutton, however, took a wholly opposite view and ruled that in a case such as that before me no duty of care existed. I deem myself free to say that the reasoning, the authorities and the allegations given by Lord Justice Scrutton carry a strong appeal to my own mind. His view, however, was the dissenting and not the majority view. Practically all the relevant decisions were cited before the Court of Appeal in Everett v. Griffiths (supra), and the interesting authorities quoted to me in the present case by Mr. Cremlyn, including the dictum of Mr. Justice Willes in Skelton v. London and North-Western Railway (L.R., 2 C.P., 631, at p. 636) do not carry the matter further. In Harnett v. Fisher (supra) the very point before me was argued before and expressly decided by my colleague, Mr. Justice Horridge. He definitely ruled that a doctor in such a case as the present owes the duty of reasonable care. In the Court of Appeal (supra), and in the House of Lords (supra), the case turned on other points. Whatever my own view, therefore, might have been, I feel that I must bow to the weight of opinion. I must follow the rulings of Lord Justice Bankes and Lord Justice Atkin in Everett v. Griffiths (supra), of Mr. Justice Crompton in Hall v. Semple (supra), and of Mr. Justice Horridge in Harnett v. Fisher (supra). I can find in the House of Lords opinions nothing which is definitely adverse to those rulings. On the contrary, some of the opinions seem inferentially to favour them. I ought not perhaps to omit mention of the fact that section 330 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, seems to be based on the assumption that the ruling of Mr. Justice Crompton in Hall v. Semple (supra) was correct. The material words of section 330 (1) are : "A person . . . shall not be liable to any civil or criminal proceedings whether on the ground of want of jurisdiction or on any other ground if such person has acted in good faith and with reasonable care."

I must, therefore, hold in the present case that the defendant owed to the plaintiff the duty of reasonable care. The House of Lords alone can give, I feel, an opposite decision. I would like to add an observation. During the past seven years a number of medical men, who acted in perfect good faith, have been exposed to the most prolonged, harassing, and costly litigation upon the allegation that they acted without reasonable care in a matter which is the most difficult, delicate, and indefinite in the whole range of medical practice. It may well be, as was stated at the trial before me, that as a result of past litigation many doctors have refused and will refuse to take any part whatever in the work of certification because of the perils and anxieties of litigation which may follow. I am not, however, concerned with consequences. I have only to deal with the points of law before me. Perhaps some further protective legislation is needed in view of recent cases.

I now turn to the second contention of the defendant—namely, that the defendant's certification was not the cause of the plaintiff's detention. Here I must set out the section of the Lunacy Act, 1890, under which the plaintiff was received at the Gloucester County Hospital. It is this : Section 16 : "The justice before whom a pauper alleged to be a lunatic or an alleged lunatic wandering at large is brought under this Act shall call in a medical practitioner ; and shall examine the alleged lunatic and make such inquiries as he thinks advisable, and if upon such examination or other proof the justice is satisfied in the first-mentioned case, that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic and a proper person to be detained, and, in the secondly-mentioned case, that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic, and was wandering at large, and is a proper person to be detained, and if in each of the foregoing cases the medical practitioner who has been called in signs a medical certificate with regard to the lunatic, the justice may by order direct the lunatic to be received and detained in the institution for lunatics named in the order, and the relieving officer, overseer, or constable who brought the lunatic before the justice, or in the case of a lunatic wandering at large, any constable who may by the justice be required so to do, shall forthwith convey the lunatic to such institution." Such is the section, and I will assume for the purpose of the present point that the sequence of steps indicated in the section was duly followed. Now, was the certificate of the defendant the cause of the plaintiff's detention upon such assumption ? If I had been freed from authority I should have thought myself that the effective cause of that detention was the order of the justice and not the certificate of the doctor. The decision lay with the justice and not with the doctor. The justice could decide as he pleased, whatever the certificate stated. He was possessed of judicial authority and judicial discretion, and his adjudication was decisive pro tempore upon the matter before him. The doctor's certificate, though an essential requirement, was a mere opinion. It possessed of itself no operative force.

I could wish that in the recent decisions upon the Lunacy Acts consideration had been given to the words of Mr. Justice Willes in Austin v. Dowling (L.R., 5 C.P., 534, at p. 540). He there pointed out, in a non-lunacy case, the significance of "the opinion and judgment" of a judicial officer. Those words, when taken in conjunction with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Hodson v. Pare (15 The Times L.R., 171 ; [1899] 1 Q.B., 455), are well worthy of close attention. It cannot be pointed out too emphatically that in Hall v. Semple (supra) there was no order whatever by any judicial person. The order for admission to the asylum was there signed by the wife alone. Considerations such as those I have indicated were doubtless present to the mind of Lord Reading when he gave his ruling in Everett v. Griffiths (supra).

I confess that on the point now before me the judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton in Everett v. Griffiths—(See 37 The Times L.R., at p. 495, et seq. ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 191, et seq.), strikes me as weighty in reasoning. That case, like this, turned on section 16. But am I free to express an independent view ? I fear not. The position stands as follows. In Everett v. Griffiths (supra), Lord Justice Bankes expressed no view upon the point before me. Lord Justice Scrutton ruled that the doctor's certificate was not the cause of the plaintiff's detention. Lord Justice Atkin, however, ruled that it was in fact and law the cause of that detention. When Everett v. Griffiths (supra) went to the House of Lords the House did not, in the majority of opinions, deal expressly with the point, for they held that there was no evidence of a want of reasonable care. Lord Haldane does not deal with it. Lord Cave inclined, I think, to favour the view of Lord Justice Atkin. Lord Atkinson expressed no clear view. Lord Moulton expressed no actual opinion. Lord Finlay, however, expressly concurred with the view stated in the Court of Appeal by Lord Justice Atkin. The balance of opinion so far, therefore, favours the view that in the present case the doctor's certificate must be taken to be the cause of the plaintiff's detention in the Gloucester County Asylum. This balance is substantially increased by reason of the recent decision of Mr. Justice Horridge in Harnett v. Fisher (supra). The facts there, so far as they concern the present point, cannot be distinguished from those in the case before me. My learned colleague held expressly that the negligent giving of the doctor's certificate was the direct cause of the magistrate's order and the consequent detention of the plaintiff. The decision in Harnett v. Fisher (supra) when before the Court of Appeal rested upon the Statute of Limitations only. In the House of Lords (supra) the ultimate decision also turned on the Statute of Limitations. On the point now before me, however, I see that Lord Sumner said (43 The Times L.R., at p. 570) : "Any principle on which this cause of action could be sustained would be equally applicable if the defendant had signed nothing but had given his opinion to the magistrate orally. The rest is either a separate cause of action under the Lunacy Act, 1890, for which no damage could be recovered since the detention order was the order of the justice and not of the doctor, or is a mere item in the damages claimed for the negligence." The judgment of Lord Sumner was, as I have earlier said, concurred in by Lord Wrenbury and Lord Carson. See, too, the somewhat similar observations of Lord Atkinson at page 573, where he says : "This reveals the true nature and function of the medical certificates. They are pieces of evidence, just as the statements of the petitioner are pieces of evidence, and are supplied to the judicial authority to help it to decide on the matter of the petition." From Lord Blanesburgh's opinion (see p. 575) I infer, however, that he was in accord with the view expressed by Lord Finlay in Everett v. Griffiths (supra).

In this state of opinion I feel that I ought to follow the clearly expressed rulings of Lord Justice Atkin, of Lord Finlay, and of Mr. Justice Horridge, supported, as I think they are, by the view of Lord Blanesburgh just cited. I find no decision opposite to those rulings save in the judgment, forcible though it was, of Lord Justice Scrutton in Everett v. Griffiths (supra). I must, therefore, hold in the present case, simply on the balance of authority, that the certificate of Dr. Dill was the cause of the plaintiff's detention in the Gloucester Mental Hospital.

I hope that it is permissible for me to express the view that, if possible, the House of Lords will ere long give a clear and final decision both on the question of the duty of care and also on the question of the certificate as a "cause" of detention. Each is a matter of grave importance, both from a legal and from a practical point of view. It is regrettable that so great a difference of opinion should exist and that a trial Judge should be beset with difficulty and doubt. I desire also to express the hope that when the question of the certificate as a cause of detention is finally considered the case of Harnett v. Bond (supra) will receive a full measure of attention. I doubt if the importance of that case with respect to "causation" and the nature of a novus actus interveniens has been fully realized. It was not even cited in Harnett v. Fisher (supra). The weighty observations in Harnett v. Bond (supra) should be contrasted with the well-known passage in the judgment of Lord Sumner in Latham v. Johnson and Nephew, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 124 ; [1913] 1 K.B., 398).

I must now deal quite briefly with the third (and a most ingenious) point raised by Mr. Singleton in his able argument for the defendant. Concisely put it is this : After referring to the provisions of sections 13, 14, and 15 of the Lunacy Act, 1890 (as to summary reception orders), Mr. Singleton points out that the steps required by section 16 are (1) that the justice shall call in a medical man ; (2) that the justice shall himself examine the lunatic and make such inquiries as he thinks fit ; (3) that, if he is satisfied that the alleged lunatic is a lunatic and proper to be detained, the justice should obtain a medical certificate ; and then (4) make an order for detention if he thinks it right to do so. That is the sequence of steps required by section 16. Mr. Singleton then points out that in the case now before me this sequence was not followed. In the present case the justice had not called in Dr. Dill, but, on the contrary, it was Dr. Dill who may be said to have called in the justice. The section, moreover, assumes that the certificate shall be signed after and not before the justice has called in the medical man. Here it was signed before the justice had taken any actual part in the matter. This being so, Mr. Singleton contends, in substance, that the provisions of section 16 were not complied with as they should have been, and he further contends, in substance, that Dr. Dill was entitled to assume (a) that his certificate was a mere and unessential preliminary, and (b) that the justice would, when the matter was brought before him, call in another and an independent doctor for the purposes of certification under section 16.

This third point was never raised at all by Mr. Singleton while the case was before the jury. It was first submitted by him during the argument before me several weeks after the jury had given their verdict. Upon the whole I do not think that it is open to Mr. Singleton to raise it now. If it had been put to me when the jury were in the box I should most probably have left to them other questions besides that of reasonable care. Both counsel, as I have said, had agreed that the only issue to be considered by the jury was the question of reasonable care in certification, together, of course, with the matter of damages should they find for the plaintiff.

But even if the point be open to Mr. Singleton there is a further objection. It is this. Upon the evidence of Dr. Dill himself, who gave his evidence with the utmost frankness, it is clear that he did not contemplate in fact that any other doctor would be called in by the magistrate. He expressly stated on the evening of June 9, in reply to a question by the relieving officer, that no second doctor was necessary. It is plain that Dr. Dill assumed that the magistrate, if he made any order at all, would act upon his (Dr. Dill's) certificate and upon no other certificate.

I, therefore, see nothing in the facts here which takes this case outside those opinions and rulings upon which I have felt bound to rely in giving my decision on the second point in this case. It may well be indeed that the special facts here tell more strongly against Mr. Singleton's client than would have been the case if the sequence of steps required by section 16 had been strictly followed. I need not examine the decisions in Morris v. Atkins and Brooker (18 The Times L.R., 628) and Reg. v. Whitfield (15 Q.B.D., 122) cited by Mr. Singleton. They do not, I think, affect my decision.

It is right to point out that section 330 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, provides, in substance, that persons carrying out the statute and signing orders or medical certificates shall not, if they act in good faith and with reasonable care, be liable to civil or criminal proceedings whether on the ground of want of jurisdiction or any other ground.

I must rule against the defendant on the third point also. The result is that judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for the £50 damages awarded to her by the jury.

Mr. SINGLETON.—May I ask your Lordship for a stay as to damages and costs on such terms as your Lordship thinks proper ?

MR. JUSTICE MCCARDIE.—Yes, I think so. To my mind it is desirable, if possible, that the first two points I have dealt with should be not only finally, but also clearly, decided so that the Judge may know in a case of this sort the direction that he is to give to the jury regarding the degree and character of the care required by the doctor in such cases.

Mr. SINGLETON.—It is regarded by those instructing me as important in the interests of the medical profession.

Mr. CREMLYN.—I do not object to a stay on the ordinary terms.

MR. JUSTICE MCCARDIE.—Then the money had better be paid into Court within a fortnight, and the costs of the plaintiff will be taxed and paid by you, Mr. Singleton, on the usual undertaking to return them in accordance with the ultimate result.

HARDIE AND LANE, LIMITED v. CHILTON AND OTHERS.*

Trade Unions—Representative action against members—Requirement of common interest—Definition of trade union—Trade Disputes Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 47), s. 4 (1)—Trade Union Act, 1913 (2 and 3 Geo. V., c. 30), ss. 1 (2), 2—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XVI., r. 9.

The plaintiffs, who were motor-car dealers and agents, brought an action against the defendants, sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the Motor Trade Association, an unregistered trade union, having as its object the imposing of restrictive conditions on the conduct of the motor trade. The claim was substantially for conspiracy. No member of the Association incurred any liability beyond payment of his subscription, and each member was expressly exempted from liability for the acts of the officers and the other members. The Association was a shifting body, some entering and some leaving it. On the defendants' application the Master made two orders, (1) dismissing the action against the defendants in a representative capacity on the ground that the claim was not sustainable in law, and (2) amending the writ and subsequent proceedings by striking out the words which stated that the defendants were sued on behalf of the Association.

Held, that since the persons to be represented had no common interest with the defendants, as required by Order XVI., r. 9, the orders of the Master were right.

Held, further, that the immunity conferred by s. 4 (1) of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, upon trades unions, "whether of workmen or masters," in respect of torts, is not confined to unions of workmen or masters, but extends to any union which has the object of imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of a trade, since such an object is a "statutory object" under s. 1 (2) of the Trade Union Act, 1913, and the definition of "trade union" in s. 2 of the Act of 1913, as including "any combination . . . the principal objects of which are under its constitution statutory objects," applies to a trade union under the Act of 1906.

Decision of Fraser, J. (43 The Times L.R., 477), affirmed.

These were appeals by the plaintiffs, Hardie and Lane, Limited, agents for the sale of, and dealers in, motor-cars, of 24, Woodstock-street, W., from a decision of Mr. Justice Fraser (43 The Times L.R., 477), who dismissed the plaintiffs' appeals from two orders of Master Jelf made on the application of the defendants, John Chilton, Harry Arnold Bennett, and Percy Ingram Denyer, sued on their own behalf and on behalf of the Motor Trade Association.

The Motor Trade Association was an unregistered trade union, and on June 3, 1914, it was certified by the Registrar of Friendly Societies to be a trade union under section 2 (3) of the Trade Union Act, 1913.

One order dismissed the action against the defendants in a representative capacity on the grounds, (1) that the statement of claim disclosed no claim sustainable in law or cognizable by the Court; and (2) that it disclosed no matters giving ground for an action against the defendants as representing the Motor Trade Association or against the members thereof as represented by the defendants. The other order was (a) that the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action should be amended by striking out from the title of the action the words: "And the said John Chilton, Harry Arnold Bennett, and Percy Ingram Denyer sued on their own behalf and on behalf of all other members of the Motor Trade Association"; and (b) that certain portions of the statement of claim should be struck out.

The statement of claim alleged that the association purported to carry on business for the purpose of encouraging and protecting the motor industry in the United Kingdom and throughout the world and to watch over and protect the interests of manufacturers, &c. The statement of claim continued:—

"The defendants Chilton, Bennett, and Denyer substantially own and control the business and undertaking of the association, and such business is in truth and in fact carried on for their profit and benefit.

"Further, or alternatively, the association is an unregistered association of motor dealers and of motor manufacturers. The defendants Chilton, Bennett, and Denyer are and were at all material times members of the said association and also are and were members of a committee conducting the affairs of the association on the members' behalf and are sued as representing the general body of the members. The said defendants are and were at all material times the trustees of the association and the funds of the association were vested in them as such trustees. The said funds were at all material times the property of the members of the association and vested in the said trustees upon trust for the members."

The statement of claim then stated that the plaintiffs became members of the association, and alleged a conspiracy between the defendants and one Neale to induce the plaintiffs by fraudulent representations to break a by-law of the association with regard to the maintenance of prices. As the result of the alleged conspiracy the plaintiffs were induced to pay to the defendants the sum of £332 and to give an undertaking to maintain the protected prices. On March 17, 1926, the present defendants issued a writ claiming from the plaintiffs a further £100. The plaintiffs in that action were described as "John Chilton and Harry Arnold Bennett suing on behalf of themselves and all other members of the Motor Trade Association." That action was discontinued.

In upholding the decision of Master Jelf Mr. Justice Fraser held that the defendants could not be sued in a representative capacity—namely, as representatives of the trade union, since there was no common interest as required by Order XVI., Rule 9, which states:—

"Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in one cause or matter, one or more of such persons may sue or be sued, or may be authorized by the Court or a Judge to defend in such cause or matter, on behalf or for the benefit of all persons so interested."

The plaintiffs appealed, by leave.

Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. Harold Simmons appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. Giveen for the defendants in their representative capacity, as representing the Motor Trade Association; Mr. Merriman, K.C., and Mr. St. John Field for the defendants, as individuals.

The Master of the Rolls, in the course of his considered judgment, said that the statement of claim had declared three causes of action—(a) conspiracy; (b) libel; and (c) money had and received. Sir Henry Slesser, during the argument, had decided to abandon all claims for libel, and, if the action proceeded, the statement of claim would have to be amended accordingly. The third claim, for money had and received, depended on whether the plaintiffs could abandon the conspiracy declared by the statement of claim, which was said to be the basis of the acts done by the defendants, and whether they could base their claim for that sum upon an indebitatus count alone. For the reasons given by the Court in the case of Brocklebank, Limited v. The King (40 The Times L.R., 869; [1925] 1 K.B., 52), the plaintiffs could not vary their claim in that way.

On the facts alleged, the cause of action stood upon conspiracy and duress, and the plaintiffs could not dissociate their claim from those facts and rest it upon a money basis only. As a result, therefore, the claim for conspiracy alone remained.

After carefully reading the judgment of Mr. Justice Fraser, he (the Master of the Rolls) thought that that Judge had dealt fully with the question whether the defendants, in their alleged capacity as representatives of the Motor Trade Association, were within the ambit of Order XVI., Rule 9. He desired to associate himself with Mr. Justice Fraser's reasoning. He would only add that, by regulation 14, no member of the Motor Trade Association incurred any liability beyond payment of his subscription, and, by later words, every member was expressly exempted from liability for the acts of other members or officers of the association. The association was a shifting body, some members coming in and some leaving it. The words of Lord Parker in London Association for Protection of Trade v. Greenlands, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 281 ; [1916] 2 A.C., 15), and of Lord Justice Swinfen Eady in Mercantile Marine Service Association v. Toms ([1916] 2 K.B., 243), indicated that in the present case there was no ground for saying that the members of the association had the same interest in the action, or the same defence to it, as the three named persons, or that they came within the ambit of Order XVI., Rule 9. The appeals must, therefore, be dismissed upon that ground.

There had been an earlier question raised by the defendants which had been argued by both sides. The action was for conspiracy, and section 4 (1) of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, said :—

"An action against a trade union, whether of workmen or masters, or against any members or officials thereof on behalf of themselves and all other members of the trade union in respect of any tortious act alleged to have been committed by or on behalf of the trade union, shall not be entertained by any Court."

Those words were clear and direct. In Vacher and Sons, Limited v. London Society of Compositors (29 The Times L.R., 73 ; [1913] A.C., 107) it was held that the section was not limited to tortious acts committed in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, but extended to all torts. Sir Henry Slesser had presented an ingenious argument, to the effect that the words "whether of workmen or masters" were words of limitation and limited the unions entitled to ask for immunity to those composed of workmen or masters, which did not include the Motor Trade Association, whose object was "the imposing of restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business." But that was a "statutory object" under section 1 (2) of the Trade Union Act, 1913, and the definition of "trade union" under section 2 of the Act was "any combination . . . the principal objects of which are under its constitution statutory objects." That definition applied to a trade union under the Act of 1906. The Motor Trade Association was within it, and was entitled to the immunity given by the section.

In the plain meaning of the English used he found great difficulty in construing the words "whether of workmen or masters" as words of limitation.

The tests of a trade union were its objects, not its personnel. As a matter of caution, it might have been thought wise to insert words to make it clear that unions of masters, not less than of workmen, were covered by the immunity provided, but the House of Lords in Vacher's case (supra) had rejected the attempt to give the section a restricted meaning. The speeches of the Lords all indicated that the section was to receive the wide meaning that its words appeared to carry. The appeals must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he was of the same opinion. Notwithstanding the elaborate argument of Sir Henry Slesser, the reasoning of Mr. Justice Fraser was unshaken, and he clearly could not here come to any other conclusion without disregarding the plain practice of the Court in representative actions, and casting wholly unwarranted liabilities on a great number of persons who had done nothing to render themselves responsible, and would have no proper opportunity of defending themselves. The present action was not to enforce a right against a fund in which all members of the Motor Trade Association had a common interest, or to declare the interpretation of regulations binding them in common—a class of case to which Order XVI., Rule 9, was, at any rate primarily, applicable ; it was to enforce a strictly personal liability against the named defendants and the whole of the members of the association. Whether the liability so sought to be enforced were in contract, as in Walker v. Sur (30 The Times L.R., 171 ; [1914] 2 K.B., 930), or in tort, as in Mercantile Marine Service Association v. Toms ([1916] 2 K.B., 243) and the present case, the judgments of the Court of Appeal in both those cases showed clearly how impossible it was that the named defendants could adequately represent, for the purposes of defence, the different individual members of the association, as these might have defences separate and distinct from those of the named defendants, and of each other. Moreover, of all torts that of conspiracy would seem the least capable of being properly defended by certain named defendants on behalf of the members of a large and fluctuating unincorporated association.

It might be desirable to add, though the matter was perhaps one of form rather than of substance, that it was incorrect to make any individual a defendant twice over because he happened to fill two capacities, or to have two different interests. The question often arose in actions in relation to trusts, and the practice was invariably to the contrary. With regard to the point raised under section 4 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, he (Lord Justice Sargant) agreed with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, and thought that the words "whether of workmen or masters" were not words of limitation, but were intended to operate by way of comprehension, or rather, perhaps, by way of negation of restriction.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that two separate sets of counsel had been briefed for the three defendants, one set to represent them in their personal capacity, and another set to represent them in their alleged representative capacity. In his opinion that double naming on the record and double representation by counsel were altogether irregular. It might be stated in the writ or statement of claim that the defendants were sued in a personal and also in a representative capacity ; but he knew of no case where the Court had permitted the parties to be named twice over on the record, or to be represented by two separate sets of counsel. That, however, was a technical point.

Upon the main question, Sir Henry Slesser had placed reliance on the dicta of Lord Macnaghten and Lord Lindley in Taff Vale Railway Company v.

Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (17 The Times L.R., 698 ; [1901] A.C., 426), but since that case was decided there had been cases in the Court of Appeal, binding upon the present Court, those of Walker v. Sur (30 The Times L.R., 171 ; [1914] 2 K.B., 930) and Mercantile Marine Service Association v. Toms ([1916] 2 K.B., 243). The principles in those two cases were in his (Lord Justice Lawrence's) opinion directly applicable in the present case, and established conclusively that in an action like the present the Court ought not to pronounce a judgment which would bind the absent members of the association and make them liable for damages for conspiracy, or for money had and received to the use of the plaintiffs. If further authority were needed to support that conclusion it could be found in the judgment of Lord Parker in London Association for Protection of Trade v. Greenlands, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 231 ; [1916] 2 A.C., 15), in which it was shown clearly that an action such as the present did not come within the purview of Order XVI., Rule 9.

Another fatal objection to the action, in so far as it claimed relief against the defendants as representing the members of the association, was section 4 of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906. In his (Lord Justice Lawrence's) view, the words "whether of workmen or masters" were obviously not intended to limit the expression "trade union" as had been suggested. The phrase was not perhaps very aptly chosen, but it was clearly used comprehensively, in order to emphasize the fact that the expression "trade union" included unions both of workmen and masters. The appeals failed on both grounds, and must be dismissed with costs.

Contract—Agent of friendly society—Alteration of rules—Amendment providing for compulsory retirement—Whether binding on agent appointed before amendment.

The plaintiff was appointed an agent of the defendants, a friendly society, whose rules, though subject to alteration, provided at that time for the retention of agents in office so long as their conduct was satisfactory. After the plaintiff reached the age of 65 the defendants altered their rules by providing that agents should be compulsorily retired at the age of 65, and in accordance with the amended rules the defendants terminated the plaintiff's employment. In an action for a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to do so,

Held, that as the rules, on the face of them, were alterable, the plaintiff was not entitled to the declaration claimed, and the action failed.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 375) affirmed.

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mr. Walter Wright Page, of Nicholl-road, Harlesden, from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 375) holding that the defendant society was entitled by virtue of its rules to require him to retire from the position of district manager of the society at the age of 65.

The plaintiff, who was now 69 years old, had been employed as the society's agent or manager for Willesden since December, 1896, until he was compulsorily retired in October, 1925, solely in consequence of a new rule of the society that officers should be so retired with a pension at the age of 65. His reputation with the society stood very high, and although, according to the computations of the society, he was only entitled to a pension of £8 per week, the society had increased it to £8 10s.

At the time of the plaintiff's appointment the rules stated that agents should remain in office so long as their conduct was satisfactory to the managing committee. The rules had been altered from time to time, but on the occasion of each alteration provision was made that "the existing . . . officers . . . shall hold their offices as of their appointment under any former rules."

On March 31, 1925, the society amended its rules by adding a clause that all the servants, except the collecting staff, should be compulsorily retired at the age of 65 as and from October 1, 1925, subject to the granting of what, in the opinion of the committee of management, was an adequate pension. The plaintiff was 65 on February 2, 1923.

By a letter dated May 30, 1925, the society terminated the employment of the plaintiff and dismissed him as from October 1, 1925. The plaintiff claimed that he was not bound by the new and amended rules ; that the terms of his engagement were not and could not be altered by the making of the amendments by the society, and did not, on their true construction, enable the society compulsorily to retire him.

The defendants contended that it was an implied term of the agreement that the rules could and might be amended or rescinded at any time, and that the plaintiff's employment terminated in accordance with the provisions of the rules.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that the action was misconceived and dismissed it. He said that the plaintiff took office under a rule of the society, but the rules, on the face of them, were subject to alteration. The rule under which the plaintiff claimed what was equivalent to a freehold tenure was alterable, and it was duly altered, and the plaintiff was retired in accordance with the rule as altered. His Lordship said that he could not accept the contention that the rule as to compulsory retirement at 65 could not relate to the plaintiff because he was 65 before that new rule was made.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. James Wylie appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Maugham, K.C., Mr. Artemus Jones, K.C., and Mr. Bertram Long for the respondents.

The Court did not call on counsel for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiff was appointed a collector for the society as early as 1878, and in 1896 was made a district manager at Willesden.

His Lordship read the letter terminating the plaintiff's employment, and continued :—It was argued that the letter could not properly be sent to the plaintiff under the rules of the society. It was also argued that the altered rule could not apply to him because he had passed the age of 65 when the alteration was made. Mr. Justice Rowlatt had sufficiently dealt with that suggestion. But it was said that the appointment which the plaintiff received was a freehold appointment for the term of his life so long as his conduct was satisfactory to the society. It was plain from the terms of the letter under which he was appointed that he was not expressly appointed for such a term, nor did the letter refer to the rules of the society. Rule 15 provided for the appointment by the society of an unlimited number of agents, who could hold office so long as their conduct was satisfactory. It was argued that there was an implied condition in the plaintiff's contract, derived from Rule 15, entitling him to hold his office for life. He (his Lordship) could not accept that view of the contract. Each committee had power to appoint persons to hold office for a period longer than their own period of office, but the rule did not mean that the committee must make appointments for life. Then it was said that the plaintiff, being a member of the society, knew the rules, and must have contracted in accordance with the rules. But the same difficulty applied.

If Rule 15 was incorporated, so was Rule 27, which gave the committee power to alter the rules. Indeed, the Friendly Societies Acts gave powers to societies to alter their rules and provided for the registration of amendments to them. If the contract was made on the basis of the rules, then both Rules 15 and 27 were imported and it must be taken to have been contemplated that the rules might be changed. It was suggested that the action of the amending rule was stayed by the proviso to it, and that the servants, appointed before the new rule as to retirement at 65 came into force, were not subject to it. But the proviso was necessary simply for the purpose of avoiding the troublesome task of reappointing all the officers and servants of the society on the basis of the new rules.

The plaintiff had not succeeded in establishing that the contract under which he was appointed manager was one to endure for the whole of his life. Both parties contemplated that if the rules were to be imported into the contract the rule giving power to amend the existing rules, and the amendments thereof, must be included. The result was that the plaintiff's claim failed. The decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt must be affirmed and the action dismissed with costs.

K.B. Div. (Acton, J.) 1927. July 7.

PARSONS v. BURGESS.*

County Court—Jurisdiction—Breach of promise of marriage — Action for return of articles given during engagement—Alleged bailment.

The respondent brought a County Court action against the applicant for the return of certain money and articles, alleging that the parties had promised to marry one another and that the applicant had broken the promise. The applicant applied for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the County Court on the ground that the action was really one for breach of promise of marriage and that therefore the County Court had no jurisdiction. The respondent contended that the action was brought on a bailment, which was within the County Court jurisdiction.

Held, that in substance the claim was for damages for breach of promise of marriage and the writ must issue.

Hunt v. North Staffordshire Railway Company (2 H. and N., 451) followed.

This was a summons for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the Judge of the Clerkenwell County Court to prohibit him from further proceeding in an action in which the plaintiff, in his particulars of claim, alleged that he and the defendant had engaged to marry one another ; and that in contemplation of their marriage he gave her £40, a sewing machine, and an engagement ring. He further alleged a breach of the engagement by the defendant, and as a result claimed the return of the £40, the sewing machine or its value, and the ring or its value.

The defendant obtained leave from Mr. Justice Talbot to issue the summons, which was subsequently adjourned into Court under Order LIV., Rule 22, of the Rules of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Reginald T. Sharpe appeared for the applicant, the defendant in the action ; Mr. E. B. Calvert for the respondent, the plaintiff.

Mr. Sharpe contended that the plaintiff would have to prove not merely that there was no marriage, but that there was a wrongful breach of promise. He referred to the judgment of Mr. Justice McCardie in Cohen v. Sellar (42 The Times L.R., 409 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 536) and also to Hunt v. North Staffordshire Railway Company (2 H. and N., 451) ; Foster v. Reeves ([1892] 2 Q.B., 255) ; Smith v. Smith ([1925] 2 K.B., 144) ; and Crossingham v. Park (43 The Times L.R., 647). He contended that the action was really one for damages for breach of promise.

Mr. Calvert referred to the particulars, which set out that the plaintiff was formerly engaged to the defendant, and during the course of the engagement deposited £40 with the defendant as bailee to be utilized when they were married. The action depended on bailment, which was within the jurisdiction of the County Court.

Mr. Justice Acton said that, in his opinion, the case was concluded by authority. On the authority of the cases cited by Mr. Sharpe, and especially of Hunt v. North Staffordshire Railway Company (2 H. and N., 451), it seemed to him that Mr. Sharpe was quite right in his contention that the claim was really in substance one for damages for breach of promise of marriage, and that the inquiry must involve the question of breach.

The particulars of claim, which set out a promise of marriage and gifts of chattels, and that the defendant broke the promise, asked the Court to draw the conclusion that a right arose to damages with a right to the return of the chattels. In substance, this was an action for breach of promise of marriage and was excluded from the jurisdiction of the County Court. In his view, the writ of prohibition should issue.

Chan. Div. (Russell, J.) 1927. July 7.

IN RE LANYON—LANYON v. LANYON.*

Will—Construction—Condition against marrying a blood relation—Avoidance—Probable prohibition of marriage—Public policy.

A testator left his residuary estate to his son for life, with remainder to his son's children provided that he did not marry a blood relation ; and there was a gift over in the event of the son's doing so.

Held, that the proviso was not annexed to the gift of the life interest, and that the condition as to the defeat of the interest of the son's children, in the event of the son's marrying a blood relation, was void on grounds of public policy, as leading to a probable prohibition of marriage, since it would be almost impossible to ascertain definitely that any particular woman was not a blood relation.

In this case Mr. Justice Russell decided that a provision in a will that if a testator's son married a blood relation any children of theirs should lose all interest under his will was void as likely to lead to prohibition of marriage.

The testator, James Lanyon, made his will on June 15, 1922, and died on June 18, 1924.

After giving certain annuities he directed that his trustees should stand possessed of his residuary estate "upon trust to pay the income to my said son James Lanyon for his life and on his decease upon trust to pay the capital to his child or children and equally between them if more than one provided he does not marry a relation by blood as I wish to mark my great objection to marriage between blood relations. And in the event of my son not leaving a child or children surviving him who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years or in the event of his marrying a blood relation then upon" certain other trusts.

Mr. Rawlence appeared for the trustees ; Mr. Farwell, K.C., and Mr. C. Harman for James Lanyon ; Mr. Beebee for the testator's widow ; and Mr. Bennett, K.C., and Mr. Harold Christie for the residuary legatees.

Mr. Justice Russell, in the course of his considered judgment, said that the son was anxious to have his position clearly defined. He was a bachelor, aged 37. He not unnaturally wished to know (1) whether, if he should knowingly or unknowingly marry a blood relation, he would lose his life interest ; and (2) whether the provisions of the will in regard to his marrying a blood relation were void, or whether his future choice of a bride was to be fettered by the risk of a subsequent discovery that he and his wife had a common ancestor who, say, landed in Pevensey Bay with William the Conqueror.

As to the first question, there was no difficulty. The proviso was in no way annexed to the gift of the life interest. The proviso and the gift over in the event of his marrying a blood relation were included in and applied only to the trusts declared to take effect on the son's decease. The result was that if the provisions were valid in law they only operated to defeat the interest of children of James Lanyon, not to defeat his life interest.

The second question was more difficult. The meaning of blood relationship was clear. It could not refer to statutory next-of-kin. It described the relationship existing between two or more persons who stood in lawful descent from a common ancestor. The chain of descent might be broken by illegitimacy, but, with that qualification, all persons descended from a common ancestor, however remote, were blood relations.

On behalf of the son it was argued that the proviso and condition were intended to defeat the vested interests previously given to the children ; that for such a provision to be valid it must be possible at any given time to know its limits and to know whether there had in fact been a breach of the condition or not ; and that it was impossible for the son so to know the limits and be certain that the person he married was not a blood relation.

The authorities cited in support of these contentions were Clavering v. Ellison (3 Drew., 451) ; In re Exmouth (23 Ch. D., 158) ; and In re Sandbrook ([1912] 2 Ch., 471). In his opinion, they only supported the proposition that such a provision must indicate in clear terms what the event was on which the defeasance of a vested estate was to take effect, not that a difficulty in ascertaining whether the defined event had or had not occurred would render the provision void for uncertainty. The condition must be clear and certain not only in the expression of the creation of the limitations but also in its operation. The person affected need not be in a position at all times to know whether he was committing a breach of a provision the nature of which was clearly expressed. In this case the prescribed event was quite clear, but it was sought to avoid the clause because it was said that it was difficult and probably impossible for the son to ascertain whether a particular marriage would be, or had been, a breach of the provision. The authorities cited did not justify him in declaring the provision to be void on that ground. It was open to a testator to make, within legal limits, any disposition of his property, however unreasonable or whimsical it might appear to others. He might, within perpetuity limits, take property away from A and give it to B upon the happening of any event, but the event must be clearly defined, and must not violate considerations of public policy.

The son sought to add another qualification to a testator's right to dispose of his property—namely, that the event must be of such a nature that at any point of time limited for its occurrence it must be possible to know whether it had occurred or not. He was aware of no legal principle on which he was at liberty so to hold. In this case the very difficulty which the son might have in ascertaining that he and his bride did not have legal descent from a common ancestor would affect the persons on whom would lie the onus of proving that the specified event had happened. If the difficulty amounted to impossibility, the defeasance could never operate. If the defeasance ever did operate, it could only do so because it was possible to know within the limited time whether the event had occurred or not. In his opinion, although uncertainty as to what was the prescribed event upon which a defeasance was to occur would avoid the provision for defeasance, it was impossible to hold that, because it might be uncertain from time to time whether a clearly defined event had or had not occurred, the provision was void.

It was next argued on behalf of the son that the provision for defeasance was void on grounds of public policy, as being in restraint of marriage. By the law of this country the doctrine of the civil law, which avoided all conditions in wills restraining marriage, had not been adopted. Many such conditions had been held valid. Thus, in Perrin v. Lyon (9 East, 170), a condition against marriage with any person born in Scotland or of Scottish parents was held good. In Hodgson v. Halford (11 Ch.D., 959) a clause was upheld which provided for forfeiture in the event of marriage with a person who did not profess the Jewish religion or was not born a Jew. In Jenner v. Turner (16 Ch.D., 188) a condition for defeasance in the event of marriage with a domestic servant was held valid. It was pointed out that the whole female world, except only domestic servants, was open as a field of choice.

In his opinion, however, all partial restraints of marriage were not necessarily valid because they were partial only. It was not enough to say that a particular restraint was not general restraint, but left open a field of choice and was, therefore, valid. Considerations of public policy required more than that. There still remained to consider in each case whether the particular restraint was reasonable from the point of view of public policy. A restraint which, from its nature, although in its terms partial, would or might lead in practice to a probable prohibition of marriage would, in his opinion, fall within the mischief which public policy required should be prevented. This view was established by a decision of the High Court of Parliament in Ireland in the old case of Keily v. Monck (3 Ridgeway, 205). The provision for defeasance there was the event of a daughter marrying a person not being at the time of the marriage seised of an estate in fee, or of a freehold perpetual, of the clear yearly value of £500 sterling. The restraint was in terms partial, but the House held the provision to be void as leading to a probable prohibition of marriage.

Although in the case before him no one could say how large or small a portion of the female world the restraint left open to choice, it was still, in terms, a partial restraint. But its nature was such that it would be difficult, almost impossible, to ascertain definitely that any particular woman was not a blood relation—that a Pevensey Bay or an even more remote common ancestor could not be found. No marriage with a supposed stranger in blood could be contracted except subject to the risk that should a common ancestor be traced the condition for defeasance would operate. The son could only be certain that he was marrying a blood relation, he could never be certain that he was not. A provision which, by its nature, produced these results was a provision leading to a probable prohibition of marriage, and was void accordingly.

There was one novel feature in the case—namely, that the penalty was inflicted not on the son who violated the provision, but upon his children. No property was taken away from the son. In his opinion that made no difference. It might well be that a provision taking away property from A in the event of a breach of condition by B, would not operate in terrorem as regards B, if A were a stranger. He was clearly of opinion that when the victims were B's children and the prohibited event was B's marriage there was ample scope for operation in terrorem as regards B.

He declared that "relations by blood" included all persons deriving lawful descent from a common ancestor, and that the gift over was void altogether.

Court of Criminal Appeal. (Avory, Sankey, and Salter, JJ.) 1927. July 11.

REX v. STUART. REX v. LEONARD. REX v. MAPLES. REX v. TANNEN. REX v. TAYLOR.*

Criminal Law—Threatening to accuse of certain crime with intent to extort money—Use of words capable of meaning some offence not within the enactment—"Improper conduct"—Larceny Act, 1916 (6 and 7 Geo. V., c. 50), s. 29 (2) (b).

The appellants were convicted under s. 29 (2) (b) of the Larceny Act, 1916, of threatening to accuse of a crime within that section with intent to extort money. The evidence was that they enticed a man into a compromising situation with one of themselves and then threatened to accuse him of "improper conduct."

Held, that the mere fact of the words being capable of being understood to mean some offence not within the section was no defence, as it was a question for the jury what was the effect on the mind of the man on whom they were intended to operate, and as there was evidence on which the jury could properly come to the conclusion that the threat was a threat to accuse of the particular crime mentioned in the indictment; and that therefore the convictions must be affirmed.

These were appeals by a gang of blackmailers who were convicted before the Lord Chief Justice at the Central Criminal Court on May 24, 1927.

The five appellants were all convicted on counts charging them with threatening to accuse of a crime with intent to extort money under section 29 (2) (b) of the Larceny Act, 1916. The indictment also contained counts under section 29 (1), for uttering a threatening letter; for demanding money with menaces; for obtaining money by false pretences; and for conspiracy.

The names of the five appellants with the terms of penal servitude to which they were sentenced on the counts under section 29 (2) (b) of the Larceny Act, 1916, were:—Norman Stuart, 12 years; Frank Leonard, 10 years; Joseph Maples, 15 years; Alfred Tannen, 10 years; George William Taylor, for life. Each of the men was also sentenced to concurrent sentences of five years' penal servitude for demanding money with menaces and of two years' hard labour for conspiracy. Maples and Taylor, who were also convicted on a count charging them with uttering a threatening letter, received respectively concurrent sentences of 15 years' penal servitude and penal servitude for life.

The case against the appellants was that they, in company with another man named Brown, who did not appeal, enticed a man referred to as "The Captain" into a compromising situation with Stuart, whereupon Taylor and Leonard came in and threatened to accuse him of improper conduct, and that by that threat they obtained from him then £50. Down to 1927 the gang had obtained from "The Captain" £10,754.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. G. D. Roberts appeared for Stuart, Leonard, Maples, and Tannen ; Mr. E. F. Lever for Taylor ; Sir Travers Humphreys and Mr. Gerald Dodson for the Crown.

Mr. Roberts, in opening the appeal, said that the only question on which he proposed to add anything to the statements made by the prisoners in their notices of appeal was with regard to the counts under section 29 (2) (b) of the Larceny Act, 1916.

Mr. Lever.—The same applies to Taylor.

Mr. Roberts said that the charge of uttering a threatening letter, of which Maples was convicted, could also carry the sentence of 15 years, so that in his case the appeal was academic. But the point which he raised was that the evidence given was equally consistent with a threat to accuse either of one of the felonies specified in section 29 (2) (b) of the Larceny Act, 1916, or of a less serious offence which was not within the section. If there were a doubt, the prisoners were entitled to the benefit of it. As an ancillary point he would submit that the Lord Chief Justice misdirected the jury in not fully explaining the alternatives open to them.

He referred to Rex v. Girdwood (2 East's Pleas of the Crown, 1,120). The true test, in his submission, was not : " Can the words bear the meaning put upon them by the prosecution ? " but " Can the words bear any other meaning ? " In view of the ambiguous matter here, it was dangerous to leave the counts under section 29 (2) (b) to the jury at all.

Mr. Justice Avory referred to Reg. v. Cooper (3 Cox, 547).

Mr. Roberts.—That case, in my submission, is inconsistent with Reg. v. Middleditch (2 Cox, 313). He also cited Rex v. Hickman (1 Moody C.C., 34) ; Rex v. Tucker (1 Moody C.C., 134). Reg. v. Middleditch (supra) was the only decision of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved on the point. Reg. v. Braynell (4 Cox, 402) was again a nisi prius case, as was Reg. v. Gilgannon (63 J.P., 457).

At any rate, there was no evidence against Maples and Tannen, who came into the conspiracy very much later.

Mr. Lever adopted Mr. Roberts's argument and said that he did not desire to add to it.

Sir Travers Humphreys submitted that it was sufficient if a prisoner did in fact threaten to accuse the prosecutor of a crime with intent to defraud. The difficulty in some of the cases cited was that, after the threat, the person accused had in fact accused the prosecutor of something much less. Unless the Court were prepared to say that there was no evidence here on which a jury could find that the threat was a threat to accuse of a crime within section 29, the question was for the jury and the proper direction was that given by the Lord Chief Justice—that they should consider what the words in fact meant, not what they might mean. He referred to Reg. v. Kain and Nugent (8 C. and P., 187).

Dealing with the sentence on Taylor, Mr. Lever said that he could not deny that it was a very serious case of blackmail, but against that must be set the terrible nature of the sentence. The question seemed to be whether this was in the most serious category of offences of this type. There were some cases where the blackmail had gone on during the whole of a person's life : here it was only for about three years. Some victims had been reduced to penury : " The Captain " was a wealthy man and not so seriously embarrassed. It was not a case of checking a crime which was on the increase. The greater facility for prosecution afforded by non-disclosure of names rendered exemplary sentences less necessary.

Mr. Justice Avory, delivering the judgment of the Court, said that no argument had been addressed to the conviction on the charges other than those under section 29 (2), but it was said that the convictions under that subsection were wrong. The argument which Mr. Roberts had presented with admirable lucidity and succinctness was :—(1) There was no evidence to go to the jury of the offence which was charged in the indictment ; (2) even if there were, technically, some evidence, nevertheless, the verdict was unreasonable ; and (3) if words were used which were consistent with a threat to accuse of something less than the specific crime mentioned in that section, then there was no case upon which a jury could convict. The words here were merely a threat to accuse of " improper conduct," which was quite consistent with a threat to accuse only of gross indecency, which was not a crime within the section. (His Lordship read the definition of " crime " for the purposes of section 29.)

The Court had to determine in the first place whether a threat was made to accuse the prosecutor of the particular crime mentioned in the indictment. If there was evidence, the Court was clearly of opinion that the mere fact that the words might be capable of being understood to mean something else afforded no defence, since all the authorities were agreed that it was a question for the jury what was the effect on the mind of the man on whom they were intended to operate. It was important to bear in mind the circumstances in which the threats were uttered.

His Lordship described the events leading up to the " discovery " of " The Captain " and Stuart by Taylor and Leonard and their accusation " You are here for some improper purpose," and continued. The words " You are here for some improper purpose " might not, in other circumstances, have meant a threat to accuse of any crime whatever and it was for the jury to say whether they did so mean.

It was not necessary to consider the distinction between " endeavour " and " attempt " to commit the crime, as the Court was satisfied that there was evidence to justify the jury's verdict, especially after the admissions of Stuart in cross-examination. They were therefore of opinion that there was evidence on which the jury could properly come to the conclusion that the threat was a threat to accuse of that particular crime and, when once that conclusion was arrived at, there was no ground for saying that the verdict was unreasonable.

It was further complained that there was misdirection by the Lord Chief Justice, but he directed the jury's mind to the right question and there was no misdirection.

No distinction could be made in favour of Maples and Tannen. They took advantage of the threat that had already been made and the persecution went on for three-and-a-half years, culminating with a demand for £3,000 under a threat to publish posters accusing " The Captain " of this crime.

In view of the character given to Taylor as a professional blackmailer and associate of thieves, importuners and prostitutes, the Court saw no reason to interfere with his sentence.

All the appeals were, accordingly, dismissed.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) } 1927. June 21.

ROWLAND AND MACKENZIE-KENNEDY v. AIR COUNCIL.*

Crown—Patent—Alleged user—Compensation—Action against Air Council—Whether competent—Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917 (7 and 8 Geo. V., c. 51), s. 10—Patents and Designs Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII., c. 29), s. 29—Patents and Designs Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 80), s. 8.

The plaintiff Mackenzie-Kennedy, who was a consulting engineer and designer of aeroplanes, designed an aeroplane with a tail gunpit, and under a contract of July, 1916, with the Director-General of Military Aeronautics he agreed to carry out the work of its construction for the War Office, and it was alleged for the plaintiffs that it was an implied term of the contract that the specifications and designs were not to be disclosed to rival designers but were to be used only by the Directorate of Military Aeronautics, the Admiralty, and the Air Board. The plaintiffs further alleged that the Air Board disclosed the designs in 1917 to an aeroplane company, with the result that the company fitted a tail gunpit to an aeroplane of their own. In 1918 the company applied for a patent for it, and thereupon Mackenzie-Kennedy applied for a patent, which was granted, subject to a reference to the company's patent. The plaintiffs alleged that in 1917 and 1918 orders were given by the Government to the company for aeroplanes fitted with Mackenzie-Kennedy's tail gunpit and that but for the disclosure of his designs the orders must have been given to him. In an action by Mackenzie-Kennedy and his trustee in bankruptcy against the Air Council the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that Mackenzie-Kennedy's patent was valid, damages, and royalties, and a declaration that he was entitled to have compensation determined in pursuance of the Patents and Designs Acts, 1907 and 1919.

Held, that the Air Council was not liable to be sued on any contract made on behalf of the Crown, and that under s. 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, as substituted by s. 8 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, an action was not the proper procedure, and therefore the action failed.

Decision of P. O. Lawrence, J. (41 The Times L.R., 545), affirmed.

This was the plaintiffs' appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence (41 The Times L.R., 545) in an action brought by Mr. Chessborough Mackenzie-Kennedy against the Air Council. Mr. Rowland, as Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's trustee in bankruptcy, was afterwards added as a plaintiff.

* Reported by T. W. Morgan and E. J. M. Chaplin, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Mr. Chessborough Mackenzie-Kennedy was a consulting engineer and designer of aeroplanes. It was alleged that under a contract dated July 8, 1915, between one Mr. Hamilton Edwards and the Secretary of State for War the War Office agreed to take an aeroplane designed by Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy in accordance with the terms set out in the schedule to the contract. The aeroplane had a novel feature, which was the invention of Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy—namely, a tail gunpit with accommodation for guns and gunners. It also had engines mounted on the wings, and it was the first "multi-engined" aeroplane designed and constructed in Great Britain.

In July, 1916, the Director-General of Military Aeronautics transferred the benefit of the contract to Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy, who agreed to carry out the work with such variations as might be ordered from time to time. The plaintiff alleged that it was an implied term of the contract that the specifications and designs for Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's aeroplane were not to be disclosed to rival designers of aeroplanes, and were to be used only by the Directorate of Military Aeronautics, the Admiralty, and the Air Board.

In the autumn of 1917 the Air Board lent their designing and technical staff to Messrs. Handley Page, Limited, and, as the plaintiff alleged, disclosed to that firm Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's confidential reports and the designs and drawings of his aeroplane. The result of the disclosures was that the Handley Page V.1,500 machine was fitted with Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's invention of the tail gunpit, and on March 15, 1918, Mr. Frederick Handley Page, the chairman of the company, applied for a patent for it.

On March 16, 1918, Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy applied for a patent for his invention, which was accepted subject to a reference to the Handley Page patent. In 1917 and 1918 the plaintiff alleged that large orders were given by the Government to Handley Page, Limited, for aeroplanes fitted with Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's tail gunpit, orders which, but for the disclosure of his designs to that firm, must have been given to Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy. The plaintiff asked for a declaration that Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's patent of 1918 was valid, and claimed as damages £156,506, the profit made by Handley Page, Limited, on the manufacture of the aeroplanes, and £171,000 royalties on the invention. He also claimed a declaration that the making, use, and exercise of the machines constructed by Handley Page, Limited, entitled the patentee to have compensation determined pursuant to the Patents and Designs Acts, 1907 and 1919. The plaintiff contended that the Air Council had taken over the rights and liabilities of the Directorate of Military Aeronautics, of the Admiralty Air Department, and of the Air Board.

The Air Council set up in their defence :—(1) That they were not liable to be sued on any contract made on behalf of the Crown ; (2) that as the alleged contract had been made by servants of the Crown other than the defendants, no liability had ever attached to the defendants or had been transferred to them so as to give any right against them ; and (3) that under section 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, they were entitled to use the alleged invention, the subject of Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's patent, and that in default of agreement between the parties the sum, if any, to be paid by the defendants for the user should be settled by the Treasury under the Act.

In February, 1920, Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy brought an action against the defendants in respect of his alleged rights under the contract of July 8, 1915, and that claim was settled and discharged by the payment of £31,000 to, and accepted by, Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy. That was an action in the King's Bench Division claiming £42,459 4s. for work and labour done, materials supplied, and money expended for the defendants or their predecessors in office.

Mr. Justice Russell, on February 21, 1923, in Rowland v. The Air Council (39 The Times L.R., 228), decided that no action would lie against the defendants on a contract by a servant of the Crown, and that section 10 of the Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917, by which the defendants were established, which provided that "the Air Council may sue and be sued, and may for all purposes be described by that name," did not give a right of action.

On appeal from that decision, the Court of Appeal (39 The Times L.R., 455) took the view that it was not satisfactory that the matter should be disposed of in that way, and an order was made, by consent, discharging the order of Mr. Justice Russell, though the Court did not profess to decide whether Mr. Justice Russell was right. The Court thought that the case ought to go back, and the result of that order was the action from the result of which this appeal was brought.

Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence dismissed the action on the ground that there was no implied condition of secrecy and that, in any event, there had been no communication to Mr. Handley Page of the drawings of any of the Mackenzie-Kennedy aeroplanes. He held, moreover, that the action would not lie against agents of the Crown. His Lordship also declined to make a declaration that Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's letters patent were valid, and held that there were no special circumstances to justify a departure from the ordinary rule that the Crown neither paid nor received costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy appeared in person to argue the appeal; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), Mr. Giveen, and Mr. Trevor Watson were for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes.—I do not think we need trouble you, Mr. Solicitor, on the particular point we propose to decide. It will only be a preliminary decision, and there may be other matters afterwards we shall have to deal with, but in order to make plain exactly what we are deciding, I must go back to the commencement of this action. It is an action brought by Mr. Rowland, the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy. In the action the trustee combined more than one cause of action, but one cause of action, and an important cause of action, was a claim for damages for an alleged breach of contract, a contract originally made by a Mr. Edwards with the Secretary of State for War. I ought to say that the action was against the Air Council. To that cause of action the defendants pleaded that they were a public department of the Government and that the contract which the plaintiff had set up and was relying upon was a contract which was made by servants or agents of his Majesty on behalf of his Majesty, and that the Air Council were not liable to be sued, and the plaintiff's remedy, if any, was by way of petition of right against the Crown. That point was taken as a preliminary point, and it has a somewhat curious history in this sense, that the point has been twice tried by a Judge of first instance. It was tried in the first instance before Mr. Justice Russell upon an order made by Mr. Justice Astbury that this point should be tried as a preliminary point, and Mr. Justice Russell, after going into the matter very fully and very carefully, decided in favour of the Crown that the action so far as this particular claim was concerned was not maintainable (39 The Times L.R., 228). In his judgment he particularly points out that he takes the facts in the statement of claim as being established facts for this purpose merely, and decides the preliminary point on that footing. From that judgment there was an appeal to the Court of Appeal, and an argument was put forward on behalf of the appellant which it is obvious from the interlocutory observations which fell from the learned Judges in the course of the discussion made a certain amount of impression upon them, and to such an extent that, although they refrained from expressing any opinion at all upon the point, they thought that Mr. Justice Russell's judgment should be set aside in order that the point should be further investigated at the trial when the plaintiff had had an opportunity of more fully explaining his case, if I may use that expression, by amended pleading, and the opportunity of bringing forward any facts upon which he relied in support of his alleged cause of action. The plaintiff did amend his statement of claim, and upon the amended claim so put forward the case came for trial before Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence (as he then was), and he again decided in the same way as Mr. Justice Russell did. He accepted Mr. Justice Russell's judgment, and he expressed in terms his view that the judgment was quite right, and he went on to point out one of the further reasons why, in his opinion, the action was not maintainable (41 The Times L.R., 545). That is the history of the litigation down to the present stage.

From Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence's judgment there is this appeal, and in the appeal a number of points are raised, because Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence decided not only this preliminary point, but he decided that, even assuming the plaintiff to be right on this preliminary point, he failed in establishing any cause of action, because he failed to establish the implied contract which he alleged had been broken. He went on further to say that, even assuming that the implied contract was proved, there was no proof of any breach of it.

Now we are only dealing with the preliminary point, the question whether or not the present action in reference to this cause of action for damages for breach of the alleged contract is maintainable, and for that it is only necessary to state very few facts and a very few dates. The contract which is the foundation of the plaintiff's cause of complaint was a contract made on July 8, 1915, between a Mr. Edwards and the Secretary of State for War, and that contract had reference to the construction of an aeroplane designed by Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy. That was in 1915, and it is not disputed that that was a contract made by a servant or agent of the Crown on behalf of the Crown, and was a contract in respect of which no action would lie against the Secretary of State for War. It was a contract in respect of which any remedy for breach must be sought by way of petition of right. That contract was in July, 1915. In July of the next year, 1916, by arrangement between the Secretary of State for War and Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy the contract was transferred from Edwards to Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy, who gave an undertaking to the Secretary of State for War to complete the original contract. That first step was merely a substitution of Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy for Edwards, leaving the contract one with the Secretary of State for War. As I have said, the contract had reference to the construction of an aeroplane, and it appears to have been widened and increased to contracts in reference generally to the designing, if not the construction, of further aeroplanes besides the one originally intended. In February of 1917 the Air Board was established, and the plaintiff seeks to establish a liability upon the Air Council by tracing that liability up to the Air Council through the Air Board, and in some way connecting it with the original contract with the Secretary of State for War. In the amended statement of claim, which was delivered in pursuance of the leave given by the Court of Appeal, the plaintiff sought to establish a liability on the part of the Air Council by steps which were set out in paragraph 7 of the amended statement of claim. In that he alleges that the Air Board "and its members became assignees of the rights, duties, and liabilities of the Secretary of State for War under the said contract and with notice of the conditions became bound to the said Mackenzie-Kennedy to observe and fulfil the same in the manner following." Then first of all he says: "By Order in Council pursuant to the New Ministries and Secretaries Act, 1916, the date and particulars whereof are unknown to the plaintiff, there was transferred to the Air Board the contract and the rights, duties and liabilities aforesaid." That was set up in the hope, probably, of being able to establish the existence of such an Order in Council, but it turns out that there never was one, or at any rate no proof of one was ever given. Then the second ground was: "By agreement between the said Mackenzie-Kennedy, the Secretary of State for War and the President and members of the Air Board, the Secretary of State for War was discharged from the said contract, and the Air Board or the President or the members thereof were substituted in his place and the Air Board and the said Mackenzie-Kennedy agreed that the said contract should be carried out as between the Air Board and the said Mackenzie-Kennedy as from the 6th February, 1917"—that was the date when the Air Board was established—"and in pursuance of the said agreement the Secretary of State for War ceased to act in or about the said contract and the Air Board in his place carried on all correspondence, issued all orders, demanded and received reports, plans, specifications, designs, drawings and other confidential documents, appointed officers to supervise and control work, and enforced against the said Mackenzie-Kennedy with the said Mackenzie-Kennedy's consent the rights and duties of the Secretary of State for War." In my opinion that statement puts the plaintiff out of Court, because, as I have pointed out, the first stage in the alteration of the original contract was the substitution of Mackenzie-Kennedy for Edwards. The next stage is stated to be the substitution of the Air Board for the Secretary of State for War, but the substitution of one party in place of one of the two parties to the contract does not alter the nature of the contract. It may alter one party in the same way as Mackenzie-Kennedy was substituted for Edwards. The substitution of the Air Board, even according to the plaintiff's own allegation, for the Secretary of State for War, leaves the Crown, as it seems to me, in exactly the same position as it was when the original contract was made between Edwards and the Secretary of State for War. It follows, therefore, in my opinion, that the Air Board, even on the plaintiff's own allegation, never undertook any liabilities in the sense that they made themselves the entity responsible to the plaintiff in the action. Therefore the next stage, as it appears to me, according to the plaintiff's own story, is that you get the original contract, but with two substituted parties, Mackenzie-Kennedy substituted for Edwards, the Air Board substituted for the Secretary of State for War; but the position as between the present appellant and the Air Board is exactly the same as it was between Edwards and the Secretary of State for War—namely, that the only remedy on the contract for breach was by way of petition of right. If that is so, the position of the Air Council is this: The Air Council came into existence on January 3, 1918, and it came into existence under and by virtue of the Air Force (Constitution) Act of 1917. Section 8 of that statute provided that on the establishment of the Air Council the Air Board should cease to exist, and all the powers, duties, rights and liabilities and property of that Board should be transferred to the Air Council. The plaintiff's first contention is that his relationship to the Air Board and the position of the Air Board as a substituted party to the original contract created a liability on the part of the Air Board within the meaning of this section. I do not agree with him, for the reasons I have pointed out. It seems to me that the Air Board never came under any liability in the sense in which that word is used in section 8 of the Act of 1917; and a reference to that section does not carry the plaintiff any further, because he has failed to establish any liability on the part of the Air Board which passed to the Air Council under the provisions of this section. He has failed to establish any Order in Council transferring from the Secretary of State for War any obligation to perform the contract which was created by the original contract with Edwards.

The only remaining argument is that founded on section 10 of the said Act, which provided that the Air Council may sue and be sued, and may for all purposes be described by that name, but I agree entirely with what Mr. Justice Russell and Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence have both said with reference to that section, that although it assumes that there may be cases in which the Air Council may become liable and be liable in the sense that they are liable to be sued as for some breach of contract, yet this is not a case in which those words are fit to create a liability which did not exist apart from the provisions of this section. Mr. Justice Russell pointed out that to insert such a clause as that or such a power as that in an Act of Parliament is not sufficient to create a liability or an obligation which apart from the statute would have no existence at all. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that this appeal on this particular point must fail, because in my view both Mr. Justice Russell and Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence took the right view of these facts, and upon these facts the plaintiff failed to establish any contract which was enforceable against either the Secretary of State for War or the Air Board or the Air Council, and that his remedy, if any, is by way of petition of right against the Crown in respect of this particular complaint.

There remains for decision a question as to the plaintiff's claim in respect to an alleged infringement of his patent.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This is an appeal from part of a judgment delivered by Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence in the Chancery Division, and it is one incident in a very complicated course of litigation which has been going on for some years. This particular action alleges, so far as we are giving judgment at present, that Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy made a contract, the other contracting party at the time when the action was brought being the Air Council; that that contract contained impliedly a provision that the Air Council should keep secret the documents connected with the aeroplane which was being supplied, and that in breach of that obligation the Air Council did communicate to Messrs. Handley Page documents which they were under a contractual obligation to keep secret. Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence heard the action for nine days, and he decided that there was no such contractual obligation, and that if there was it had not been broken, because the Air Council had not disclosed the documents; and he also decided that whether that was so or not, there was no right of action against the Air Council, the remedy, if any, being by petition of right. Obviously, if the Judge was right on that third point there was an end of the proceedings so far as they were an action, and consequently we have dealt first with that point, and are saying nothing, and the appellant has said nothing, about Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence's decisions on the other two points—namely (1) that there was no contractual obligation, and (2) that if there had been a contractual obligation it had not been broken. The only advantage, so far as I can see, of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence having decided those two points is that it relieves the mind of the Court at present from any idea that they are doing injustice by insisting on anything like a technicality, because Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence has found that, quite apart from the question how the right was to be enforced, there was never any right to enforce at all, and there was never anything which would have been a breach of such a right if there had been any such obligation.

The question we have to decide arises in this way. In July, 1915, a gentleman who was financing Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's invention submitted a tender to the Secretary of State for War to supply an aeroplane for a price on certain terms which are set out in the usual War Office tender, and the Secretary of State for War accepted that tender, and it is not disputed by the appellant or by the counsel who appeared for him in the earlier proceedings that so far as that contract was concerned no action lay against the Secretary of State for War, but, if it was broken, the remedy would be by petition of right to the Crown. The next stage was that in July, 1916, Mr. Edwards, the financier, dropped out, and Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy was substituted as the party tendering, again tendering to the Secretary of State for War, and again there was no contract on which the Secretary of State could be sued; the only remedy, if there was a breach, was that Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy should present a petition of right to the Crown if he could get the fiat. But apparently the first aeroplane which there was a tender to supply was one which would not work, and Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy went on, with the consent of the Government authorities, endeavouring to improve the aeroplane which, it was hoped, he would ultimately supply, and the papers appear to relate to various forms of aeroplanes which it was hoped ultimately to make. The learned Judge has found that the contract to supply an aeroplane had become merged or metamorphosed or changed by mutual consent into a contract upon which Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy was doing work for some Government department. He has sued the Air Council for remuneration for that work, and he has received £31,000 from the State. So again one's conscience is a little relieved that this is not the case of an inventor who has come away from the Government with nothing in his pocket. He came away with £31,000, and I am only sorry that he seems to be spending a good deal of it on the documents which are blocking up the Court.

Next comes a change, it is suggested, in the contracting party. In 1916 by the New Ministries Act and Secretaries Act, 1916, the Air Board was appointed, which, of course, presumably would deal with aeroplanes, and by section 8 of that Act it is provided: "The Air Board shall in relation to aircraft have such powers and duties of any Government department or authority, whether conferred by statute or otherwise, as his Majesty may by Order in Council transfer to the Board." Now, when the facts come to be looked into, no such Order in Council has been proved, and consequently it has not been proved that his Majesty has transferred any of the powers or duties of any Government department to the Air Board. I leave the rest of the section for a moment and go on to subsection 5 of section 11. Subsection 5 of section 11 of the same Act says: "Where in connexion with the undertaking of any duties or powers by a Minister appointed under this Act, it appears to the Minister and the department or authority concerned that in any notice, order, contract, or other document, the name of the Minister should be substituted for the name of any department or authority, or that the name of any officer of the Ministry should be substituted for the name of any officer of any such department or authority, the Minister may order that the substitution shall take effect." That, of course, would have authorized the Minister appointed under this Act dealing with the Air Board to substitute the name of the Air Board for the name of the Secretary of State for War in the tender. But again it is not proved that any such order was made, and consequently we have no proof that the contract was altered by the Air Board being substituted for the Secretary of State for War. Then there remains the last part of section 8: "or authorize the Board to exercise or perform concurrently with or in consultation with the Government department or authority concerned." There is no evidence as to any express authorization by his Majesty, but there is the fact that the Air Board did go on performing with reference to this aeroplane functions which presumably the Secretary of State for War would have performed before. But what appears clear to me, as far as I have got, is that no change has been made in the nature of the legal relation which Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy has with some Government department. With the Secretary of State for War it was that he could present a petition of right, but had no contractual obligation with the Secretary. I can see nothing to change that in the case of the Air Board to a contract with the Air Board which he could enforce. It appears to me that the Air Board, whatever it does, is still a Government department acting on behalf of his Majesty, and that the remedy for any alleged breach of any obligation is to present a petition of right to his Majesty.

Then comes the last stage. The Air Board had a short existence. It came into existence on February 6, 1917, and it went out of existence in January, 1918. The Air Force (Constitution) Act of 1917 established the Air Council, and provided in section 10 that the Air Council may sue and be sued, and may for all purposes be described by that name, and provided in section 8, subsection (4): "His Majesty may, by Order in Council, transfer . . . to the Air Council . . . such property, rights, and liabilities of the Admiralty or Army Council or Secretary of State." If the Air Board had no liabilities, and if the Secretary of State for War had no liabilities, there was nothing to transfer to the Air Council. The argument appeared to be based on the fact that there was a section saying that the Air Council could be sued, and that certain liabilities were to be transferred to it. In this particular action the reason why the action must fail is that there were no liabilities of the Air Board to be transferred to the Air Council. That is the view taken by Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence, and though I do not think Mr. Justice Russell went into the facts so closely as Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence did, he acted on the supposition that the allegation in the plaintiff's statement of claim that the Air Council was the successor of the Secretary of State for War was exactly accurate, but Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence did go more carefully into the exact facts which I have set out, and he came to the conclusion that there was no contractual liability on the department, but that the only remedy would have been petition of right to the Crown if there was any occasion for such petition. I think that that decision was right, and that therefore so far as the Chancery action is based on contract it must be dismissed on the ground that no cause of action lies against the Air Council.

Lord Justice Atkin.—I agree. This is a case where the plaintiff has brought an ordinary action at law against the Air Council, and he brings his action for damages for breach of contract. The contract that he alleges is an implied term in a contract by which he bound himself to provide for the Government during the war an aeroplane built to his own plans. It has to be remembered that his whole cause of action, so far as is relevant to this point, is based upon an implied term in that contract, or a variation of it made in 1916. The original contract was a contract made with the Secretary of State for War in the year 1915, before ever there was an Air Board or an Air Council, and the altered or varied contract by which there was a contract for work and labour, in other words, by which Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy was to give the benefit of his assistance in conjunction with Government employees for the purpose of constructing an aeroplane, was also a contract which was made with the Secretary of State for War before ever there was an Air Board or Air Council. It appears to me that the mere statement of those facts is sufficient to show that Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy is not entitled in this action to sue the Air Council. There is a provision in the Act constituting the Air Council which provides that they can sue or be sued, and I do not propose to say what my view is as to the full and complete meaning of those words, but it seems to me quite plain that they cannot sue or be sued merely because they are, as a part of the Executive of this country, engaged in carrying out a contract which was made by one of the Ministers of State on behalf of his Majesty, which is the position in this case. Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy fails to show that the Air Council ever themselves became parties to a contract; they never were substituted by novation or otherwise, if it was possible for them to be substituted for the Crown; they never took upon themselves the obligations of a contracting party towards Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy, and in those circumstances it seems to me that the action must fail. I think it is unfortunate that the laws of this country do draw this distinction in this class of case. It seems very unfortunate that the layman should be told, when he has been dealing with a department like the Air Council, that after all his remedy is not against the Air Council but must be by petition of right; and I can only hope that this is one case which will lead the proper authorities in the direction of simplifying the procedure when people have claims which they seek to put in action against the Government. That is not to say that the Air Council are not entirely right in this particular case in taking the point, because as long as they remain without responsibility for such a contract it is obviously part of their duty to see that their freedom from liability is maintained; but the result is, it appears to me, that in this particular case Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy fails.

The hearing then proceeded on the other part of the plaintiff's claim—namely, that which related to his alleged cause of action in regard to his patent. The Court then delivered the following further judgments.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is the second branch of the appeal from the decision of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence. We have already decided that, in so far as the plaintiff's claim was for damages for breach of the alleged implied contract, an action would not lie against the Air Council, and we have given our reasons for that. We decided to deal separately with so much of the plaintiff's statement of claim as related to his alleged cause of action in regard to his patent, and it is necessary to see exactly how the pleadings stand in reference to that claim, and to see what the learned Judge in fact decided. After setting out the facts in reference to the patent which the appellant had taken out, the statement of claim goes on to claim "a declaration of the property in the said invention and of the validity of the said patent . . . and a declaration that the making, user and exercise of the said machines constructed by the said Handley Page, Limited, entitled the patentee to have compensation determined pursuant to the Patent Acts, 1907 and 1919, section 29." Further, it claims "that the terms of compensation for the matters aforesaid may be decided under the Patent Act, 1919, section 29," and an account of all the aeroplanes using the invention. It is manifest (I shall have to go into the matter at a little greater length in a moment) that that is a claim which is founded upon the provisions of what is called the new section 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, as amended by the Patents and Designs Act, 1919.

In answer to that, in the amended defence, the defendants, having set up that they were a public department of his Majesty's Government and servants and agents of his Majesty, and not liable to be sued in respect of any contract made on behalf of his Majesty—that is the first branch of the plaintiff's claim—went on to say "that in so far as the plaintiff's action is founded upon any alleged infringement of Letters Patent No. 166,184, in paragraph 16 of the amended statement of claim referred to, they will rely upon section 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, as a defence to such action, and will say that by reason of the said provisions they were at all material times fully and lawfully entitled to use and exercise the alleged invention, if any, the subject of the said letters patent, and that in default of agreement between the parties the sum, if any, to be paid by the defendants in respect of the user, if any, of the said alleged invention should be settled by the Treasury under the said section and not otherwise"—that has reference to the provisions of the earlier section. "Further or alternatively, the defendants say that the said contract was made and the said letters written and received by servants of his Majesty other than the defendants, and that no liability in respect thereof has ever attached to the defendants or been transferred so as to give any right against the defendants themselves, and the defendants deny that they are successors of such servants of his Majesty in so far as any liability for alleged breaches of such agreements is sought to be founded on such succession or that the defendants have succeeded to any liability in respect thereof." That is a plea to the first branch of the plaintiff's claim. But then, in addition to paragraph 6, they say in paragraph 8 : "By reason of the foregoing the defendants will object that the present claim against the defendants is not maintainable and that the form of the present action and the frame thereof are wholly misconceived." Then they go on : "Without derogation from the foregoing pleas the defendants traverse each and all the allegations in paragraphs 4, 5, 6 and 8 of the amended statement of claim." Then they go on to allege that the letters patent are and always have been invalid, but it will be noticed that that allegation is introduced by the statement that it is without derogation from the foregoing pleas. In those circumstances, what happened was that Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence first of all decided that the action would not lie, because in his view the plaintiff's only remedy was by petition of right. But then, apparently, those representing the defendants thought that it might be an advantage if the learned Judge was either allowed or invited to go into these other questions in reference to the validity of the patent, assuming, I suppose, that if the Judge gave a decision in their favour it would not add anything to the fact that he was prepared to dismiss the action on other grounds, but that it might put an end to litigation, possibly, in another form, in reference to the validity of the patent and the plaintiff's claim arising out of an alleged infringement of the patent or an alleged user of the patent. So the learned Judge did go into these other matters, and he decided them all against the plaintiff. He decided, first of all, that the plaintiff was not the first and true inventor. He decided that there had been a prior patent of Handley Page, and he decided that there had been no user by the defendants, but he made no declaration as asked for in respect of any of those matters. He merely decided them because he was asked to decide them, but apparently he was prepared to dismiss, and would have dismissed, the action, apart altogether from any decision upon these particular points. However, the decision of the learned Judge on these points did not have the desired effect, because the plaintiff has appealed, and in his appeal he asks this Court to reverse the decision of the learned Judge in reference to those three particular matters. He asks us, in substance, not only to reverse what the learned Judge did, but to make the order which the plaintiff in the first instance, or his predecessor in title in the first instance, asked the Court to make by the form of claim to which I have referred—namely, a declaration as to the plaintiff's property in the said invention.

Now it seems to me that the Court below was not competent, and we are not competent, to deal with this particular claim in this form. It is admittedly a claim founded upon the provisions of the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, because it starts with the implied admission that the Air Council as a department of the Government were lawfully making use of this invention of his, assuming it to be a good patent, and because of that lawful use it claims the remedy or the relief which the statute contemplates—namely, a payment of compensation to be ascertained in a particular way. If that is the form of relief which the plaintiff was seeking it seems to me that the relief is obtainable only by the steps indicated in the statute. It is quite true that although the statute refers to a dispute and to such a dispute as is indicated in the section being referred to the Court for decision, it does not lay down any procedure by which the Court is to be approached, and it was not until a much later date, in 1925, that the Rules of the Supreme Court laid down the procedure by which the approach might be made. But we have been told by the learned counsel, who is very familiar with this class of case, that although there was no procedure laid down in the Rules, there was an accepted procedure, at least accepted in the sense that it was adopted on several occasions, of approaching the Court, and approaching the Court by way of motion. It may be that until the Rules were passed that was an accepted way of approaching the Court, but it has never been attempted hitherto, so far as our information goes, to approach the Court by way of action asking for a declaratory judgment. The statute does not contemplate that, and it is not the way in which the particular relief which the plaintiff is asking for is to be obtained. In these circumstances, it seems to me that we should be doing wrong if we acceded to the course which was adopted in the Court below of really endeavouring to investigate the questions which might arise if the validity of the patent was in issue and properly in issue in this case, because, after all the investigation that we might make, we are not competent to do anything in the nature of giving an effective judgment.

For these reasons, in my opinion, this part of the plaintiff's case fails, and the appeal must be dismissed because the plaintiff has approached the Court by a way which was not open to him and which is not within the scope of the legislation under which alone he can claim this particular form of compensation. For these reasons I think that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, in respect of this matter is either by petition of right, when he can proceed against the Crown, or, if he chooses to proceed by the method now laid down in the Rules, it would be open to him to take that particular course.

For these reasons I think that this appeal, so far as it relates to either of the causes of action contained in this statement of claim, either the damages for breach of the implied contract, or the claim for a declaration followed by an ascertainment of compensation, fails ; and the action ought to have been dismissed, as it was dismissed, and the appeal fails.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—During the day and a half that we have been hearing the first two stages of this appeal I have been becoming more and more depressed as the case proceeded. As a Judge who has been concerned with business, it seems to me that these proceedings are thoroughly discreditable to any Constitution purporting to be up-to-date. I am not saying that Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy has any rights. So far as the facts have been determined by Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence he has not, but that there should have been all the proceedings which have been taken in this case, without its yet being ascertained whether he has any rights or not, appears to me to be thoroughly discreditable to the English Constitution. After many years a committee has at last delivered a report, I will not say on the question whether amendments should be made in Crown procedure, because that was not referred to it, I understand, but on amendments which might be made in Crown procedure if there are to be any amendments, and, if I may respectfully say so, the sooner the Government make up their minds whether they are or are not going to simplify the procedure by which subjects may make a claim against the Crown, the better for everybody concerned.

In this case Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy was, I do not know whether I am using the right word, the inventor, because I am not sure that he invented anything, but he alleged that he had invented something, and he had had relations with the Government in respect of a large aeroplane which was supposed to be going to be of great service in warfare. As a matter of fact it never succeeded in flying more than 25 yards. What it would have done if more money had been spent on it I do not know, but it never became efficient in the year or two during which it was being constructed. Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy, however, who received £31,000 from the Government for work that he had done, alleges that he has far greater claims on the Government. Accordingly he issued a writ—he, or his trustee in bankruptcy, or both—against the Air Council, in the action now before us, and the nature of the statement of claim as he put it forward was twofold. He said first of all: "In the course of the work that I did for you on the aeroplane I handed you a large number of documents and plans and reports. It was your contractual duty to keep those secret. You did not keep them secret. You showed them to a competitor of mine, who used valuable information in them, and I want, first of all, damages for breach of your contract to keep them secret." That part of the case we have already dealt with in a judgment in which we have pointed out that the claim being based on contract could only be brought against the Crown by petition of right, and that the statutes constituting the Air Council at present do not make the Air Council a separate entity which can be sued as distinct from the Crown, and we have already dealt, therefore, with that part of the case.

Now we come to the second part of the case. The second part of the case is that, besides claiming damages for breach of secrecy, the plaintiff claims rather over £300,000 in respect of machines alleged to be manufactured by Handley Page, and alleged to contain an invention of Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy. He said: "I have a patent and, first of all, you have said that that patent is invalid, and so I want a declaration that it is valid. You have used the invention in my patent, and I want compensation for the use which you have made of the invention in my patent; I want the compensation to which I am entitled under section 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, as amended by the Act of 1919." That, again, is not a claim in tort. The general law, roughly speaking, as to claims against the Crown is that, if you desire to claim in contract, you must do it by petition of right; you cannot do it by writ; and, if you desire to claim in tort, you cannot claim against the Crown for a wrong, because the Crown can do no wrong; you must claim against the individual subject who did something wrong, and it may be that, if you find the individual subject who did something wrong by the order of the Government, the Government will pay the amount of damages awarded against the individual subject.

This patent claim is not a claim in tort, because the Crown has a right to use the patent on the statutory terms set out in section 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907. If, therefore, one wants to get a decision as to the patent, one is dealing with a statutory right, a right not to damages for tort, but a claim for an amount depending on a statutory contract. First of all, it seems to me, therefore, as Lord Justice Sargant seems to have thought, sitting as the President of the Commission which has dealt with claims by inventors, that, if you want to get a decision as to the validity of the patent and the Crown will not consent to its being dealt with under the proceedings under section 29, you must try to do it by petition of right. I am not saying that you can do it; but that is the way in which you may try to do it, if you want to do it. That was Lord Justice Sargant's view and at present it is mine. Then there is a further difficulty. Section 29 and the decisions given and the rules made under it provide that if you want your compensation in respect of use of an invention by a department, you do it by an originating motion, which proceeds in a particular form. There are no provisions for a writ issued against a department which enable you to sue the department directly for the compensation given under section 29; the claim is really against the Crown and is a claim for money due under a statutory contract and, unless you make it in the way provided by the rules, it cannot be made at all.

Possibly owing to the fact that this action was commenced in 1921, at a time when the procedure under section 29 had not been formulated, this action has been started in entirely the wrong way, and it appears to me to be quite contrary to the law as it at present exists to sue a department by writ and action for the compensation, and still more to test whether a patent is or is not valid with all the machinery of a patent action. As I say, I regret extremely that this should be the result of six years' litigation. Attempts were made by the Crown to get the matter determined as a preliminary point. The Court of Appeal (none of us were members of it; but it was a very strong Court of Appeal) took the view that it was desirable that the facts should be ascertained before the preliminary points were decided. I see that Lord Sterndale did express the view that he would probably agree with Mr. Justice Russell if the facts were found; but now, after six years' litigation, we have got the facts, with this result, that none of the proceedings for so far are of any use. I am not saying anything about the question whether anything that Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence decided in fact will or will not be res judicata in any future proceedings; that will be another matter to be sorted out, if ever, in subsequent proceedings. The result of the present arrangements for dealing with a claim by a subject against the Crown is that six years have passed and nothing has happened and apparently Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy desires to begin all over again, and, as I say, that seems to me a most depressing result, and the sooner it is put right the better.

Lord Justice Atkin.—I agree, and I also agree that this case illustrates the great misfortune which befalls subjects who have to make claims against the Government or against the Executive of the country who have to use their services, and I also agree that it is high time that some simplified form of procedure should be adopted; but I think it also is fair to add that, so long as the law remains what it is, it is plain that a department should not go beyond its legal liability or assume legal liabilities which do not in fact fall upon it. There can also be no doubt at all, I think, that, though these proceedings have taken a long time, the actors in them have had full notice as to what the issues raised are. I am only dealing with that part of the case which asks for a declaration that the patent taken out by Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy in 1918 is a valid patent, and that there has been a use of the patent invention, and which claims that compensation should be decreed to him by the Court. That arises upon the provisions of the Act of 1919, amending the Act of 1907. Before the Act of 1907, a patent did not avail against the Crown. By the Act of 1907 there was a provision that a patent should have to all intents the like effect as against his Majesty the King as it has against a subject, with a provision that any Government department may use the invention "on such terms as may, either before or after the use thereof, be agreed on, with the approval of the Treasury, between the department and the patentee, or, in default of agreement, as may be settled by the Treasury." That was at once made rather difficult by the fact that the Treasury refused to determine a dispute as to the validity of the patent. To my mind it always has been very difficult to ascertain, and it still, to my mind, remains very difficult to ascertain, how a Court can determine what is the use of a patented invention when there still remains the doubt whether it is the true subject-matter of a patent or not. I should have thought that that was of the essence of the question of the amount of the remuneration. However, an improvement in the procedure was no doubt intended to be made by the Act of 1919, which provides, again, that the patent is to have to all intents the like effect as against his Majesty the King as it has against a subject, and then there is a proviso that it is to have quite different effects—namely, that a Government department may use it without a licence "on such terms as may, either before or after the use thereof, be agreed on, with the approval of the Treasury, between the department and the patentee, or, in default of agreement, as may be settled in the manner hereinafter provided." The "manner hereinafter provided" was that in the case of any dispute as to the making, use, or exercise of an invention the matter should be referred to the Court for decision, who should have power to refer the whole matter to a special or official referee or an arbitrator, and it was further provided that "The Court, referee, or arbitrator, as the case may be, may, with the consent of the parties, take into consideration the validity of the patent for the purposes only of the reference." I am by no means certain now what is the precise meaning of that section, but I will assume that it means what it has been assumed to mean hitherto, that the Court may not, without the consent of the parties, take into consideration the validity of the patent. The Act of Parliament provides no procedure in itself by which that question shall be referred to the Court, and a difficult question arises as to how it is to be done. No procedure was in fact laid down until Rules of Court under the Patents Acts were made in the year 1925, when it was provided that the reference should be by means of originating notice of motion addressed to the department and, on such a notice of motion, apparently the Court may make such orders as are appropriate for determining the dispute. But this action was commenced in 1921, before there was any Rule of Court at all, and it was commenced in the ordinary way by a writ addressed to the Air Council, claiming a declaration of validity and claiming compensation.

It appears to me, therefore, that the question at once arises whether the Air Council, as a department, can be sued in the way in which they are sued in this action. To my mind they cannot. The result of this section is to give a statutory right of compensation to the patentee for the use of his invention by a Government department for the service of the Crown. That seems to me to be precisely similar to Attorney-General v. De Keyser's Royal Hotel, Limited (36 The Times L.R., 600; [1920] A.C., 508) and to give rise to a claim for compensation for use of the plaintiff's property and would be the proper subject of petition of right to the Crown. I think that the Act contemplated that the compensation was to be paid by the Crown. I do not think it contemplated that the compensation was to be paid by the department. It would be a very inconvenient mode of dealing with the matter, because the clause makes no provision by which the department is to meet the liabilities and there are numbers of departments which cannot even sue or be sued as a department. Oddly enough, in one part of the Act of Parliament the section describes the department as a person, which is an odd use of juristic language and which I should have thought was entirely inaccurate; but, however that may be, I think the true effect of the section is that it merely gives a right of compensation to a patentee against the Crown for the use by officers of the Crown of his invention for the purposes of the Crown. It gives no right in itself to sue the department. If that is so, I think that the position is not assisted by the fact that in the constitution of this Air Council there is power for the Air Council to sue or be sued. It can only sue or be sued in respect of matters in which as an Air Council it has acquired rights or assumed liabilities or become subject to liabilities, and, in this case, to my mind the Air Council never became subject to any liabilities as an Air Council.

It seems to me, therefore, to follow that the right mode of determining this matter would have been for the Court to have at once declined to make a declaration or, indeed, to investigate this matter of compensation at all, and that is the view which I think we must now adopt. The result is that, as we have now disposed of the matter upon the claim under contract and also disposed of the matter as to the patent, it follows that there was no right to sue the Air Council at all and, as a consequence, the judgment of the learned Judge, by which he dismissed the action, was right and, therefore, this appeal must be dismissed.

PATRICK AND CO. v. RUSSO-BRITISH GRAIN EXPORT COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Practice — Special case — Alternative awards—No view expressed by arbitrators—Right to begin—Party claiming damages.

In this case arbitrators had stated their award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the Court and a question arose which party to the dispute had the right to begin.

The defendants, the Russo-British Grain Export Company, Limited, had sold a quantity of Russian wheat to the plaintiffs, Messrs. Patrick and Co., to be delivered "as per bills of lading dated November, 1926." In the events which happened the defendants were unable to ship in the agreed time. The plaintiffs had resold to other parties, and the question for decision in the case was what was the measure of damages which the plaintiffs could recover.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. James Dickinson appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Somervell for the defendants.

Before the hearing of the case began, Mr. JOWITT asked his Lordship for a ruling which party should begin. In cases in which arbitrators had expressed a view of their own in favour of one of the parties, subject to the opinion of the Court, the other party had a right to begin, just as the unsuccessful party had in an ordinary appeal. But where, as often happened and had happened here, the arbitrators made two or more alternative awards without expressing any view of their own in favour of either party, it was not clear which party had the right to begin, and it was desirable that the practice of the Court should be settled one way or the other. He submitted that in logic the party who was the plaintiff before the arbitrator should have the right to begin.

Mr. SOMERVELL said that he could not quarrel with that submission, and

MR. JUSTICE SALTER ruled that the party claiming damages should begin.

JONES v. SOUTH-WEST LANCASHIRE COAL OWNERS' ASSOCIATION, LIMITED.*

Revenue — Income-tax—Association for mutual insurance — Surplus funds — Whether assessable.

A mutual insurance association was formed, its sole activity being the indemnity of its members, who were coalowners, against liability for compensation in respect of fatal accidents to workmen. The association formed a general fund by making calls upon members proportionate to the wages paid in their works for the time being, and the balance of the ordinary call fund was transferred to a reserve fund, into which any extraordinary calls were also paid. A member, on retirement, was entitled to get back in cash a proportion of his share in the above reserve fund, but, apart from this, members had no right at all to the cash in the reserve fund, though the interest accruing on the reserve fund could be used in diminution of members' calls.

Held, that the surplus funds of the association were not assessable to income-tax, as the association was mere machinery for the purpose of enabling subscribing members to insure themselves.

New York Life Insurance Company v. Styles (5 The Times L.R., 621 ; 14 App. Cas., 381) applied.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 703 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 33) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 703 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 33) affirming an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (42 The Times L.R., 401), which affirmed a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The question raised by the appeal related to an assessment to income-tax under Schedule D made upon the respondent association for the year ending April 5, 1921, in respect of the profits of its trade. Shortly stated, the question was whether the association was liable to be assessed in respect of the surplus of the "calls" made by it on its members, who were coalowners, over the amounts paid by it in settlement of their claims for indemnity. It was not disputed that income-tax was payable on the interest and dividends received by the association from its investments. The facts sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

The respondent association, having been assessed to income-tax under Case I. of Schedule D for the above-mentioned tax year, appealed to the Special Commissioners on the ground that the association was a purely mutual concern and was not carrying on any trade from which profits liable to income-tax arose.

The Special Commissioners discharged the assessment, and that decision was affirmed, first by Mr. Justice Rowlatt and then by the Court of Appeal.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. H. P. Glover for the respondent association.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords : This is an appeal by an inspector of taxes from a decision of the Court of Appeal affirming the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt on a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of Income Tax, and raises the question whether the respondent association is assessable to income-tax in respect of the surplus of its receipts in each year over the expenditure for the year as being profits of a trade or business.

The association, as the Special Commissioners have found, has for its sole effective purpose the indemnity of its members (who are all coalowners) against liability for compensation in respect of fatal accidents to workmen in their employment. The association is a purely mutual concern, every person indemnified by the association being a member of the association, and every member being indemnified by the Association. Under the scheme as set out in detail in the articles of association a fund was to be established by means of "ordinary calls" to be made yearly upon the members in proportion to their disbursements by way of wages or salaries. Out of this fund the members were to be indemnified against claims for compensation, and at the end of each year the surplus of the fund over the expenditure and liabilities of the association was to be carried to a reserve fund. The committee, upon which all the members serve or are represented, is also empowered to make "extraordinary calls" upon the members for the purpose of meeting any deficiency in the fund or for strengthening the reserve. There are provisions enabling the transferee of a mine belonging to a member, or the representative of a member who may die or become bankrupt, to be substituted for such member, and there are also provisions entitling a member on retirement to receive out of the reserve a payment to be ascertained in accordance with a method described in the articles ; but subject to these provisions the funds are to remain with the company, and in the event of a winding-up are to be divided among the members in proportions prescribed. A reserve fund has in fact been established, which at the date of the assessment in dispute exceeded £150,000.

The association has, of course, paid or borne income-tax upon the income from its investments representing the reserve fund, and as to this no question arises ; but for the year 1920-21 an additional assessment was made upon it by the Additional Commissioners for the Warrington Division in the sum of £20,000, which was considered to represent the "calls" received in respect of that year after deducting the expenditure and liabilities of the association. On appeal to the Special Commissioners, the additional assessment was discharged; and the decision of the Special Commissioners has been affirmed by Mr. Justice Rowlatt and by the Court of Appeal. The question is whether that decision is right.

My Lords, when a question of law has been clearly decided by this House, it is undesirable that the decision should be weakened or frittered away by fine distinctions; and it appears to me that the decision of the House in the case of New York Life Insurance Company v. Styles (5 The Times L.R., 621; 14 App. Cas., 381) completely covers this case. In that case the company concerned was a life insurance company which had no shares or shareholders, the only members being the holders of participating policies. A calculation was made in each year of the probable liabilities and expenses of the company for the year, and the amount claimed for premiums from the members was founded on that calculation. At the end of the year an account was taken, and the greater part of the surplus of premiums over expenditure was returned to the policyholders, either in cash or by an addition to the sums secured or by a reduction of future premiums, the remainder of the surplus being carried forward as funds in hand to the credit of the general body of members. Income-tax having been claimed on the surplus of the premiums received for a year over the expenditure for that year as profits or gains under Schedule D, it was held in this House that there were no such taxable profits. Lord Watson expressed his opinion as follows at p. 394 :—

"When a number of individuals agree to contribute funds for a common purpose, such as the payment of annuities, or of capital sums, to some or all of them, on the occurrence of events certain or uncertain, and stipulate that their contributions, so far as not required for that purpose, shall be repaid to them, I cannot conceive why they should be regarded as traders, or why contributions returned to them should be regarded as profits. That consideration appears to me to dispose of the present case. In my opinion, a member of the appellant company, when he pays a premium, makes a rateable contribution to a common fund, in which he and his co-partners are jointly interested, and which is divisible among them, at the times and under the conditions specified in their policies. He pays according to an estimate of the amount which will be required for the common benefit; if his contribution proves to be insufficient, he must make good the deficiency; if it exceeds what is ultimately found to be requisite, the excess is returned to him. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that the transactions of the appellant company, in so far as these relate to participating policies, do not constitute the carrying on of a trade, within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts, and that the surplus funds returned or credited to its members are not profits."

"Persons who agree to contribute to a common fund for mutual insurance certainly would not in ordinary parlance be regarded as carrying on a trade or vocation for the purpose of earning profit. Let us see how the so-called profit arises. It is due to the premiums which the members are required to pay being in excess of what is necessary to provide for the requisite payments to be made upon the deaths of members, and not being, as the case states they were intended to be, commensurate therewith. This may result either from the contributions having, owing to an erroneous estimate or over-caution, been originally fixed at a higher rate than was necessary, or from the death-rate being lower than was anticipated. Can it be properly said that, under these circumstances, the association of mutual insurers has earned a profit? The members contribute for a common object to a fund which is their common property; it turns out that they have contributed more than is needed, and therefore more than ought to have been contributed by them, for this object, and accordingly their next contribution is reduced by an amount equal to their proportion of this excess. I am at a loss to see how this can be considered as a 'profit' arising or accruing to them from a trade or vocation which they carry on. It is true the alternative is allowed them of leaving the excess in the common fund, and so increasing their representatives' claim upon it in case of death, but I cannot think that this makes any difference."

Lord Macnaghten agreed, and the House by a majority held that no tax was payable.

Counsel for the appellant contended that the present case was distinguishable from the New York Life Insurance Company's case (supra) on the ground that, whereas the company there in question returned to its participating policy-holders the surplus of its receipts over its expenditure at the end of each year, the articles of the respondent association require that surplus to be carried to reserve and not at once returned to the members. I do not think this a sound distinction. In this case, as in the New York Life Insurance Company's case (supra), there are no shareholders interested, and the whole of the yearly surplus remains to the credit of the members and must either be applied to meeting their future claims or be returned to them on retirement. Sooner or later, in meal or in malt, the whole of the company's receipts must go back to the policy-holders as a class, though not precisely in the proportions in which they have contributed to them, and the association does not in any true sense make a profit out of their contributions. It may be added that in that case, as in this, some part of the receipts of each year was carried forward as funds in hand.

It was argued that this view gives no effect to the well-established distinction between a company and its members, and that, although the members may make no profit, a profit may still accrue to the company. The same point arose in the New York Life case (supra) and was disposed of in the speeches of Lord Herschell and Lord Macnaghten. Lord Herschell, after stating that the Attorney-General (who in that case appeared for the revenue authorities) had conceded that the fact that the persons associating themselves together for the purpose of mutual assurance had been incorporated was immaterial and that the case might be treated as though it were an association of individuals unincorporated, added at p. 408 :—

"I think the Attorney-General was correct in thinking it immaterial that the persons thus associated had been incorporated, and that a legal entity had been created distinct from the members of which it was composed. This being so I shall, for the sake of simplicity, consider the questions that arise as though the association were unincorporated."

Lord Macnaghten dealt with the same point as follows at p. 411 :—

"It happens here that the persons who combined to obtain the benefit of mutual insurance became, by the very act of insuring their lives, members of an incorporated company. But the company (so far as regards the participating policy-holders) was not formed for the purpose of carrying on a business having for its object the acquisition of gain. The fact, therefore, that the insured, who are also the insurers, carry on their business through the medium of a company was properly treated as immaterial."

It appears to me that the reasoning which commended itself to those distinguished jurists in the New York Life case (supra), applicable as it is to genuine mutual concerns and to no others, applies to the present case, and disposes of the contention now under discussion.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed with costs.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN.—My Lords: I concur. The whole case for the Crown rests on the idea that because in a single year the premiums received exceed the sums paid in respect of the losses in that year the balance represents a profit. It represents no such thing. It is simply a sum of money which is carried forward in order that it may be available to meet excessive losses in a future year, or, if it is found in the end to be redundant, be returned to the shareholders either in the form of reduced premiums or of cash. The basis of the Crown's case seems to me to fail, apart from the fact that I agree that the present case is absolutely ruled by the case of New York Life Insurance Company v. Styles (5 The Times L.R., 621; 14 App. Cas., 381).

CONSTANTINESCO v. THE KING.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Award by Royal Commission — Government user of patented invention — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40).

The House held that income-tax was payable on sums awarded by the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors, it appearing that the sums in question were in fact the aggregate of royalties for Government user of a patented invention and not a capitalized sum in lieu of royalties.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 685) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 685) affirming a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (42 The Times L.R., 383).

The substantial questions raised by the appeal were, (1) whether an award by the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors in respect of the user by the Crown of the patented invention of the appellant was subject to income-tax; and (2) whether an award by the Commission, sitting conjointly with the Commission for the Adjustment of Foreign Claims appointed by the War Department of the United States of America, in respect of the communication to and user by the United States Government of the appellant's invention was subject to income-tax. It was admitted that there was no material distinction between the two questions.

There was also a subsidiary question, whether, assuming that income-tax was payable, it was rightly deducted at the source under Rule 21 (1) of the General Rules applicable to all schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

The appellant, Mr. George Constantinesco, of Carmen Sylva, Beechwood-Avenue, Weybridge, was the inventor of synchronizing gears for the firing of machine-guns carried by aeroplanes, whereby the discharges from the machine-guns were made to synchronize with the intervals between the blades of the propellers. The invention was extensively used by the British and American forces in the war. On October 5, 1916, W. H. Dorman and Co., Limited, were given an exclusive licence to manufacture and sell machines made according to the appellant's invention, the licence reserving a royalty of £10 per gear to the appellant and his co-owner, Mr. Walter Haddon. A number of those gears were sold by the licensees to the Government on those terms.

In March, 1918, the Minister of Munitions informed the appellant and Messrs. Dorman that in future the Government intended to manufacture the appellant's invention by itself or its agents, and that it would employ Messrs. Dorman in future to manufacture directly for it. From March 8, 1918, to July 31, 1919, the number of gears manufactured for the Minister of Munitions by Messrs. Dorman and others was 27,857, and for those gears no royalty was paid to the appellant.

On March 19, 1919, the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors was appointed by the Royal Warrant. The Royal Warrant provided, under clause 1, for awards by way of royalty or gross sum to claimants whose patents had been used by the Crown under the powers contained in section 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907. It provided that the Commissioners should not actually award a sum exceeding £50,000, together with any allowance for outlay and expenses in connexion with the invention, but that the Commissioners might make a recommendation of a further sum to be paid if they thought fit. The Royal Warrant further provided in clause 3 for the award of remuneration to inventors whose claims were not based on strict legal rights.

On December 16, 1919, the appellant and his co-owner, Mr. Walter Haddon, made a claim to that Commission for an award in respect of the use of the invention, and a counter-statement was filed by the Air Ministry to the effect that the Commission would not be bound by the strict terms of section 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, but would consider the claim broadly, having regard to inventive merit and to all the circumstances of the case. Upon that understanding an award of £50,000 and a recommendation to pay a further sum of £20,000 were made on December 6, 1922. That award and recommendation were accepted by the Treasury.

On December 20, 1922, the Air Ministry sent to the appellant and Mr. Walter Haddon a cheque for £52,500, with a statement that £17,500 had been deducted as income-tax.

In the course of the war 6,827 gears, made according to the appellant's invention and under his British and American patents, were manufactured for the United States Government, and an agreement was entered into on January 11, 1923, between the appellant, Mr. Walter Haddon, the President of H.M. Air Council, on behalf of his Majesty, and the Assistant Secretary of the War Department, U.S.A., by which it was agreed that the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors, conjointly with the Commission for the Adjustment of Foreign Claims appointed by the United States War Department, should determine the amount to be paid by the United States Government in respect of the use of the invention.

* Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

According to that agreement, the appellant and Mr. Walter Haddon claimed for the use of the invention by the United States Government. That claim was heard by the Joint Commission in March, 1923, and an award of £15,000 was made.

At a later date the sum of £11,250 and no more was sent to the appellant and Mr. Walter Haddon by H.M. Government. The sum of £3,750, being the amount unpaid, was equal to the amount of income-tax on £15,000 at 5s. in the pound.

The income-tax deducted in respect of the appellant's share under those awards amounted to £10,875, and in July, 1924, the appellant presented a petition of right to recover that amount.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt dismissed the petition, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Carrol Romer appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the appellant in this case is part owner of a patented invention of great utility, which consists of a control gear enabling a machine-gun to be fired through the propeller of an aeroplane without destroying the blades. During the War the Ministry of Munitions, under the powers which had been conferred upon the Government by the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, used this invention for war purposes. The terms upon which they were to use it were not settled at the time but were, under the provisions of section 29 of the Act, to be determined in default of agreement by the Treasury. At the end of the war the Treasury found that they had many claims of this kind to dispose of; and accordingly a Commission was set up which was called the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors, and that Commission was authorized to inquire into claims, both by patentees and by certain other persons, and to make an award in favour of any claimant up to £50,000 and to recommend in special cases the payment of a sum in excess of that amount. The appellant and his partner put in their claim before the Commission stating the period during which this invention had been used by the Crown, and the number of gears or appliances falling under the patent which had been made for the Crown, and they claimed a sum equal to £10 per gear, being, as they said, the rate of royalty reserved by the licence previously granted to certain manufacturers. The Commission awarded to the appellant and his partner a sum of £50,000 and recommended the payment of a further sum of £20,000. The Crown paid to the appellant and his partner those sums, amounting to £70,000, less a deduction of income-tax on the amount, and the question is whether that tax was rightly deducted. There was a further award in respect of the use of the invention by the United States, but the question arising upon that award is the same, and I need not further refer to it.

My Lords, three points are raised on behalf of the appellant. First, it is said that the sum of £70,000 was not annual profits or gains within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1918, but was a payment of a capital sum. I cannot agree with that contention. The payment was made in respect of the use of the invention over a period of time. The claim put in was a claim as for royalty in respect of the successive uses of the invention. In the case of patented inventions it was the practice of the Commission, as appears from their report which has been cited on behalf of the appellant, to take as a basis of their award a fair royalty as between a willing licensor and a willing licensee, and I have little doubt that that basis was accepted in the present case subject, no doubt, to certain deductions. Lastly, the patent itself, that is, the corpus of the patent, was not taken away from the appellant and his partner but still remains in them. In view of all the facts I am satisfied that the sum awarded is to be treated as profits or gains, and annual profits or gains, within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

Secondly, it is said that, assuming that tax was payable on the amount, it was not right to deduct the tax under Rule 21 of the General Rules applicable to all the schedules of the Act, because it was not a royalty or other sum payable for the use of a patented invention. But again I do not agree. It is true that the validity of the patent was not originally admitted by the Crown; but no evidence was led for the purpose of attacking it, and we were told at the bar that the Royal Commission held it to be a good patent. I think, therefore, that the money was paid for the use of a patented invention.

Thirdly, it is said that Rule 21, which gives the power to deduct, only applies to a subject of the Crown and not to the Crown itself, and that the duty of the Crown was to pay the amount of the award in full and then to assess the appellant to income-tax in respect of the amount. My Lords, I am bound to say that in my view that point is not open to the appellant in this appeal. The point was not taken in the correspondence before the petition of right, and indeed there are expressions in the correspondence which go to show that the only point taken on behalf of the appellant was that no tax was payable on the amount of the award, and he nowhere claimed that the tax, if payable, was not deductible. Again, the point was not taken in the petition of right which received the fiat of the Attorney-General. The point taken in that petition of right was that the £70,000 was a capital sum and not an annual payment or annual profits and gains, and that income-tax was not payable in respect of it. That point was plainly taken, but nowhere was it suggested in the petition of right that the tax, if payable, was not deductible. When the Attorney-General in his answer to the petition referred to Rule 21 of the General Rules, the appellant allowed issue to be joined upon the facts without even then raising the point that Rule 21 did not apply to the Crown. A passage has been read from the shorthand notes with a view to showing that the point was raised before Mr. Justice Rowlatt. Having heard that passage read, I do not think that it raised with any clarity the contention which is now put forward, and accordingly Mr. Justice Rowlatt in no way dealt with the point. There is, indeed, in the judgment of the learned Master of the Rolls upon the appeal a passage referring to Rule 21; but, so far as I can follow that passage, it appears to show that the contention now put forward was not raised or, at all events, not plainly raised before the Court of Appeal. It was raised, and in my view raised for the first time, in the appellant's case on this appeal. In these circumstances, it appears to me that the point is taken too late and that the appellant, who might have raised it earlier and obtained the decisions of the two Courts below upon the point, ought not to be allowed to raise it now. If your Lordships were disposed to allow any latitude in this respect—as in some cases has been done—I doubt whether you would be willing to do so in the present case, because the effect of the point now raised, if it were successful, would be that the amount in dispute must be paid to the appellant and that, as the time for assessment has gone by, the Crown would have no remedy open to it by which to recover income-tax, which in my view was plainly payable. Accordingly, I think it best to express no opinion upon the construction of Rule 21, but to say simply that this point is raised too late and, therefore, cannot be effective.

My Lords, for these reasons I think that this appeal fails and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed with costs.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords, I concur. I think, on the real merits of the case, the case was scarcely arguable. This was a patent which remains this man's property. He, in the old days, got royalties for it, and those were the profits of his property, and to say that the payments which the Crown makes for the same user as private persons had before lose their character as income and suddenly become capital is, I think, as all the Courts have understood the case, one of the most hopeless contentions that I have ever heard urged at your Lordships' bar.

As regards the other point, I hesitate to give opinions upon mere procedure points of English practice, but I do think it would be very unfortunate in a case like this if we were bound to consider now for the first time a point that was studiously—I do not mean intentionally—kept in the background by not being mentioned. There is not a trace of the point in the judgment of either Mr. Justice Rowlatt or the Court of Appeal.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords, I concur. It appears to me clear that the sum which this man was to receive for the use of his patent is not a capital sum but is a yearly sum.

With regard to the second point, I think it is a point of importance, and that makes it all the more necessary that it should be distinctly raised so as to give the opponent clear notice of the things which he was intended to meet, and that we should have the advantage of having it dealt with by the different Judges in the Courts below. In this case I do not think it was raised, whether by omission or for some other cause, and for that reason I think, according to the wise and prudent practice, it should not be held to be open, and it is not open.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords, I concur entirely in the opinion delivered from the Woolsack.

Lord Carson.—My Lords, upon the first and main point which has been argued I am of opinion that the sums of £50,000 and £15,000 awarded to the plaintiff are to be treated as income arising from the user of the plaintiff's patent by the Crown.

I desire, however, to say that, speaking for myself, I think the point as to whether Rule 21 entitled the Crown without assessment to deduct the income-tax payable was sufficiently raised by the pleadings. The appellant sued upon the award, and the respondents justify the deduction under Rule 21 as entitling them to make such deduction, and upon that issue was joined, which was, I think, the usual course of pleading. However, as your Lordships are of opinion that the point is not open to the appellant, having regard to the state of the pleadings and the absence of argument before Mr. Justice Rowlatt and the Court of Appeal, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question whether the right of deduction imposed by Rule 21 applies to the Crown.

IN RE WHITE.*

Administration — Grant—Minority interest—No grant to less than two individuals—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), ss. 160 (1), 162 (1).

Under ss. 160 (1) and 162 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, the Court cannot make a grant of administration to less than two individuals when it is aware that there is a minority interest.

This was an appeal by Mrs. Doris White, widow of the late Mr. James White, from a decision of Mr. Justice Hill refusing to appoint her sole administratrix of her late husband's estate.

Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., and Mr. H. D. Grazebrook appeared for the appellant; Mr. Talbot-Ponsonby for the Westminster Bank, Limited, the largest creditor of the estate; and Mr. Sims for the receiver of the estate, who was appointed by Mr. Justice Eve on June 30.

Mr. Cotes-Preedy said that Mr. White had died intestate. The estate consisted of Foxhill with farms in the district, valued at £75,000, and certain furniture worth £3,000. The debts were very large, but the total amount was not yet ascertained. It would probably run into hundreds of thousands of pounds. It was believed that the estate was hopelessly insolvent, and that there would be nothing for the unsecured creditors. There would, of course, be nothing for the widow or the two young children.

A receiver of the estate had been appointed in the Chancery Division, but it was important that the appellant should be appointed administratrix in order to deal with certain urgent matters. There were eight racehorses belonging to the deceased man in training, and each horse was costing £5 a week. Moreover, the death of Mr. White made all the racing entries in respect of the horses void, so that it was important to sell the horses as quickly as possible to enable the purchasers to enter them afresh. For that purpose it was absolutely essential to get somebody who could make a valid title. No one was willing to join with Mrs. White in the administration, so she asked to be appointed alone, and therein lay the difficulty.

The horses were not in the possession of the receiver of the estate; they were at training stables, and the trainer would probably not allow them to leave his stables until his lien for sums owing for their keep had been satisfied. Counsel representing the largest creditor and the receiver were willing that the appellant should be appointed. Formerly, these appointments were made under section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, which gave the Court an almost unfettered discretion. That section had now been replaced by section 160 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which provided :—

"(1) Probate or administration shall not be granted to more than four persons in respect of the same property, and administration shall, if there is a minority, or if a life interest arises under the will or intestacy, be granted either to a trust corporation, with or without an individual, or to not less than two individuals. . . ."

That section must, however, be read with section 162, which gave the Court a discretion as to the persons to whom administration was to be granted. Section 162 provided :—

"(1) In granting administration the High Court shall have regard to the rights of all persons interested in the estate of the deceased person, or the proceeds of sale thereof . . . and any such administration may be limited in any way the Court thinks fit.

"Provided that where the deceased died wholly intestate as to his estate administration shall—(a) unless by reason of the insolvency of the estate or other special circumstances the Court thinks it expedient to grant administration to some other person, be granted to some one or more of the persons interested in the residuary estate of the deceased, if they make an application for the purpose. . . ."

Under that proviso the Court could, by reason of the insolvency of the estate, grant letters of administration to Mrs. White. She would be a suitable "other person." Counsel cited In re Herbert, Deceased (42 The Times L.R., 469 ; [1926] P., 109).

Mr. Sims, for the receiver, supported the arguments of Mr. Cotes-Preedy.

The Master of the Rolls said that the appeal must be dismissed. His Lordship, having read section 160 of the Act of 1925, said that it was clear that when the Court actually knew, as in the present case, that there was a minority interest it could not make a grant to less than two individuals.

Mr. Cotes-Preedy had relied upon the proviso to section 162 (1) as giving the Court a discretion, but the grant there referred to was to be to one or more of the persons interested, or, alternatively, if the Court thought expedient, to "some other person." The widow of Mr. White was clearly a person interested, so that the grant to some other person was not fulfilled by a grant to her. It was argued that section 162 (1) must be read with section 160 (1) and that the combined effect of the two sections was that "some other person" meant, generally, that the Court had a discretion to grant to one person.

It was said that section 162 was meant to replace the very wide discretion given to the Court by section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, but section 73 had not come after a preceding section which gave the very explicit directions contained in section 160. The latter was a new section and was important because of the interest taken by a widow in an intestate husband's estate under the Law of Property Act, 1925. It was a section inserted to protect the interests of minors or tenants for life. It did not seem right to say that section 162, because it replaced section 73 of the earlier Act, practically did away with the restrictions contained in section 160. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

As regarded the matter of the racehorses, an order had been made by Mr. Justice Eve for their sale. The trainer must obey the order, but his right of lien for expenses incurred in keeping them, if he had one, would be protected.

Lord Justice Scrutton said that he agreed. Section 160 (1) provided in emphatic terms that where there was the interest of a minor to be considered administration should only be granted to not less than two persons. As to section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, in In the Goods of Samuel Smith (deceased) (27 L.J., P. and M., 105) the headnote stated : "The Court has no power under section 73 of 20 and 21 Vict., c. 77, to grant general administration to a person who before that Act would only have been entitled to a grant of administration during the minority of an infant, that section not conferring power to substitute one kind of administration for another, but merely to substitute another person as administrator in the place of the person who would by law be entitled to administration." It might be as well if on another application like the present counsel were to study that case. It was agreed that section 160 must be read with section 162, but to him (Lord Justice Scrutton) the meaning of section 162 (1) seemed to be that if "one or more of the persons interested in the residuary estate" applied, then the Court must turn back to section 160 (1) and say, "If there is a minority concerned we must make a grant to two or more." Then if the Court were to grant to "some other person," and if the applicant, by reason of the estate being insolvent, not being beneficially interested in the residue, were an "other person," did that exclude the terms of section 160 (1), or must two persons still be appointed ? If the decision of the President in In re Herbert (42 The Times L.R., 469 ; [1926] P., 109) were to the effect that one person was enough, then he (Lord Justice Scrutton) was not satisfied that that decision was correct. Mr. Justice Hill in the present case had taken the correct view, and the fact that all the counsel appearing agreed that the law should not be enforced did not help the Court to ignore the plain terms of the Act.

Lord Justice Sargant said that section 160 (1) contained a very definite prohibition of a grant to less than two persons in this case. To him it seemed that the widow was a "person interested" within the meaning of section 162 (1), and so it was impossible to treat her as "some other person." As to the decision of the President in In re Herbert (42 The Times L.R., 469 ; [1926] P., 109), he (Lord Justice Sargant) desired to reserve his opinion as to whether administration could in the circumstances be granted to a single creditor, the point not really arising in the present case.

By s. 22 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, re-enacted by s. 4 (2) of the Workmen's

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Compensation Act, 1925, "a person shall not be deemed to be a partial dependant of another person unless he was dependent partially on contributions from that other person for the provision of the ordinary necessaries of life suitable for persons in his class and position."

Held, that the words "ordinary necessaries of life" in this enactment do not include the provision of savings for the future.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (20 B.W.C.C., 174) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Atkin, and Lord Justice Lawrence (20 B.W.C.C., 174), reversing an award of the county court Judge of Glamorgan made under the Workmen's Compensation Acts in favour of the employers.

The question raised by the appeal was whether the county court Judge was entitled to find upon the evidence before him that the respondents, the father and mother of a workman who was killed by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, were not partially dependent upon the earnings of the workman at the time of his death and were thus disentitled to compensation in respect thereof; and whether the county court Judge misdirected himself as to the effect of section 22 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923 (now re-enacted by section 4 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925).

Section 4 (2) of the Act of 1925 provides:—

"A person shall not be deemed to be a partial dependant of another person unless he was dependent partially on contributions from that other person for the provision of the ordinary necessaries of life suitable for persons in his class and position."

The facts sufficiently appear from the opinion of Lord Dunedin.

Mr. E. W. Cave, K.C., and Mr. J. Victor Evans appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. A. T. James for the respondents.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords: This is a case under the Workmen's Compensation Acts in which a father and mother claim as dependants of a deceased son who met his death by accident arising in the course of and out of his employment. The facts as set out by the county court Judge are simple enough. The deceased was a young coal miner 20 years of age whose weekly average earnings were £1 13s. 1d. He lived in family with his father and mother and another brother. The father's weekly earnings were £4 4s. 9d. and those of the other brother £3 17s. 9d. The deceased handed all his wages to his mother, who kept him and gave him 5s. pocket money. They were a thrifty family and the father had saved £500.

In the circumstances the county court Judge held that there was no dependency proved and he appended to his judgment the following note:—

"In this case the note of the evidence is very meagre because it was impossible to get definite answers from the deceased's father and mother. The conclusion I came to was that the parents, who were very thrifty people, had always saved money, that they saved all the money obtained from each son except what was necessary to keep the son in food, clothes and pocket money, and that under the circumstances the parents could not be said to be in any way dependent upon the contributions from the deceased son for the provision of the ordinary necessaries of life suitable for persons in their class and position."

The learned Judges of the Court of Appeal set aside the award and remitted the case for a rehearing.

The reasons which they gave for this course were that they thought that the arbitrator had, or at least might have, misdirected himself, in so far as he had not, or might not, have considered whether a certain part of the total family income retained as savings was also one of the necessaries of life; and whether, if that sum was included, the applicants were dependent on the contribution of the deceased. They particularly referred to the opinions given by themselves in the cases of Kennedy v. Horden Collieries Company ([1925] 2 K.B., 438) and Peart v. Bolckow, Vaughan and Co. ([1925] 1 K.B., 399).

My Lords, very recently your Lordships gave judgment in the case of Fife Coal Company v. McArthur (19 B.W.C.C., 461), which had to do with this same question of dependency. That case was decided on December 3, 1926, and the present case was decided by the Court of Appeal on December 2, 1926; so that neither could the Court of Appeal know of your Lordships' judgment, nor were your Lordships aware of this case. I am bound to say that I do not think the opinion of the learned Judges in the Court of Appeal can be reconciled with the opinions pronounced by your Lordships. The actual decision of the case of McArthur (supra) turned on the effect of an admission, but your Lordships of set purpose examined section 22 of the Act of 1923 (with which section 4 (2) of the Act of 1925 is identical) as opinions thereupon had been pronounced in the Courts below which were considered erroneous.

My Lords, I refer to the opinion I delivered in that case, which, so far as the construction of the section is concerned, was concurred in by all the noble Lords present. But in order to avoid any misunderstanding I will deal with what I may call the critical stages of the development of the question.

I begin with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Simmons v. White Brothers (15 The Times L.R., 263; [1899] 1 Q.B., 1005). The head-note of that case, which is accurate, states as follows:—

"Held, that in order to bring himself within the Act as a dependant, an applicant for compensation must show that he was to some extent dependent upon the earnings of the deceased workman for the ordinary necessaries of life, having regard to his class and position in life; it is insufficient that he merely derived pecuniary benefit from such earnings."

Now it will be observed that there are two separate propositions involved in this judgment. The first is that "dependent upon the earnings" means "dependent for the purposes of the ordinary necessaries of life." The Act there in question, the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, only used, in section 7 (2), the phrase "dependent upon the earnings," and therefore "for the purposes of the ordinary necessaries of life" was judicial interpretation. The second is that in order to find what are the necessaries of life you must take the average, and that average is to be sought among those who are in the same class and position of life as the applicant.

Now, when that case was displaced by the case of Main Colliery Company v. Davies (16 The Times L.R., 460; [1900] A.C., 358), the discussion turned, so far as I can see, much more on the second proposition than the first. Lord Shand, in his opinion, though agreeing as to the dislodgment of the second proposition, expressly saved the first. Lord Halsbury did not expressly disagree with the first proposition, though doubtless there are expressions in his opinion which seem to point that way, and which most certainly were afterwards held by the Court of Appeal to have pointed that way. I think, however, that it is quite unnecessary to discuss whether Lord Halsbury's opinion was pressed beyond what it meant, because now it is no question of what Lord Halsbury did or did not say ; the question is what the section of the Act of Parliament means ; and the section introduces the express words "dependent partially on contributions from that other person for the provision of the ordinary necessaries of life suitable for persons in his class and position."

Before I actually go to the section itself, I will deal with the cases on which the Court of Appeal relied, viz., Peart v. Bolckow, Vaughan and Co. (supra), and Kennedy v. Horden Collieries Company (supra). I say at once that, so far as the results of these cases are concerned, I think they were quite rightly decided.

In Peart v. Bolckow, Vaughan and Co. (supra) the facts were that the father earned £3 11s. 0d. a week, plus free house and coals. One boy earned £1 0s. 6d., and the deceased 15s. 3d. ; the mother and a younger son earned nothing. The county court Judge had found as a fact that the deceased made a contribution to the necessaries of life of the family, and the Court of Appeal upheld that finding. The real argument before them against the judgment of the county court Judge rested on the calculation that, if you took the whole money as representing the family purse, then the amount per capita available for maintenance was greater after the accident than before. That mere calculation they held could not be conclusive.

But in their comments upon the statutory clauses the learned Judges all agreed that the effect of the statute was to restore the law of Simmons v. White Brothers (supra). Lord Justice Warrington expressly reserved the question that might arise when he said (p. 414), "he [the county court Judge] arrived at the conclusion that the sum of 15s. 3d. which the boy contributed to the joint expenses of the household exceeded that which was necessary for his own personal maintenance, and there was, therefore, a contribution to what the learned Judge calls the 'family purse' ; that, however, may not be enough, because the amount of the family purse might, in certain cases, be so great that the small contribution which the boy makes to it could not be said to be a contribution for the provision of the ordinary necessaries of life, but that is not the case here."

There is, however, a sentence in the judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton which, with deference to that learned Judge, has, I think, had somewhat disastrous consequences. He said (p. 417) : "Now in my view the proper direction for a county court Judge is that he has to consider whether at the time of the death the alleged dependant was receiving a net balance of advantage from the deceased's contribution, that is to say, in the case of a father and son, whether after defraying the expense of maintaining the son the father had a balance of the contribution available for the provision of ordinary necessaries of life for himself and the rest of the family." This use of the words "available for" as a substitution for the words of the statute "dependent on" is the root, I think, of much erroneous argument that has followed.

Then in Kennedy v. Horden Collieries Company (supra) again the actual judgment is most easily supported. The learned county court Judge made some very sensible remarks in regard to what might be considered the standard expenditure in certain classes. And then on the facts of the case he said this, page 444 : "We get a sum of £4 15s. 0d. for four of them, which works out at £1 3s. 9d. per head. Was this more than was required to supply the family with the ordinary necessaries of life suitable to the father's class and position, bearing in mind that they had their house and fuel free ? The mother states, in effect, that they were unable to save anything out of it." That finding duly determined the case. But then, unfortunately as I think, the learned county court Judge proceeded to make an obiter remark : "If they had, in effect, put something aside, I do not know that it ought to tell against them ; for it does not necessarily follow that because a man makes some provision for his widow in the event of his dying before her, and for his own old age, his income is therefore more than sufficient for his needs. It may, I think, fairly be argued that it is a man's duty in the present day to make, if he can, such reasonable provision for the future as will ensure that neither he nor his widow will become a burden on others or on the public, and therefore that such reasonable provision ought to come under the head of 'necessaries.'"

This pronouncement is curiously out of line with the statement which he had previously made that "necessaries" should be construed as that word had been construed in connexion with the contracts of infants ; but this remark found favour with the Court of Appeal in this case, and their judgment, if analysed, comes to this, that they have set aside the award and remitted the case to the county court Judge in order that he might make an allowance for saving, and then see how the figures stand.

In Kennedy's case (supra) there was no such question involved. Lord Justice Atkin seems to have scented trouble ahead, but saw, as he was well entitled to do, no difficulty in the case in hand. For he says that the county court Judge had found in fact that the whole of the family income was spent on necessaries and that a balance of the deceased's income formed part of income expended.

Now going to the section itself, I confess I think the matter could not have been more clearly expressed. You are to find out what such a family budget, fitting the class and position, would naturally be. I agree that their actual expenditure is a prima facie guide. And I agree that there is no meticulous distinction between an absolute necessary and an article of comfort or a luxury. You are not to say that bread and butter is a necessary, but that if jam is added it is a luxury. But still, you are to take the necessaries of life. The expression is a common, well-understood expression. It indicates food, clothing, and shelter and the necessary concomitants thereto. But to extend it to such a thing as saving, or what is the same thing, insurance, is, in my opinion, to do utter violence to the expression. And though the learned Master of the Rolls says that he does not wish to say anything that would discourage thrift, I am afraid that I must reply that it is not allowable to encourage thrift by wresting a word used in a statute from its ordinary and natural meaning. If the true view was that any balance which came after a man's keep was "available" for necessaries, and that that was enough, why should there be any question of necessaries at all ? All money that anyone gets is available for necessaries just as it is available for anything else.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was wrong. I think the learned county court Judge determined on the facts that here the family had enough for the necessaries of life without any contribution—if indeed there was a balance—from the deceased, and that the remit if carried out would have directed him to consider items of expenditure which he had no business to consider.

I may, just in passing, take notice of one suggestion made by Mr. Montgomery for the respondents. He suggested that a judgment against him would mean that when there was a capital sum invested which represented savings, then so long as that capital sum was unexhausted there could be no contribution. I do not look on that as a commonsense suggestion. What is to be looked at is the family income, and income does not represent the touching of capital.

I move that the appeal be allowed and the decision of the county court Judge restored; the respondents to pay the costs in this House and in the Courts below.

The LORD CHANCELLOR and LORD PHILLIMORE have authorized me to say that they concur in this opinion.

LORD ATKINSON concurred.

LORD CARSON.—My Lords: In the case of Fife Coal Company v. McArthur (19 B.W.C.C., 461), which was recently heard by the House of Lords and in which I myself took part, the construction of section 4 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, was very carefully considered, and the authorities were examined in an exhaustive judgment delivered by my noble and learned friend Lord Dunedin, in which the noble and learned Lords who heard the case concurred. The section enacts as follows:—"A person shall not be deemed to be a partial dependant of another person unless he was dependent partially on contributions from that other person for the provision of the ordinary necessaries of life suitable for persons in his class and position." In the case referred to my noble friend quoted with approval a passage from the work of the late Judge Adshead Elliott on compensation, which explains the scope of the section in question, and which runs as follows:—"Since the passing of the 1923 Act it would seem that in order to establish partial dependency, the applicant must not only show that he has sustained pecuniary loss by reason of the death of the deceased workman, but must go farther and show that he relied partially on some or all of the amount which he has so lost in order to provide himself with the ordinary necessaries of life suitable to his class and position." In the present case the learned and experienced county court Judge held that no dependency was proved, and, as far as I can understand the facts proved, he had ample evidence for coming to that conclusion, and the question being one of fact this House ought not to interfere unless for sufficient reason. It is true that from the note of the learned county court Judge he seems to have drawn an inference that the parents of the deceased workman derived pecuniary assistance from the contributions of the deceased over and above what was necessary to keep the son in food, clothes, and pocket-money, but assuming that such inference was correct, that was not sufficient, having regard to the terms of the section and the decision of this House already referred to, to prove that some or all of the amount so lost was relied upon to secure the ordinary necessaries of life suitable to their class or position. I am unable to follow the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal in finding reasons for remitting the case to the county court Judge on the hypothetical ground that the latter may have misdirected himself in holding that the respondents were not dependants because some of the money contributed may have been saved.

My Lords, I think the words of the section are clear and well understood, and I can find no sufficient grounds for construing the words "ordinary necessaries of life" as including pecuniary advantage which was applied not for the maintenance of the family but for such purposes as the parents might desire to apply it. My Lords, with great respect for the Master of the Rolls, I do not think we gain any assistance by considering questions either of the prevention or of the encouragement of thrift, which are more appropriate for the Legislature than for an appellate Court.

My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be allowed, and the decision of the county court Judge restored, and that the costs should be paid as proposed.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) 1927. July 4.

MACKENZIE-KENNEDY v. AIR COUNCIL.*

Crown—Department of State—Air Council—Action of tort against—Whether competent—Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917 (7 and 8 Geo. V., c. 51), ss. 8, 9, 10.

No action of tort will lie against the Air Council for acts done in its capacity as such.

This was an appeal by the Air Council from a judgment of Mr. Justice Fraser, delivered in Chambers.

The plaintiff, Mr. Chessborough James Henry Mackenzie-Kennedy, by his statement of claim, said that he was a consulting engineer, a designer of aeroplanes and other aircraft, and the inventor of certain novelties in relation thereto; that he had constructed for and supplied to the defendants an aeroplane according to his invention; and that in February, 1920, he had received from the defendants £31,000 in respect of the work and labour done, materials supplied, and money expended by him in the construction of that aeroplane.

Paragraphs (6) and (7) were in the following terms:—

"(6) The defendants, wrongfully or fraudulently, secretly converted to their own use and benefit and deprived the plaintiff of his property in his said invention or inventions and in the said reports, specifications, designs, plans, drawings, prints, and other documents relating thereto and to the said aeroplane and to the said other aeroplanes, and the information derived from their said inspections of the said aeroplane . . . , whereby the plaintiff has suffered damage.

"The defendants also detained from the plaintiff the said reports, specifications, designs, plans, drawings, prints, and other documents and still so detain them, whereby the plaintiff has suffered damage.

"(7) The defendants, for the purposes complained of in paragraph (6) hereof, conspired with and/or through one Frederick Handley Page and/or Handley

* Reported by E. J. M. CHAPLIN and T. W. MORGAN, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Page, Limited, and/or others whereby the plaintiff has suffered damage."

An application was made by the defendants for an order that the statement of claim be struck out and the action dismissed or stayed. Master Bonner granted the application. The plaintiff appealed, and Mr. Justice Fraser allowed the appeal. He said that, in the exercise of his discretion, he did not think that the application was one which should be granted or that the action should be dismissed in a summary way.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. H. M. Giveen (the Attorney-General, Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C., with him) appeared for the appellants ; the respondent appeared in person.

Lord Justice Bankes, in the course of his judgment, said :—The plaintiff began an action in the King's Bench Division to which he made the Air Council defendants. The exact nature of his claim is set out in paragraphs (6) and (7) of the statement of claim. It is plain that the action is one founded on tort. In support of his claim the plaintiff delivered particulars of matters going back in date as far as July, 1909. An application was made in Chambers to strike out the statement of claim, or to dismiss or stay the action on the grounds, (1) that the action was frivolous and vexatious, and an abuse of the process of the Court, (2) that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action, and (3) that the matter was res judicata. In support of the last ground the judgment of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence, as he then was, in Rowland and Mackenzie-Kennedy v. Air Council (41 The Times L.R., 545), was relied on. This judgment was recently affirmed in this Court (43 The Times L.R., 717), but those portions of the judgment which are relevant to the present contention were not gone into, as it became unnecessary to do so. For this reason I do not propose to deal with this question of res judicata, as it would involve a long investigation of a mass of detail. I am not suggesting any doubt as to the correctness of the learned Judge's conclusions, but as no decision was come to upon them, I prefer to rest my judgment on other grounds. With regard to the first ground, I will only say that, inasmuch as the Air Council only came into existence in the month of January, 1918, it is manifest that, to a very large extent, the plaintiff's claim must be frivolous and vexatious.

I rest my judgment, however, upon the second ground of objection, and for the following reasons. The action is plainly one of tort, and is founded upon acts and matters which are alleged to have been done by the Air Council in its capacity as Air Council. That Council is a statutory creation, and was established by the Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917.

The Lord Justice then read sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Act and an Order in Council of December 21, 1917, made under section 8, and continued : —

It is clear from this outline of the constitution of the Air Council that it is a department of State, and that the acts and matters of which the plaintiff complains in this action, if done at all by members of the Air Council, or by their orders, were acts and matters done by virtue of their statutory position as members of the Council.

In these circumstances it is, I consider, clear that no action for tort can lie against the statutory body which has been set up under the name of the Air Council.

There are many cases in the books in which the law has been laid down and applied. I will only refer to a few of them. In Raleigh v. Goschen (14 The Times L.R., 36 ; [1898] 1 Ch., 73) an attempt was made to make the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the Director-General of Naval Works responsible for a trespass to land by making the Commissioners and the Director-General defendants to the action. At page 77 Mr. Justice Romer lays down the rule of law in these terms :—

"I will state some general principles of law which I conceive govern this class of cases. . . . It appears to me that if any person commits a trespass (I use that word advisedly as meaning a wrongful act, or one not justifiable), he cannot escape liability for the offence, he cannot prevent himself being sued, merely because he acted in obedience to the order of the executive Government or of any officer of State ; and it further appears to me, as at present advised, that if the trespass had been committed by some subordinate officer of a Government Department or of the Crown, by the order of a superior official, that superior official—even if he were the head of the Government Department in which the subordinate official was employed, or whatever his official position —could be sued ; but in such a case the superior official could be sued, not because of, but despite of, the fact that he was an officer of State. I think it is clear that the head of a Government Department is not liable for the neglect or torts of officials in the department, unless it can be shown that the act complained of was substantially the act of the head himself, in which case he would be liable as an individual, just as a stranger committing the same act would be."

In the action of Gilbert and Another v. Corporation of Trinity House (2 The Times L.R., 708 ; 17 Q.B.D., 795), in which the corporation unsuccessfully contended that they were acting as servants of the Crown, both Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Wills made observations on the law which seem pertinent to the present case. At page 801 Mr. Justice Day says :—

"All the great officers of State are, if I may say so, emanations from the Crown. They are delegations by the Crown of its own authority to particular individuals."

This is true of the members of the Air Council, though it was not the case with the Trinity House. At page 803 Mr. Justice Wills expresses a view which applies to the respondent's frequently repeated statement that he is suing the Air Council qua Air Council, and not as representing the Crown. The Judge says :—

"I am clear that at common law there is no instance of any person or body having two distinct capacities —in one of which there is no liability to be sued because the person or body is the direct representative of the Crown, and in the other there is a liability to be sued because the capacity is that of a private corporation or a person."

In the absence of distinct statutory authority enabling an action for tort to be brought against the Air Council, I am of opinion, both on principle and on authority, that no such action is maintainable. The Air Council is not a corporation, and even if it were to be treated as one the respondent's position would not be improved. The most recent case on this point, apart from one which I decided myself, Public Works Commissioners v. Pontypridd Masonic Hall Company, Limited (36 The Times L.R., 459 ; [1920] 2 K.B., 233), is Roper v. Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings ([1915] 1 K.B., 45), where Mr. Justice Shearman refers to an Irish decision, Wheeler v. Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland

"Now, if a corporation be constituted for the sole purpose of doing acts for the Crown, it is, prima facie, outside its powers to do anything except for the Crown, and as in law a wrongful act cannot be done for the Crown, such a corporation is not capable of doing such wrongful act in its corporate capacity. In such a case, therefore, the wrongful act cannot be deemed that of the corporation, but must be deemed the personal act of those who committed it."

The respondent not unnaturally relies, in support of his contention that he had statutory authority for maintaining the action, upon the provision in section 10 of the Act of 1917 that the Air Council may sue and be sued and may for all purposes be described by that name.

Instances might be given in which this provision would confer a right of action against the Air Council, but it is unnecessary to consider them, as for present purposes it is sufficient to say that I entirely agree with the view of Mr. Justice Russell in Rowland v. Air Council (39 The Times L.R., 228), that, when applied to an action of tort, the authority falls far short of what is necessary to get rid of so well known and so well established a constitutional rule of law as that which I have been discussing. On this point the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bainbridge v. Postmaster-General and Another (22 The Times L.R., 70 ; [1906] 1 K.B., 178) is instructive. In that case it was decided that the Postmaster-General is not liable in his official capacity as head of the telegraph department of the Post Office for wrongful acts done by his subordinates in carrying on the business of his department even though the provision in section 42 of the Telegraph Act, 1863, that a telegraph company was to be answerable for injuries happening through the act or default of the company or of any person in their employment by reason of the company's works, was by later legislation to be read as applying to the Postmaster-General. In my opinion, the whole of the reasoning of the Master of the Rolls in that case, both on the question whether all the officials of the Air Council who could have been responsible for the acts of which the respondent complains (if committed at all) were officers or subordinate officers of the Crown, and also on the question of the impossibility of reaching the revenue of the country by the present action, is relevant here. I consider that the action is not maintainable against the Air Council. The appeal must be allowed, but, at the request of the Air Council, without costs.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This is an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Fraser allowing an appeal against an order of Master Bonner striking out a statement of claim in an action, Mackenzie-Kennedy v. Air Council (1925. M. No. 2,796), on the grounds : (1) That the action was frivolous and vexatious ; (2) that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action against the defendants ; (3) that the matters involved were res judicatæ.

To understand the position it is necessary to state the previous litigation. Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy had been concerned with various Government departments during the war in the experimental manufacture of a very large aeroplane to carry bombs and guns. The transaction began with tenders to the Secretary of State for War in 1915 and 1916, accepted by him. This business gradually changed into experimental manufacture of an aeroplane. In the end of 1916 the New Ministries and Secretaries Act, 1916, set up an Air Board which was apparently constituted by an Order in Council of February 6, 1917, of the holders for the time being of certain offices and additional members. It was not incorporated, and whilst as a Government department the Air Board in fact carried on negotiations with Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy, no transfer of powers by Order in Council was ever made to it under section 8 of the Act of 1916, nor was its name inserted in any contracts under section 11 (5) of that Act. An Act of 1917 established an Air Council which, by Order in Council, came into existence on January 3, 1918, its constitution being fixed by an Order in Council of December 21, 1917, as consisting of eight holders, for the time being, of named offices and two additional members. It was not expressly incorporated, but section 10 (1) of the Act read : "The Air Council may sue and be sued . . . by that name." All "powers, duties, rights, liabilities, and property" of the Air Board were transferred to it. One of its first acts was to stop all further work on Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's aeroplane. He had spent a considerable sum of money on this work, and his first litigation was by a writ issued on June 25, 1919, Mackenzie-Kennedy v. Air Council (1919. K. No. 359), to claim remuneration for that work. His claim of over £40,000 was on February 7, 1920, settled by agreement for £31,000, and a receipt was given : "I hereby acknowledge that I have this day received from the Treasury Solicitor on behalf of the Air Council the sum of thirty-one thousand pounds in full discharge of all claims which I may have against the Crown or against the Air Council in respect of the matters set out in a statement of claim delivered in an action entitled Mackenzie-Kennedy v. Air Council (1919. K. No. 359) and of all other matters arising out of such action, including the costs incidental thereto." His next proceeding seems to have been a writ issued on August 12, 1921, by his trustee in bankruptcy, Mr. Rowland (1921. R. No. 2,076), to which, by an odd and unsatisfactory agreement, Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy was added as a plaintiff at a much later stage. This claim went through several versions, but in its final form, after Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy was joined in 1924, it alleged a contract with the Air Council that secrecy should be maintained in respect of all documents connected with Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's work, and a breach of such contract by communication of these documents in the latter part of 1917 and early in 1918 "to a rival contractor Handley Page, and especially communication of an invention of a gun cockpit in the tail of the aeroplane abaft the rudder." It will be noticed that anything before January 3, 1918, was done by the unincorporated Air Board, or its undisclosed members, and not by the Air Council, which only came into existence on that date. There was added a claim in relation to a patent for that tail gunpit based on a denial of the validity of the patent by the Air Council.

A preliminary attempt to stop the action was made by an application to Mr. Justice Russell to strike out the claim on the ground that it was really a claim in contract against the Crown, which could only be brought by petition of right. This succeeded before Mr. Justice Russell (39 The Times L.R., 228), but the Court of Appeal took the view that the whole facts should be ascertained (39 The Times L.R., 455), and after many vicissitudes the action came on before Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence in May, 1925, when several days were spent in investigating the facts. The learned Judge decided against the plaintiff on all points (41 The Times L.R., 545). He held : (1) That an action of contract would not lie against the Air Council contracting on behalf of the Crown ; (2) that the contract for remuneration for experimental research on which the plaintiff had recovered £31,000 in his first action contained no provision for secrecy, and that the information and reports which the Air Council had paid for became their unfettered property ; (3) that there had been in fact no communication of matter to Handley Page, who had arrived at his results by independent investigation. The patent claim was disposed of on grounds irrelevant to the present appeal.

It will be noticed that if the plaintiff had any claim against the Air Council as a statutory body in respect of tort, as distinguished from a claim against named individuals for individual tortious acts, he could have included it in this second action. The question whether Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy had any property in his reports, plans, and documents, so as to prevent the Air Council from using them, and to require delivery of them to him—a claim for conversion or detinue—could have been decided on exactly the same evidence as was used by the Judge to decide the question of contract. The question whether there was any conspiracy between the Air Council and Handley Page to use wrongfully Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy's information and documents could have been decided on the evidence given in the action on which the Judge found that there was no communication by the Air Council to Handley Page. If the findings of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence, which turned mainly on the credibility of the witnesses whom he saw, were correct, there was no claim in tort for detinue, conversion, or conspiracy.

Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy appealed against the judgment of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence by an odd arrangement by which he paid £5 for the privilege of appealing at his own expense on the terms that he should get 20 per cent. of the proceeds of the appeal. The trustee evidently did not think much of the chances of success. But, having appealed, Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy did not at first proceed with his appeal. Instead on September 9, 1925, he issued a third writ, Mackenzie-Kennedy v. Air Council (1925. M. No. 2,796). The writ claimed several matters which were dropped in the statement of claim. The claim delivered on December 16, 1925, alleges agreed confidence and secrecy in respect of the reports and drawings for his aeroplane before and after 1915, and detinue of these documents, and conversion of them to their own use, and also conspiracy with Handley Page for the purposes of such conversion.

When the summons to strike out this statement of claim first came before the Court of Appeal it was pointed out that, Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence having decided the facts necessary to deal with these questions, the plaintiff had not brought on the appeal against his decision, and this appeal was ordered to come on with the hearing of the appeal on the summons. On the hearing of the final appeal this Court took the view (43 The Times L.R., 717) that the claims in contract could all be raised only by petition of right, and not by action against the Air Council, the same view as Mr. Justice Russell, and, this being sufficient to dismiss the appeal, did not hear it any further except in regard to the patent claim, which they also dismissed.

The question now is whether the Court, in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction, should allow an action to proceed, when the plaintiff has failed in a previous action against the same party to establish any of the facts which he would need to establish in order to support his claims in tort, and has at present a final judgment of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence against him on those facts ; and when he did not raise, as he could have done in that action, any of the claims in tort which he now desires to raise, though he took nine days in failing to prove the facts necessary to support these claims. In my view the cases of Reichel v. Magrath (5 The Times L.R., 552 ; 14 App. Cas., 665), MacDougall v. Knight (6 The Times L.R., 276 ; 25 Q.B.D., 1), and Stephenson v. Garnett ([1898] 1 Q.B., 677) establish that the Court has inherent jurisdiction to strike out as frivolous or vexatious a claim or defence which has either been already decided, in previous proceedings, against the party raising it, or might have been raised in previous proceedings in which the facts necessary to raise it have been decided against the person who now desires to raise them. In the present case the facts or legal incidents necessary to raise a case of conversion of documents, or breach of secrecy with regard to them, or conspiracy with Handley Page, have all been decided against Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy by Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence in the previous action, in which he might have raised the allegations of tort which he now bases on the same alleged facts. I think the Court should prevent his doing so again by striking out the writ and claim. In any event, I should have been of opinion that all matters before January 3, 1918, must be excluded from the statement of claim, as I cannot think that any liabilities in tort of individual members of the Air Board were transferred by statute to the Air Council. Further, in view of the line of decision in Raleigh v. Goschen (14 The Times L.R., 36 ; [1898] 1 Ch., 73) that the head of a department is not liable for torts committed by his subordinates in the execution of his orders, but only for individual torts committed by himself, I have great difficulty in seeing how the Air Council can be sued for conspiracy or conversion, as distinguished from an action against any individual members of the body who themselves conspire or convert. I am disposed to think, though I do not finally decide it, that the appeal should also be dismissed on the grounds stated by Lord Justice Bankes, and in more detail by Lord Justice Atkin.

I allow this appeal, however, on the ground that as the facts necessary to support the action have been already decided by Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence against the plaintiff in an action in which the plaintiff could have raised the legal claims which he now seeks to base on those alleged facts, the Court has an inherent jurisdiction to dismiss the action as frivolous and vexatious. The appeal should be allowed, and an order made to the above effect. As this is a personal action against an alleged individual, and not against the Crown, the appeal and action should be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin.—This is an action brought by Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy against the Air Council. The indorsement on the writ appears to be consistent with the action being founded both on contract and on tort. The statement of claim, however, confines the claim to remedies for tort. The summons by the defendants seeks to strike out the statement of claim and further or alternatively have the action dismissed on the ground that it discloses no cause of action, or is frivolous and vexatious. The first ground is based on the contention that the Air Council cannot be sued for a tort ; the second on the contention that the issues sought to be raised by the plaintiff have already been determined against him by the judgment of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence (41 The Times L.R., 545) in an action brought in the Chancery Division by the plaintiff against the Air Council; and that the matters are therefore either res judicatæ or such that it is vexatious and oppressive for the plaintiff to seek to litigate them over again. On the latter point I need only say that Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy brought an appeal against the judgment of Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence to this Court and we dismissed it (43 The Times L.R., 717) upon the point taken by the defendants below and approved by the Judge, that the action was founded upon an implied contract to which the defendants never became parties. It therefore became unnecessary to consider the other points decided against the plaintiff by Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence, and we expressed no opinion upon them. In these circumstances it seems to me that we are not warranted in dismissing this action either as res judicata or as being frivolous and vexatious without a discussion of the very points which the plaintiff, by his notice of appeal, desired to review and which we decided not to consider. I therefore propose to deal in this appeal solely with the question whether the action as framed in tort will lie against the Air Council. I am of opinion that it will not. Unfortunately Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy, who appeared in person, was naturally unable to offer us much assistance on the point of law, and I come to my conclusion with some anxiety lest some matter of importance may have been overlooked.

The Air Council was constituted by the Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917, which by section 8 (3) provides that an Air Council should be established consisting of one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State and of other members to be appointed in such manner as his Majesty by Order in Council should direct. It provided by section 10 that the Air Council might sue and be sued, and might for all purposes be described by that name, and that it should have an official seal which should be judicially noticed. It further provided by section 8 (3) that on its establishment the Air Board constituted under the New Ministries and Secretaries Act, 1916, should cease to exist, and all the powers, duties, rights, liabilities, and property of that Board should be transferred to the Air Council. Incidentally it may be observed that the provisions of section 10 (3) of the Act of 1916 may by this clause be held to be applicable to the Air Council. That subsection provided that the expenses of each of the Ministries established under the Act, to an amount sanctioned by the Treasury, should be paid out of moneys provided by Parliament. The Air Force (Constitution) Act, 1917, by section 8 (4) further provides for a transfer by Order in Council to the Air Council or the President of the Air Council of property, rights, and liabilities of the Admiralty, Army Council, or Secretary of State for War. Such transfers have been made by Order in Council, the most important for the present purpose being that of April 27, 1918 (Statutory Rules and Orders of 1918, No. 538).

Can then the Air Council so constituted be sued in tort? Unless the Air Council is by its constitution created a corporation I think the answer must clearly be in the negative. If it be a corporation, the liability to be sued is, in my opinion, a more difficult problem, to which I will revert. But unless incorporated the Air Council is but a name for several important officials who have administrative duties assigned to them on behalf of the Crown. It is clearly established that no proceedings to enforce a remedy for tort will lie against the Crown, or against any servant of the Crown as representing the Crown in the proceeding, unless the Crown consents to such proceeding. The Crown itself can do no wrong, and the public revenues cannot be made liable without the Crown's consent to remedy wrongs committed by servants of the Crown. I think that this is the effect of the decision in Raleigh v. Goschen (14 The Times L.R., 36; [1898] 1 Ch., 73), where it was held that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty could not be sued in tort, though they were named individually. There they were described collectively by their official title, and Mr. Justice Romer came to the conclusion that they were sued in their official capacity. I think that perhaps it might be more accurate to distinguish between a suit against a person in his individual capacity and a suit against him in a representative capacity, for I cannot see that if one is partly suing an individual on his personal liability it makes any difference whether one describes him as an official or not. If, however, you sue him as representing some interest or assets other than his own which you seek to bind by the action, it becomes very relevant how you describe him, for it may be found that as a representative he is not liable at all. Now this is clearly true of a representative of the Crown who, as such, cannot be sued in tort. It is, of course, equally clear that individual servants of the Crown who themselves commit torts cannot escape liability by pleading the commands, express or implied, of the Crown. But sued as individuals they expose their own assets alone to liability in the event of judgment against them. Applying these considerations to this action, it appears clear that unless the Air Council is incorporated the name is but a name for the individuals that compose it. I do not think that it can be used at all as the equivalent of the names of its members in a suit which is directed against the members in their private capacity. In any event in this case I think it is plain, plainer even than in the case of Raleigh v. Goschen (supra), where at least the Lords Commissioners were individually named, that this present action is directed against the members of the Air Council in their official or, as I prefer to say, representative capacity as servants of the Crown, and therefore will not lie. If, however, the Air Council were incorporated, different considerations might apply. The Crown may and does employ as its servant or servants an individual, a joint committee or board of individuals, or a corporation. None can be made liable in a representative capacity for tort; the individuals may be made liable in their private capacity, and I see no reason why this liability should not extend to the juristic person, the corporation, as to the individual. It may be true that the corporation in such a case will have no private assets available for execution, but that may also be true of the individual. One must also face the difficulty that such a corporation will have no servants, for as in the case of individual officials those who serve under it are not its servants but servants of the Crown. It is, therefore, only for torts which are actually committed by it, or to which it is directly privy, as by giving orders for their performance, that it can be made liable. But for such a tort proved, for example, by a minute of an incorporated board expressly commanding the commission of a tort, in principle, as it appears to me, an action would lie, however unprofitable such an action would be. If the action were to be attacked at all it would have to be proved that such a futile proceeding was vexatious and oppressive. I think, therefore, that the decision in Roper v. Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings ([1915] 1 K.B., 45) could only be supported on the view that the action was against the Commissioners (who are incorporated) in a representative capacity.

The further objection that any tort would be ultra vires the corporation is of quite a different character, and must depend on the duties of the corporation and the circumstances of the particular act complained of. I do not think that the doctrine of ultra vires would be of universal application to every tort, or that it would be to the Crown's advantage that it should. The case of Bainbridge v. Postmaster-General (22 The Times L.R., 70 ; [1906] 1 K.B., 178) seems to depend entirely upon the fact that the Post Office servants, for whose negligence the Postmaster-General (a corporation) was sought to be held liable are servants not of the Postmaster-General but of the Crown.

I have therefore felt it necessary to consider whether it could be contended in this case that the Air Council was a corporation. "To create a corporation by charter or Act of Parliament it is not necessary that any particular form of words be used. It is sufficient if the intent to incorporate be evident," per Mr. Justice Littledale in Conservators of the River Tone v. Ash (10 B. and C., 349, at p. 384). The learned Judge goes on to consider whether in the case of the Conservators they have a name, a perpetual succession, and a right to sue and be sued in their corporate name. It must be admitted that most, if not all, of these characteristics of a corporation attach to the Air Council. They have a name in which they can sue and be sued, and it would appear that they are to have perpetual succession, for by the Act of 1917, section 8 (3), the property of the Air Board is to be transferred to them, and by section 8 (4) it is contemplated that the property of the Admiralty or Secretary of State for War may be transferred to them by Order in Council. I find, however, that in fact under the Order in Council the property of the Secretary of State for War and such property as the Air Council may acquire under the powers transferred to them are vested not in the Air Council but in the President. I also bear in mind that there were in existence before 1917 various Acts expressly constituting departments of State as corporations. I need only refer to the Acts incorporating for certain purposes the Secretary of State for India in Council (Government of India Act, 1858, section 65) ; the Postmaster-General (Post Office (Duties) Act, 1840, section 67), and the Commissioners of Public Works (Commissioners of Works Act, 1852, section 1). If it had been intended to incorporate the Air Council one would have expected the well-known precedents to be followed with express words of incorporation, and express definition of the purposes for which the department was incorporated.

In these circumstances I am unable as at present advised to find in the words of the Legislature the manifest intention to incorporate, which Mr. Justice Littledale, in the case cited, rightly thought essential. I should, however, deem myself free to reconsider this opinion if hereafter in a case between different parties further assistance were afforded to the Court than could be given by the respondent in the present case. In any event I am also at present inclined to the view that the Air Council, if a corporation, are being sued in a representative capacity, which, as I have said, is impossible, but as that defect could be cured by amendment, upon which we have not heard Mr. Mackenzie-Kennedy, I do not decide on that ground.

For the reasons given I am of opinion that the decision of the learned Master in this case was correct, and that the appeal from the decision of Mr. Justice Fraser should be allowed, and that the action should be dismissed.

VOSPER v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railways—Passenger's luggage—Hand luggage—Responsibility of railway company—Exception—Loss through negligence of passenger—Onus of proving such negligence.

The plaintiff, who had a third-class ticket by the defendant railway company's line, got a porter to put his suit-case in a first-class compartment and travelled in another part of the train, third class, with some friends whom he found on the train. At the end of the journey the plaintiff's suit-case could not be found. In an action against the railway company for its value,

Held, that as the railway had failed to discharge the onus of proving that the loss of the hand luggage arose by reason of the negligence of the passenger, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

This was an appeal by the defendant railway company from a decision, given on February 24, 1927, by his Honour Judge Scully, sitting at Marylebone County Court, in favour of the plaintiff, Mr. Stanley Vosper, an insurance assessor, for £51, the assessed value of a suit-case belonging to the plaintiff which was lost on a journey between Exeter and Paddington.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Barrington-Ward, K.C., and Mr. Kenelm Preedy appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Phineas Quass for the respondent.

Mr. Barrington-Ward, in opening the appeal, said that the plaintiff often spent week-ends at Exeter, using for that purpose a third-class week-end ticket. On Friday, February 26, 1926, he travelled from London to Exeter with a suit-case as his luggage. After spending the week-end there he proceeded by taxicab to St. David's Station at 9.40 on Monday morning, March 1. He gave the suit-case to a porter to be put into the cloak room, intending to return after a morning's fishing and catch the 1.45 p.m. train to Paddington. After the morning's fishing he went to the station at 1.30 p.m., where he saw the same porter, who had collected the suit-case from the cloak room.

The plaintiff's evidence was that when he was crossing the bridge he saw the porter put the suit-case into the luggage van of one of the coaches which were standing in the bay awaiting the arrival of the Plymouth express, to which they were to be attached. The Judge rejected that evidence, and found that the plaintiff had agreed with the porter that the suit-case should be put into a first-class compartment, and that that was done.

When the Plymouth express arrived, the plaintiff found some friends of his in a third-class compartment. After putting his cap and stick into a third-class compartment, he joined his friends and went with them to the restaurant car, returning with them later to their compartment. When the train arrived at Paddington Station the plaintiff's suit-case was not to be found, and he brought this action against the railway company.

He (counsel) submitted that the railway company were not common carriers in respect of luggage kept in a compartment in which a passenger was not travelling. The County Court Judge was wrong in holding that the onus was on the company to show that the plaintiff had not taken reasonable care in looking after his luggage. In the present case the plaintiff never went near his luggage at any stage of the journey and took no steps to prevent the loss. He referred to Great Western Railway Company v. Bunch (4 The Times L.R., 356 ; 13 App. Cas., 31), and Great Western Railway Company v. Talley (L.R., 6 C.P., 44).

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. QUASS submitted that the onus of proof was on the railway company to show that the loss occurred owing to the plaintiff's negligence. There was no evidence when the loss of the case occurred.

LORD JUSTICE ATKIN, in giving judgment, said that this was an interesting case for railway passengers. His Lordship stated the facts, and said that they were bound to accept the County Court Judge's finding that the suit-case had been placed in a first-class compartment at the request of the passenger, who held a third-class ticket. On the arrival of the train at Paddington the suit-case could not be found, and an action was accordingly brought against the company in respect of the loss. With regard to the liability of a railway company as common carriers in respect of luggage lost from a railway compartment, a modification had been introduced to the effect that the company was not liable if it could show that the loss in the case of hand luggage arose by reason of negligence of the passenger. The law as to a railway company's liability had been authoritatively laid down in Great Western Railway Company v. Bunch (4 The Times L.R., 356 ; 13 App. Cas., 31), where Lord Watson said, at p. 46 :—

"It does not admit of question that passengers' luggage, duly delivered to the company's servants for carriage in the railway van, remains during its transit at the risk of the company as common carriers ; but it has always been held that it would be unreasonable and unjust to make the company liable as insurers, in cases where the passenger has assumed, in whole or in part, the custody and control of his own luggage. Whilst they have been in agreement to that extent, eminent Judges have differed as to the nature of the contract under which hand luggage is carried, some being of opinion that it is, from first to last, a contract to carry such luggage on the same terms as its owner, that is to say, with ordinary care, others being of opinion that it is throughout a contract of common carriage, modified by the personal interference of the passenger. Whichever of these views be accepted, it is manifest that, in many instances, the resulting liability of the company will be precisely the same, but, according to the second of them, the full responsibility of the company may revive on occasions when, from causes incidental to his journey, the interference of the passenger ceases for a time, and his hand-luggage is committed to the exclusive charge of their servants."

And at p. 48 Lord Watson said this :—

"However that may be, I prefer the principle which appears to me to have been adopted in Richards v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (7 C.B., 839) and Butcher v. London and South-Western Railway Company (16 C.B., 13). I think the contract ought to be regarded as one of common carriage, subject to this modification, that in respect of his interference with their exclusive control of his luggage, the company are not liable for any loss or injury occurring during its transit, to which the act or default of the passenger has been contributory."

Mr. Barrington-Ward, in accepting the view there expressed, laid stress on the words "where the passenger has assumed control," and said that those were essential words. He (the Lord Justice) thought that it was impossible thus to limit the doctrine. Everyone knew that in these days hand luggage, in many instances, was carried in circumstances where the luggage was placed in the corridor in as close proximity to the compartment as possible. He did not think that it could be the duty of a passenger to remain in the compartment all the time, having regard to the fact that he might be invited by the company to be absent for a time in order to resort to another part of the train to take meals. It was an ordinary incident that a passenger who had chosen a compartment might change his mind en route and wish to travel in another compartment for the purpose of joining friends, or because, being originally in a non-smoking compartment, he desired to smoke, and, therefore, had to choose another compartment. In that event the company remained still under the liability to carry his luggage as common carriers, subject to the limitation already stated.

In the present case the County Court Judge had held that he was unable to say that the loss had been contributed to by the passenger. He had thrown the onus on the railway company—namely, by holding that there was a duty on them to show that the loss occurred by want of care on the part of the passenger. The only question of difficulty which arose was that the luggage, which belonged to a passenger holding a third-class ticket, had been placed in a first-class compartment. If it had been established that the passenger had the intention of travelling first-class, different considerations might have arisen. Sometimes the change of class was due to violation of rights ; sometimes it was done with the full intention of paying the excess fare. And it certainly could not be said that a third-class passenger was an outlaw when he travelled first-class. On the evidence given he was of opinion that the decision of the Judge was correct, and the appeal therefore failed.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that he agreed. Bunch's case (4 The Times L.R., 356 ; 13 App. Cas., 31) had established that the railway company were under a liability as common carriers, subject to this, that it was the duty of the passenger to take reasonable care. If the company proved that the loss was caused by the neglect of the passenger to take reasonable care, then they were entitled to succeed. In his opinion the learned Judge had put the onus in the right place.

K.B. Div. (Sankey, J.) } 1927. July 19.

WISBECH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WARD.*

Negligence — Architect — Building contract — Interim certificates — Loss to employers — Payment of same amount twice over.

The plaintiffs, a local authority, for the purpose of a housing scheme, made a contract with the builders under which the defendant was the architect. Clause 29 of the contract provided :

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"No certificate of the architect, except for the final balance, shall be considered conclusive evidence of any works or materials to which it relates nor of the value thereof, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good any defects as provided by these conditions, nor shall it in any way prejudice the employers in the final settlement of the accounts in any case where the contractor has been overpaid during the progress of the works."

The Ministry of Health had the right to require the use of materials which the Disposals Board had for sale. While the houses were in course of erection the defendant gave interim certificates in pursuance of clause 29, and he also gave documents under which the plaintiffs paid the Disposals Board for articles supplied by the Board. Owing to the negligence of the defendant the plaintiffs had to pay both the builders and the Board for the same material, and the amount so overpaid to the builders could not be recovered from them. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant the amount overpaid the defendant contended that he was a quasi-arbitrator and therefore not liable.

Held, that in view of the terms of the particular contract, and in view of the course of business under it, the defendant was not, in giving the interim certificates, acting as an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator, but was merely acting as agent for the plaintiffs, and was liable to pay the amount claimed.

His Lordship delivered a considered judgment in favour of the plaintiffs in this action, which was tried before him at Cambridge Assizes. The plaintiffs, the Wisbech Rural District Council, sought to recover from Mr. Frank Ward, the architect employed for a housing scheme of the plaintiffs, £221 3s., which they alleged they had been compelled to pay twice through the negligence of the defendant in granting interim certificates.

The facts and the defences raised are stated in his Lordship's judgment.

The Hon. Sir Malcolm Macnaghten, K.C., and Mr. Gerald Dodson appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. Linton Thorp for the defendant.

Mr. Justice Sankey, in delivering judgment, said:—In this action, the Wisbech Rural District Council sue Mr. Frank Ward for damages for negligence.

The facts are as follows:—Shortly after the war the plaintiffs were minded to erect a number of houses under a Housing Scheme and for that purpose they made a contract with Messrs. Wright and Wilson on September 30, 1920. The defendant was the architect under that contract. The Ministry of Health had rights in connexion with the scheme and they could compel war material which the Disposals Board had for sale to be used. The Ministry further had the right of revising the prices and making allowances in the event of the prices of labour or material rising or falling during the continuance of the contract.

In the years 1920-21 the houses were in course of erection, and the defendant gave 12 interim certificates, the first on November 29, 1920, and the last on November 24, 1921, in pursuance of clause 29, which regulated the method of payment and which is as follows:—

"No certificate of the architect, except for the final balance, shall be considered conclusive evidence of any works or materials to which it relates nor of the value thereof, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good any defects as provided by these conditions, nor shall it in any way prejudice the employers in the final settlement of the accounts in any case where the contractor has been overpaid during the progress of the works."

It is unnecessary for the purposes of my judgment to go into minute details, but it is sufficient to say that in addition to giving those certificates to the builder the defendant also gave documents under which the plaintiffs paid, and in my opinion rightly paid, the Disposals Board for some of the prime cost articles, if they may so be called, supplied by the Board. Unfortunately, he gave some interim certificates and documents under which the plaintiffs had to pay both the builders and the Board for the same material, chiefly consisting of baths. I find as a fact, indeed it was not really disputed by the defendant, whose memory was not of such a character as enabled the Court to place absolute reliance on it, that, owing to the defendant's negligence, he certified that a sum of £221 3s. was due both to the Disposals Board and to the builders. The plaintiffs' witnesses said, and I accept it, that they had paid this sum twice over. The defendant said: "I allowed for the baths in my certificate to the builders and the plaintiffs have paid the builders for them; I have also certified that the Disposals Board was entitled to be paid for the baths, and the plaintiffs have paid them also for the baths."

After considerable delay, which was due to the fault of the defendant, the parties endeavoured to get a final settlement of the accounts and, as late as October, 1923, the defendant went through the accounts with some of the plaintiffs' officials and, in effect, admitted that he had made a mistake. He did not deny the correctness of the sum paid twice over and promised to obtain a refund from the builders. The plaintiffs gave the defendant an opportunity, at his request, to recover the amount of the money, if he could. Unfortunately, the builders dissolved partnership, and one went bankrupt. The present writ was then issued to obtain from the defendant the overpaid money. I find that owing to the negligence of the defendant the plaintiffs have had to pay the sum of £221 3s. twice over.

On behalf of the defendant four points were taken:—(1) That the defendant was a quasi-arbitrator, and, therefore, not liable. (2) That the action is premature because there is power to rectify under a final certificate and no final certificate has at present been issued. Should that final certificate be issued it would be found that the builders have not been overpaid, because a sum of £221 11s. 8d. is due to them in respect of sums which they ought to be allowed for paying increased wages, and so, in effect, the plaintiffs have suffered no damage. (3) If the matter cannot be rectified there has been a final certificate contained in a document known as Summary No. 4, which was the document gone into between the parties to find what the exact position was, and the defendant has issued his final certificate and cannot be sued for negligence. (4) If the defendant was negligent, so, too, were the plaintiffs for not keeping and checking their accounts.

I will deal with the last three points at once. As to (2), in my view there is no power to rectify by giving a final certificate, and for several reasons :—(a) By reason of the delay in this matter which has been caused by the defendant. As far back as 1923 he admitted the mistake, and he was allowed time to see whether he could not get the money out of the builders. They, as above pointed out, were in a partnership, which came to an end a considerable time ago. Subsequently Mr. Wright, who carried on the business by himself, became insolvent, and was adjudicated a bankrupt. (b) In my view the builders were not entitled to any sum at all in respect of an increase in wages, and, in fact, the Ministry disallowed it. As to (3), in my view Summary No. 4 was not a final certificate. Moreover, it was not intended by the defendant to be one, nor was it issued or accepted as such. The real question here is whether the defendant was negligent in giving an interim certificate. As to (4), this is a question of fact. I find that the plaintiffs were in no way negligent, and that there was no breach by them of any duty which they owed to the defendant.

I therefore turn to the important part of the case. As to (1), Was the defendant a quasi-arbitrator, and is he, therefore, not liable ? In my opinion an architect under a building contract may occupy two positions :—(a) He may be merely an agent of the building owner ; or (b) he may be placed in the position of an arbitrator, or quasi-arbitrator. If he is merely acting as an agent for the building owner, he may be liable for negligence. If he is acting as an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator, he is clothed with the duty of exercising an impartial judgment (Chambers v. Goldthorpe, 17 The Times L.R., 304 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 624, at p. 645), and he will not be liable for mere negligence. He will only be liable when he has been shown to be fraudulent. In this case there is no suggestion that the defendant has in any way been fraudulent.

It was urged before me that in the case of Stevenson v. Watson (4 C.P.D., 148) both Lord Coleridge and Mr. Justice Denman said that in circumstances like the present the defendant would have been in a quasi-judicial position. As it appears to me, they said no such thing. The facts of that case have to be carefully looked at. The plaintiff was a builder. The architect had issued his final certificate and refused to reconsider it, and it was held on demurrer in that particular case "that the functions of the architect in ascertaining the amount due to the plaintiff were not merely ministerial but such as required the exercise of professional judgment, opinion, and skill, and that he, therefore, occupied the position of an arbitrator, against whom, no fraud or collusion being alleged, the action would not lie." But Mr. Justice Denman points out at page 161 that the question is, What duty did the architect undertake ? That depends upon the nature of the employment of an architect who acts under a contract of that kind. The remark at the bottom of that page must be taken to refer to the facts of that case.

A more accurate statement of the law, if I may be allowed to say so, is that of the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice A. L. Smith, in Chambers v. Goldthorpe (supra), at page 634 :—

"I have no doubt that, under many clauses of the building contract in this case, the plaintiff acted merely as the agent for the defendant, the building owner, for the purpose of seeing that the builder did his work properly, and used proper materials. As regards matters in which the plaintiff was employed merely as agent for the building owner, he was to protect his interests adversely to the builder, and the plaintiff would be liable to an action by his employer if he acted negligently in such matters."

Although it is probably right to say that in giving a final certificate the architect acts in a quasi-judicial character unless there is some express clause in the contract to contradict it, it cannot, I think, be asserted that in giving an interim certificate he is so acting. Personally, I should have thought that the inference was just the other way—namely, that in giving an interim certificate he is merely acting as agent for the building owner unless there is something in the contract to contradict that relationship. But, after all, the contract must be looked at to see whether or not in giving an interim certificate the architect was acting as an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator.

Having regard to the course of business under this contract, and having regard to the clause dealing with the method of payment, especially clause 29 (1), (3), and (5), I have come to the conclusion that, in giving these interim certificates, the architect was not acting as an arbitrator or as a quasi-arbitrator. The interim certificates were not made with a view to regulating the advances and showing how much should be paid on account—Tharsis Sulphur and Copper Company v. M'Elroy and Son and Others (3 App. Cas., 1,040 ; see per Lord Blackburn, page 1,049). The defendant was deciding no dispute, he was settling no final balance ; he was, as I think, merely acting as agent for the plaintiffs. He was beyond all question negligent, and, in my opinion, he is liable to pay the amount claimed.

There must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Atkin, and Lawrence, L.JJ.) 1927. June 30.

THE JUPITER.*

Ship—Title—Russian ship—Soviet decree for nationalization—Sale by Soviet Government to Italian company—Right to possession.

The plaintiff company was a Russian ship-owning company, and by a Russian decree made in 1918 the company's property was nationalized and it passed to the Soviet Republic, provided that the Soviet Republic took possession of it. The plaintiff company's business having been moved to France in 1919, the French Courts appointed an administrator, and to this office the plaintiff B. ultimately succeeded. In 1922 one of the plaintiff company's ships was laid up at an English port, and the master handed her over to the London representatives of the Soviet Government, and in 1924 she was sold on behalf of that Government to the defendants, an Italian company. In an action claiming that the plaintiffs were the lawful owners of the vessel and that possession should be given to them, the evidence was that the decree did not transfer property which was not within the jurisdiction of the Soviet Republic, and the Trial Judge came to the conclusion that it was not proved that the ship was within the territory of the Soviet Republic at the time of the decree.

* Reported by T. W. Morgan and E. J. M. Chaplin, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Held, that the defendant company had failed to establish a title superior to that of the plaintiff B., and that the latter had a sufficient possessory title to maintain the action against the defendant company and was entitled to possession.

Decision of Hill, J. (43 The Times L.R., 210 ; [1927] P., 122), affirmed.

This was the defendants' appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Hill (43 The Times L.R., 210 ; [1927] P., 122) in an action brought in the Admiralty Division in respect of the steamship Jupiter.

The plaintiffs were the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce, and MM. Claude M. A. A. E. Bourgeois and Leonidas Tcheloff and Gregoire Margoline, on behalf of themselves and others, trading as the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce.

The nominal defendants were an Italian company of shipbreakers, the Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima, although the action was really defended by the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

The facts were shortly as follows :—The Compagnie Russe, under its Russian name of "Ropit," carried on business in Russia before the revolution, having a head office in Petrograd, its ships being registered at Odessa. In 1917 the head office was transferred to Odessa. At the beginning of 1919 the business was, apparently, moved to France and the ships traded from Marseilles. After a time issues arose between the company and its shipmasters, with the result that the French Courts appointed an administrator, to which office the plaintiff Bourgeois eventually succeeded.

In September, 1922, owing to the general depression of the shipping industry, the Jupiter was laid up at Dartmouth in the charge of the master, a Captain Lépine. In March, 1924, while the vessel was so laid up, the master handed her over to the representatives of the Soviet Government in London. That step, he told the Court, was taken from patriotic motives. The plaintiffs alleged that he was influenced by bribes or threats.

In those circumstances an action was instituted in the Admiralty Division by the Compagnie Russe, claiming possession of the Jupiter. The Soviet Government, which defended the action, successfully pleaded "sovereign rights and privileges," and Mr. Justice Hill, on May 29, 1924, set aside the writ and stayed all proceedings in the action on the ground that the Jupiter was a Russian ship and that the Russian Government, having asserted property in the vessel and declared its unwillingness to submit to the jurisdiction, could not be impleaded in the British Courts (40 The Times L.R., 673). On July 17, 1924, the Court of Appeal upheld that judgment of Mr. Justice Hill (40 The Times L.R., 815 ; [1924] P., 236).

The Russian Government claimed to be the owners of the vessel under a decree for the nationalization of Russian merchant ships and also asserted that the plaintiff company had no legal existence by reason of the operation of a Soviet decree for the liquidation of Russian private companies.

In September, 1924, the Arcos Steamship Company, Limited, on behalf of the Soviet Government, sold the Jupiter to an Italian company, the Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima. On October 8, 1924, the plaintiffs issued the writ in the present action, claiming against the Italian purchasers a declaration that the plaintiffs were the lawful owners of the vessel and that possession should be given them, or, alternatively, judgment for the value of the ship, and damages.

The Soviet Government at once moved to stay proceedings in this action also, but the President, Lord Merrivale, who was upheld on appeal by the Court of Appeal (41 The Times L.R., 321 ; [1925] P., 69), dismissed the motion, holding that the Russian State was not impleaded by the action, which was against an Italian company, and that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction to entertain a claim by one foreigner against another foreigner for possession of a foreign ship that was within the territorial jurisdiction.

The action then came before Mr. Justice Hill (43 The Times L.R., 210 ; [1927] P., 122), who held that the shipmaster had betrayed his trust to his employers in France, in whom was vested the right of possession. The result of his judgment was to hold that the plaintiff, M. Bourgeois, was in March, 1924, wrongfully deprived of possession ; that no one had established any title superior to that of M. Bourgeois ; and that, therefore, M. Bourgeois must have judgment for possession. He directed that the name of the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce, as plaintiffs, should be struck out of the writ, and he formally pronounced against the claims of two of the plaintiffs—Tcheloff and Margoline. He granted a declaration that the plaintiff Bourgeois was entitled to possession of the Jupiter at the date of the writ, and gave judgment for him for £7,800, with costs. He refused the application of M. Bourgeois for interest, as damages, because it was a matter of mere speculation whether he would have been in any better position if he had had possession of the ship in October, 1924, rather than of £7,800 at the date of the judgment.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. H. L. Murphy appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Langton, K.C., and Mr. Carpmael for the respondents.

The Court did not call on counsel for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said that two main questions were raised in effect—(1) Whether the Italian company had a title to the ship which was superior to any title which M. Bourgeois could claim as administrator appointed by the French Court ; and (2) whether the French administrator had established a sufficient possessory title to maintain the action. Of those two questions the second was the more important, and if that title were established it became unnecessary to consider the first question. The second question depended partly on the effect of Russian law, which had to be treated as a question of fact, and partly also on what might be called a pure question of fact. On both those questions of fact the learned Judge below had arrived at a clear conclusion. He (the Lord Justice) thought there was ample evidence upon which that conclusion could be arrived at and there was no reason for differing therefrom.

Upon the first point the case for the Italian company was that the Jupiter originally belonged to a Russian company whose headquarters were in Petrograd and which was governed by Russian law. By a decree made in January, 1918, the whole of the property of this Russian company was nationalized and, therefore, the property passed to the Soviet Republic, provided that that Republic was in a position to, and did in fact, take possession of the property of the company, including the Jupiter. It was said that the effect of the decree, coupled with the taking of possession in March, 1924, constituted a complete transfer of property in the Jupiter to the Soviet Government, from which the Italian company had bought the vessel.

The answer to that, as found by Mr. Justice Hill, was that, assuming the Russian decree to be the decree contended for and that the circumstances which occurred in March, 1924, amounted to a taking of possession, yet the Italian company had not made out their case. One reason for that conclusion was that on the evidence with regard to Russian law the decree did not operate to transfer property which was not within the jurisdiction of the Soviet Republic. After going into the whole question, Mr. Justice Hill came to the conclusion that it was not proved that this ship was within the territory of the Soviet Republic at the time of the decree. If that were right—and he saw no reason to doubt the Judge's conclusion—it followed that the Italian company had failed to establish the superior title which they set out to prove.

The other question which arose was whether the Judge was right in holding that M. Bourgeois, who had been appointed by the French Court as administrator of the property of a number of persons who had sought to transfer the business of the Russian company to Paris and were managing at least some of the vessels (including the Jupiter), had a sufficient possessory title to enable him to maintain the action. Upon that it was plain from the order of the French Court that M. Bourgeois had a sufficient title to maintain the action against anyone who could not establish a superior title.

The result was that the appeal failed and must be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE ATKIN and LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE concurred.

IN RE CASSEL—PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. MOUNTBATTEN.*

Revenue — Estate duty — Property passing on death—Principal value—Method of assessing duty—Right of beneficiary to apportionment of duty—Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 30), ss. 1, 2 (1) (b).

By his will the testator left Brook House, of which he had a lease expiring in 1995, to Mrs. C. for life, and on her death to Lady L. for life. Mrs. C. died in 1925. The testator directed that the rent, rates and taxes, outgoings, and cost of repairs of Brook House should always be paid by his trustees out of the income of his residuary estate. The summons asked by whom the estate duty payable at Mrs. C.'s death on account of the annual benefit, agreed at £5,000 a year, conferred on the person for the time being entitled to Brook House was to be paid, and secondly how it was to be assessed.

Held, that on the death of Mrs. C. the property which passed was the right to the benefit of the annual sum of £5,000; that the estate duty on the property must be borne by the person to whom the property passed, but on equitable terms; that in the first instance the estate duty should be paid out of residue, and the residue be recouped by a policy being taken out on the life of Lady L. for such an amount as would at her death produce a sum equal to the duty and be vested in the trustees; and that the interest on the estate duty and the policy premiums should be retained and paid by the trustees in each year out of the £5,000.

Sir Ernest Cassel held a lease of Brook House, and the stables at No. 5, Woods-mews, for a term of 90 years from September 29, 1905. He bequeathed the stables and house, with the furniture, pictures, and other articles of household use and ornament to his trustees upon trust to permit his sister, Mrs. Wilhelmina Cassel, to have the use and enjoyment thereof for life. She died on September 16, 1925. After her death the trustees were to hold the house and contents upon similar trusts in favour of his granddaughter, Edwina Ashley, now Lady Louis Mountbatten, and after her death on trust for such of her children as she should by deed or will appoint and, in default of appointment, upon trust for the first son, or, failing a son, the first daughter attaining the age of 21 or marrying. Subject to those trusts there were similar successive trusts in favour first, of his granddaughter, Ruth Ashley (now Mrs. Cunningham Reid) and her family; secondly, in favour of his nephew, Sir Felix Cassel, and his family; thirdly, in favour of his (Sir Ernest's) niece, Mrs. Jenkins, for life, and after her death in favour of her daughter, Marjorie, now Countess of Brecknock, and, on her death, in favour of such children as she should by deed or will appoint and, on failure of appointment, in favour of the first son, or failing a son, the first daughter attaining the age of 21 or marrying. The testator then directed that in the event of the failure or determination of the trusts declared of Brook House it should be offered as a gift to the then reigning English Sovereign or, if not accepted, be held on trust for King Edward's Hospital Fund for London. The testator also directed that "the rent outgoings, rates and taxes for the time being payable in respect of the said messuage and premises and keeping the same and the contents thereof insured against fire and burglary and in a proper state of preservation shall be always paid by trustees out of the income of my residuary personal estate."

The testator then devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate upon trust for sale and conversion and disposed of it as follows:—25/64ths of the whole for the benefit of his granddaughter Edwina and her children and issue, 15/64ths of the whole for the benefit of his granddaughter Ruth and her children and issue, 8/64ths of the whole for the benefit of Mrs. Jenkins and her children and issue, and 16/64ths of the whole for the benefit of Sir Felix Cassel and his children and issue.

* Reported by J. B. B. MACMAHON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this summons the Public Trustee, one of the trustees of Sir Ernest Cassel's will, asked (1) whether the estate duty, which became payable on the death of Mrs. Wilhelmina Cassel on account of the above annual expenditure directed by the testator, ought to be borne by Lady Louis Mountbatten, the present tenant for life, or by the residuary personal estate of the testator, or in any other or what manner; and (2) how such estate duty should be assessed.

Mr. H. C. Bischoff appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Wilfrid Greene, K.C., and Mr. J. V. Nesbitt for Lady Louis Mountbatten; Mr. R. Turnbull for her infant daughter; Mr. Ashton Roskill for Sir Felix Cassel and Mrs. Jenkins; Mr. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. W. M. Hunt for the other infant defendants, and the Countess of Brecknock and Mrs. Cunningham Reid; and Mr. Stamp for the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

Mr. Justice Russell delivered the following considered judgment:—

The questions now raised for decision are, (1) how the estate duty which became payable on Mrs. Cassel's death on account of the annual expenditure provided for in respect of Brook House by the special clause should be borne as between Lady Louis and the testator's residuary estate; and (2) how such duty should be assessed. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have consented to be joined as defendants for the purpose of being bound by the judgment on the second question.

The following matters were agreed between the parties in the course of the argument—namely, (1) the average annual income earned by the whole estate of the testator is 6.39 per cent.; (2) the rate of estate duty payable in respect of Mrs. Cassel's estate is 29 per cent.; and (3) the average annual amount of the benefit conferred by the special clause on the beneficiary for the time being entitled under the will to Brook House is £5,000.

Dealing first with the second question, the point resolves itself into the question how the principal value (upon which the estate duty must be levied and paid) is to be ascertained; in other words, whether, as regards the benefit conferred by the special clause, property passed on the death of Mrs. Cassel so that the case falls within section 1 of the Finance Act, 1894, by force of the provisions of that section), or whether the case falls within section 1 only by virtue of the provisions of section 2.

If I were unassisted or unimpeded by previous authority I should have said that the case was only brought into charge under section 1 by virtue of the provisions of section 2. I should have thought that where a life interest in A ceased by A's death, with the result that an interest in B which during A's life was reversionary became an interest in possession, no property passed on A's death. A's interest merely ceases, no part of it is transferred to B, or passes to B. I should have thought that such a case fell directly within the provisions of section 2 (1) (b) and only came within the charging section, section 1, by virtue of section 2. If this were the correct view, the principal value would be ascertained under the provisions of section 7 (7) (b) upon what is sometimes called the slice theory. That is to say, the principal value would be the capital sum which at 6.39 per cent. would produce £5,000, say £78,250. The estate duty would be payable out of the residuary estate, but a portion of the interest thereon would be borne by the person for the time being entitled to the benefit of the special clause. Such person would bear the same proportion of the whole interest as the £78,250 bears to the value of the whole residuary estate including the £78,250. That is to say, the £5,000 per annum applicable under the special clause would be reduced by that amount of interest accordingly. This method of apportioning the burden of the estate duty would be in accordance with the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Palmer ([1916] 2 Ch., 391).

This indeed was the contention before me of counsel for the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who definitely contended that in the ordinary case of property settled on A for life with remainder to B estate duty was leviable on A's death not under section 1 simpliciter, but under section 1 by virtue of section 2. In other words, such a case was a section 2 case and not a section 1 case; it was a section 2 case to which section 7 (7) (a) was applicable. On this footing it was argued that the case before me was a section 2 case to which section 7 (7) (b) applied.

As before indicated, this view appeals strongly to me if I am at liberty to adopt it. It is said, however, on the other side that I am not free to adopt this view; that upon the death of Mrs. Cassel property passed within the language of section 1, and that section 2 never comes into play at all; and this on the authority of the House of Lords in Cowley v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (15 The Times L.R., 270; [1899] A.C., 198). I have carefully considered Cowley's case (supra), and in my opinion it prevents me from holding that the present case is not a section 1 case but a section 2 case. In Cowley's case (supra) a tenant for life had died, with the result that the tenant for life in remainder had become tenant for life in possession. The main question for decision was whether estate duty was payable upon the gross value of the settled estate without deducting the amount of sums previously raised by mortgages of the fee. It was held that the amount of the mortgages must be deducted on the ground that the property which passed to a new tenant for life was the equity of redemption in the entire estate. Some of the Lords concerned in that decision dealt with the case on the alternative footings of section 1 and section 2, arriving on either view at the same result; but they all, I think, took the view that the case fell under section 1 and not section 2. Lords Halsbury, Macnaghten, Morris, Shand, and Davey clearly said so. If this be so, then section 2 would not come into consideration. To borrow Lord Macnaghten's language (at p. 213), the provisions of section 2 "do not . . . refer to the cesser of an interest in property which passes, but to the cesser of an interest in property which does not pass." I feel constrained to hold that the present case falls within section 1.

What then is the property which passes on Mrs. Cassel's death? In my opinion the true answer is the benefit of the annual sum payable under the special clause. The duration of this provision is for a term which must expire in 1995. It may expire earlier if Brook House is sold; but in view of the benefits conferred by the special clause this event though possible is improbable. In substance, the trustees are bound for a period of time to apply an annual sum of varying amount for the benefit of the persons for the time being entitled under the will to the enjoyment of Brook House and contents. What passes is the right to enjoy the benefit of that annual sum. That is the property which passed on the death of Mrs. Cassel.

Next, how is the principal value of that property to be ascertained? The machinery provided by the Act is section 7 (5) supplemented to some extent by section 7 (8). That machinery does not exactly fit the present case, because from the personal nature of the provision, the benefit of it could not be sold at all; an outside purchaser would not obtain delivery of the goods. Nevertheless, the machinery must be made to fit, and I think it can be made to fit. It was made to fit in the Irish case of Attorney-General v. Jameson ([1905] 2 I.R., 218). The value cannot be ascertained by reference to market price, because there can be no market. But a hypothetical market price at Mrs. Cassel's death could be fixed by ascertaining the value of the £5,000 per annum over the unexpired period of the special clause. This value should not be the full value, for the owner of Brook House does not receive the annual sum, he only enjoys the benefit of payments made in respect of his property, all of which do not necessarily represent payments which he would otherwise have made out of his own pocket. To some extent, therefore, the full value would be in excess of the true value. Further, there is always a possibility of the special clause ceasing to operate before 1995 in the event of Brook House being sold. There should, I think, be no difficulty in the Commissioners' taking all these matters into consideration and forming a fair opinion of the principal value, subject, of course, to the right of appeal given by the statute.

Having ascertained the principal value on the above footing, the first question raised by the summons then arises. I must here proceed on general principles. Various suggestions were made before me. It would, I think, be wrong to say that the present tenant for life must herself pay the duty out of her own pocket. The duty at 29 per cent. must obviously be a large sum; and her period of enjoyment of the benefits of the special clause might not be sufficiently prolonged to recoup to her the disbursement. On the other hand, residue has not benefited by the death of Mrs. Cassel. The charge on residue continues throughout the duration of the term. The death of Mrs. Cassel has not reduced or diminished the burden. Accordingly, in my opinion, residue should not permanently bear any part of the burden. The burden must be borne by the person to whom the property has passed—but upon equitable terms. The extent of her burden should be made as far as possible payable out of and commensurate with her benefit. This can, in my opinion, be properly achieved in the following manner: Let the amount of the estate duty be raised and paid out of the residuary estate. Let a policy of assurance be effected on the life of Lady Louis to cover the amount of such duty, and let that policy of assurance be assigned to the trustees. Let the interest on the amount of the duty and the premiums on the policy be retained and paid by the trustees out of the annual sum which would otherwise be payable under the special clause. The result will be that on the death of Lady Louis the residue will be fully recouped and she will have borne the burden of the duty to the extent of the annual diminution of her benefit under the special clause.

Before parting with the case I must say a word about In re Palmer (supra). It was urged that this case was in both its aspects governed by that decision. In many respects the two cases resemble each other, and if I had been able to hold here that this was a section 2 case I should have applied In re Palmer (supra). But in In re Palmer (supra) the question as between sections 1 and 2 was not before the Court. The Inland Revenue was not represented. The question was simply this—how as between the persons interested in residue was the burden of the estate duty already paid as on a section 2 case to be borne? The hands of the Court were tied to that extent. The case had to be treated on the footing of section 2 being the section to be considered, and not section 1.

In the result, I make the following declarations:—

1. Declare that the estate duty ought in the first instance to be borne by the residue, and that the residue should be recouped by means of a policy of insurance on the life of Lady Louis to be vested in the trustees, securing payment at her death of a sum equal to the amount of the duty, the interest on the amount of the duty and the policy premiums being retained and paid by the trustees in each year out of the sum which would otherwise have been applied by them under the special clause.

2. Declare that such duty ought to be charged upon the principal value (to be ascertained under section 7 (5) and (8) of the Finance Act, 1894) of the right to enjoy for a period expiring at the latest on September 29, 1995, the benefits conferred by the special clause.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton and Sargant, L.JJ.)
1927. July 7.

FULLWOOD v. HURLEY.*

Principal and Agent—Double commission—Hotel broker.

A hotel broker, who is acting as the vendor's agent for reward, is not entitled to enter into a second agency of the like kind on behalf of the purchaser, unless this arrangement is assented to with full knowledge by the original principal.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of a Divisional Court, consisting of Lord Justice Bankes and Mr. Justice Roche. The question raised was whether a hotel broker, who had received commission from the vendor on the sale of a hotel, could also claim commission from the purchaser. The case came before the Divisional Court on an appeal by the defendant from the Judge of the Leighton Buzzard County Court.

The plaintiff, Mr. Reginald Joseph Fullwood, of 156, Strand, W.C. (trading as Fullwoods), hotel broker, sued the defendant, Mr. Reginald William Hurley, the Hunt Hotel, Leighton Buzzard, to recover £66 5s. for services rendered by the plaintiff, as a hotel broker, to the defendant in connexion with the purchase by the defendant of the Hunt Hotel, Leighton Buzzard.

The defendant denied that he was indebted to the plaintiff and that the plaintiff had rendered him any service as a hotel broker in connexion with the purchase of the Hunt Hotel.

In July, 1926, the defendant called at the plaintiff's office and asked for particulars of hotel businesses for sale. On July 6, 1926, the plaintiff sent the defendant particulars of a number of houses and orders to view, and wrote, inter alia, "... we shall be glad to know your decision in due course, and if business is done we shall act for you at the usual brokerage...." The orders to view contained a special notice as follows:—"In the event of terms being arranged, you are requested to pay the usual 10 per cent. deposit to Messrs. Fullwoods, otherwise you will become equally liable with the vendor for the commission. This order is issued on this express condition only. . . ."

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant eventually negotiated directly with the owner for the purchase of the Hunt Hotel, Leighton Buzzard, and at the end of July the purchase was completed. The plaintiff thereupon claimed £66 5s. commission from the purchaser, although he received full commission, £134, from the vendor.

Mr. G. F. Emery appeared for the appellant ; Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. C. W. Measor for the respondent.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in the course of his judgment, having stated the facts, read the letter containing the passage, "We shall be glad to know your decision in due course, and if business is done we shall act for you at the usual brokerage." Fullwoods gave the order to view because they were the authorized agents for the vendor. The defendant viewed the hotel and ultimately entered into a contract with Mrs. Lloyd, the owner, for the purchase of the hotel from her.

The plaintiff had received a commission, the not insignificant one of £134, from the vendor, and he now claimed £66 5s. from the purchaser. It was said that it was the practice in the trade for one agent to act for both vendor and purchaser. That might be the case with regard to completion of the purchase, when measurement of stocks had to take place. In his opinion there was no evidence to show that a contract was made between the plaintiff and the defendant for the payment of that commission. The plaintiff was clearly acting as agent for the vendor. That being his position, he was, ipso facto, disentitled from entering into a second agency on behalf of the purchaser, unless that arrangement was assented to with full knowledge by his original principal. The evidence showed that the defendant made no objection to the terms of the letter, but those terms were not sufficient to make him liable to pay commission. The evidence fell far short of establishing the plaintiff's right to recover, even assuming that it could be established.

It could not be stated too plainly that an agent could not normally accept commission on a sale from both parties. If commission were claimed for work done for both parties, it must be claimed to the knowledge and with the assent of the other principal concerned. The result here was that no contract for payment of commission by the defendant was shown, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON said that he agreed with the decision, though he was not sure that he agreed with all the observations reported to have been made by the members of the Divisional Court. But he desired to emphasize the view which the law took of these double commissions. No agent who had accepted an employment from one principal could in law accept from a second an engagement inconsistent with his duty to his first principal. If, as agent for the vendor, he was negotiating as to price and knew that his principal would take a certain named figure, by no possibility could he use that knowledge to get the property for the purchaser for less than the purchaser was inclined to pay. The main ground on which he (his Lordship) decided the case was that the plaintiff could not show any real contract with the defendant to pay the commission. The order to view contained nothing putting any liability on the purchaser to pay purchaser's commission to the agent. It was the duty of the agent to make the fullest disclosure of the exact contract that he had, and the benefit that he was getting out of it. Messrs. Fullwoods seemed to have quite misunderstood the position, for they seemed to have suggested that giving an order to view was a consideration for getting commission from the purchaser ; if so, that was quite inconsistent with their duty to the vendor. In his (his Lordship's) view the letter accompanying the order to view the hotel was quite ambiguous ; there was nothing to make it a proposal of a contract which was necessarily accepted by accepting the order to view. If the agents wanted a double commission, they must make to each party a full disclosure of the exact nature of their interest and obtain the consent of each party. Such a contract must be made in the clearest possible terms and with the fullest disclosure to each principal of what the agent was doing ; otherwise the agent could not sue under any alleged agreement.

LORD JUSTICE SARGANT said that he was of the same opinion. No custom of the trade for the purchaser to pay commission to the vendor's agent could be shown. That being so, the plaintiff's case rested entirely on the final paragraph of the letter, and the sentence relied on was ambiguous. It might be a statement that the order to view was only given to the purchaser on the terms of his paying the plaintiff a second commission. The plaintiff could not insist on that interpretation, for it was seeking to impose an onerous condition on the purchaser in flagrant violation of the plaintiff's duty to the vendor. It would be wrong and improper for the agent to seek to impose on the purchaser a condition which might have the effect of stalling off the purchaser and prevent the agent from securing a purchaser acceptable to the vendor. The plaintiff had failed to show that there was any contract between him and the defendant.

THE FAGERNES.*

Ship — Practice — Service out of jurisdiction—Collision—Inlets of the sea—Bristol Channel—R.S.C., Order XI., r. 1 (ee).

A collision occurred in the Bristol Channel, about midway between the English and Welsh coasts, a little to the eastward of a line drawn from Bull Point in Devon to Port Eynon Head in Gower, Glamorgan, between the plaintiffs' steamship Cornish Coast and the defendants' steamship Fagernes. At the place in question the channel is 20 miles wide. The Fagernes, an Italian ship, was sunk, and in those circumstances the plaintiffs, being unable to proceed for their damage in rem, brought an action of tort against the Italian owners in personam, and obtained an order giving leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction on the ground that the action was founded on a tort committed within the jurisdiction. The defendants thereupon moved to have this order set aside, on the ground (inter alia) that the collision occurred outside British territorial waters and therefore the Court had no jurisdiction. The Judge hearing the motion held that the collision occurred in a part of the Bristol Channel over which the English Courts had jurisdiction, because the waters of that part of the channel were inter fauces terræ and were deemed by the common law to be part of the territory of the State which owned the land on both sides, and that therefore the order giving leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction must stand.

On the hearing of an appeal the Attorney-General informed the Court of Appeal that the Crown did not claim the part of the Bristol Channel where the collision occurred as being within the territorial jurisdiction of the King.

Held, that in view of the information given to the Court by the Attorney-General and of the absence of evidence of any effective occupation the order giving leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction must be set aside.

Appeal from decision of Hill, J. (42 The Times L.R., 621 ; [1926] P., 185), allowed.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the Società Nazionale di Navigazione, of Genoa, the owners of the steamship Fagernes, from a judgment of Mr. Justice Hill (42 The Times L.R., 621 ; [1926] P., 185), delivered on a motion by the defendants to set aside an order for service of notice of the writ in the action out of the jurisdiction.

On March 17, 1926, a collision occurred in the Bristol Channel between the steamship Cornish Coast, owned by the plaintiffs, and the Fagernes. The Cornish Coast was damaged and the Fagernes was sunk. In those circumstances the plaintiffs brought their action for damage by collision in personam against the owners of the Italian steamship, and obtained an order in Chambers giving them leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction.

The defendants thereupon moved to set aside that order on the grounds that the collision occurred outside British territorial waters ; that the Court had no jurisdiction to try the case ; and, alternatively, that, if there were jurisdiction, leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction was a matter for the discretion of the Court, which ought not, in the circumstances, to exercise its discretion in favour of the plaintiffs.

Mr. Justice Hill held that the waters of the Bristol Channel, at any rate above a line drawn from Bull Point, in Devon, to Port Eynon Head, in Glamorgan, were inter fauces terræ, and were thus part of the territory of the State which owned the land on both sides, and, therefore, within the jurisdiction of the High Court. He accordingly held that the order for service of the notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction was rightly made.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. E. A. Digby, K.C., appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. Balloch for the respondents. The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Giveen appeared for the Crown.

Lord Justice Bankes delivered the following considered judgment :—On March 17, 1926, two vessels came into collision in the Bristol Channel. One vessel was British owned, the other Italian owned. As a result of the collision the Italian vessel sank. The British owners sought to make the Italian owners responsible for the collision. As no action in rem was possible owing to the loss of the Italian vessel, the British owners commenced an action in personam, and applied for leave to issue notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction upon the ground that the action was founded on a tort committed within the jurisdiction, and, therefore, within Order XI., Rule 1 (ee).

An order having been obtained in Chambers, the defendants moved to set it aside upon the ground that the place where the collision occurred was not within the jurisdiction. The point thus taken necessarily raised an extremely important and very interesting question, which was fully dealt with by Mr. Justice Hill in a careful and exhaustive judgment. He finds that the collision occurred more than 20 miles to the east of Lundy Island and some miles to the eastward of a line drawn from Bull Point in Devon to Port Eynon in Gower, which is part of Glamorgan. The nearest point on the English coast is a little west of Ilfracombe ; the nearest point on the Welsh coast is Oxwich Head. The distance across is about 20 miles, the English coast being distant 10½ or 12½ miles and the Welsh coast 9½ or 7½ miles. In speaking of miles the Judge is referring to sea miles.

The learned Judge commences by defining the question which he has to decide as being whether the place where the collision occurred was "within the territorial jurisdiction of the King." He then refers to what is the undoubted fact, that within limits inlets of the sea into the land are part of the territory of the State which owns the land on both sides, and after referring also to the fact that the expression inter fauces terræ has high authority as an indication of what the limits are, he asks himself this pertinent question : "What are the inland waters contained within the land ? What are bays, gulfs, or estuaries inter fauces terræ ? What is the metaphor : the open mouth of a man or of a crocodile ? "

This question has never been authoritatively answered, except in cases where some effective occupation has been proved, or some statutory recognition established, or where the opening is so narrow as to admit of no doubt. The answer to the question can be sought either in the domain of international law or, in the case of our own country, in our common law. The learned Judge considers both. I do not propose to discuss the various and varying opinions of jurists and text writers, to which the learned Judge, to even a fuller extent this Court, has been referred, because it is common ground from the point of view of international law that no agreement on the question has been reached. The learned Judge so treats the matter.

His decision upholding the plaintiffs' contention is founded on his view of the common law, based on the language of the judgment in Cunningham's case (Bell's Crown Cases, 72). In that case the question was whether a collision which occurred between two vessels, and which resulted in the death of a member of the crew, had occurred in the county of Glamorgan, where the indictment for manslaughter was laid. In the present case the only evidence before the Court is that the collision occurred at the spot ascertained and described by Mr. Justice Hill as above set out.

In Cunningham's case (supra) a number of facts were proved. In the first place the collision occurred considerably higher up the Bristol Channel, where its width is not much over ten miles. The place of the collision was within the port of Cardiff and between an island which is part of the parish of Cardiff and the Welsh shore, and only three miles from that shore. It was with reference to these facts that Chief Justice Cockburn used the language upon which Mr. Justice Hill founds his judgment. The passage in the judgment is as follows (Bell's Crown Cases, at p. 86) : "The only question with which it becomes necessary for us to deal is whether the part of the sea on which the vessel was at the time when the offence was committed forms part of the body of the county of Glamorgan ; and we are of opinion that it does. The sea in question is part of the Bristol Channel, both shores of which form part of England and Wales, of the county of Somerset on the one side and the county of Glamorgan on the other. We are of opinion that, looking at the local situation of this sea, it must be taken to belong to the counties respectively by the shores of which it is bounded ; and the fact of the Holms, between which and the shore of the county of Glamorgan the place in question is situated, having always been treated as part of the parish of Cardiff and as part of the county of Glamorgan, is a strong illustration of the principle on which we proceed, namely, that the whole of this inland sea between the counties of Somerset and Glamorgan is to be considered as within the counties by the shores of which its several parts are respectively bounded."

If the case in this Court had been presented in the same form and on the same materials as it was presented to Mr. Justice Hill I should have hesitated in accepting his conclusion, because it appears to me that the Court in Cunningham's case (supra) had not to consider the circumstances of the present case, where the width of the channel is so much greater and there is an entire absence of anything indicating effective occupation, but were merely using language applicable to the facts of the case before them, without intending to lay down any rule applicable to other parts of the Bristol Channel. This view of the judgment in Cunningham's case (supra) is not, in my opinion, inconsistent with Lord Blackburn's comments on that judgment in the Conception Bay case, Direct United States Cable Company, Limited v. Anglo-American Telegraph Company, Limited (2 App. Cas., 394, at p. 419). It is not, however, necessary to express a decided opinion upon this question because, for a reason which I will proceed to indicate, the case as finally presented to this Court has assumed a different aspect.

When the appeal first came on some time ago the Court felt that the question was one so materially affecting not only the rights and interests of the Crown but public interests also, that the Attorney-General should be given the opportunity of appearing, if he desired to do so. He did appear, and in the first instance he gave the Court an exhaustive statement of the opinions of jurists and text writers from very early times upon this much discussed question of the territorial jurisdiction over creeks, bays, &c., and he referred the Court to all the relevant authorities, with the view of inducing the Court not to lay down any rule on the question, but to content themselves merely by saying that there was no authority for holding that the place of this collision was within the jurisdiction.

The question what is within the realm of England being one of the matters of which the Court takes judicial notice, we thought it right to ask the Attorney-General whether the Crown did or did not claim that particular part of the Bristol Channel where this collision occurred as being within the territorial jurisdiction of the King, and he replied that the Crown did not. This information was given at the instance of the Court and for the information of the Court. Given under such circumstances and on such a subject, it does not, in my opinion, necessarily bind the Court in the sense that it is under an obligation to accept it.

Having regard, however, to the position created by the information given to the Court by the Attorney-General, to the absence of authority and to the general trend of the more recent opinion on the question of limiting the width of the fauces terræ to which the rule of territorial jurisdiction should apply, I think the Court ought to be guided by the information given to the Court by the Attorney-General to the extent of saying that they do not consider that there is sufficient authority for supporting the judgment of Mr. Justice Hill, and that the order appealed from must be set aside and Mr. Justice Hill's decision reversed, with costs here and below. I confine my judgment to the particular part of the channel where this collision occurred and to a case where no evidence of any effective occupation is given.

I desire also to say that the Court is indebted to the learned counsel who have argued this case for the assistance which they rendered to the Court. The only reason why I do not deal with their arguments at length is because, having regard to the course which the case took, it does not appear to me to be necessary to do so.

Lord Justice Atkin.—The question to be decided in this case is no less momentous than whether the Bristol Channel is part of the realm of England. What is the territory of the Crown is a matter of which the Court takes judicial notice. The Court has, therefore, to inform itself from the best material available ; and on such a matter it may be its duty to obtain its information from the appropriate department of Government. Any definite statement from the proper representative of the Crown as to the territory of the Crown must be treated as conclusive. A conflict is not to be contemplated between the Courts and the Executive on such a matter, where foreign interests may be concerned, and where responsibility for protection and administration is of paramount importance to the Government of the country. In these circumstances the Court requested the assistance of the Attorney-General ; who, after elaborate and valuable argument on the municipal and international law, so far as it affects the question, eventually informed the Court that he had consulted the Home Secretary, and was by him instructed to say that the place of collision was not within the limits to which the territorial jurisdiction of his Majesty extends. I consider that that statement binds the Court, and constrains it to decide that this portion of the Bristol Channel is not within British jurisdiction, and that the appeal must be allowed.

I think, however, that it is desirable to make it clear that this is not a decision on a point of law, and that no responsibility rests upon this Court save that of treating the statement of the Crown by its proper officer as conclusive. Speaking for myself alone, if I had to decide this case upon the materials before Mr. Justice Hill and the further authorities brought before us, I should have been inclined to come to the same conclusion as he did. It is quite certain that there is at present no such agreement in the practice of civilized States as to afford a definite rule to regulate territorial claims to the waters of gulfs and bays for the future ; still less to determine what has been in fact the territorial jurisdiction in the past. And it is also clear that whenever a rule may in the future be recognized as a principle of international law, it will have to admit exceptions where territorial jurisdiction has been effectively exercised beyond the limits of the general rule, whatever it may be. And in determining the existence of those exceptions, I do not know a better statement of the considerations that must be taken into account than is to be found in the Award of the Permanent Court of Arbitration at the Hague, in The North Atlantic Coast Fisheries case, in 1910 : "The interpretation must take into account all the individual circumstances which for any of the different bays are to be appreciated : the relation of its width and the length of penetration inland, the possibility and the necessity of its being defended by the State in whose territory it is indented : the special value which it has for the industry of the inhabitants of its shores, and the distance which it is secluded from the highways of nations on the open sea, and to other circumstances not possible to enumerate in general." That is from the award, Command Paper 5396, 1910, page 22.

One bears in mind that at this particular point the Channel is only about 20 miles wide, that it has on its north bank the teeming population of Glamorgan with its coal ports, that it penetrates into the vitals of England, having towards the end of its course one of the oldest ports of the kingdom, Bristol. One has also to bear in mind that the whole of the Bristol Channel was part of one of the King's Chambers, which were delimited by an Order of James I. in 1604, which will be found set out in Selden's Mare Clausum, Book II., Chapter xxii.

The statement of the Crown in this case makes it unnecessary to trace the history of the claim to the King's Chambers, but I think it relevant that, though some modern writers on international law have doubted whether the claim to them would be maintained in these days, yet they were treated as material to the decision of cases in prize by Sir Ludlow Jenkins in the cases of St. Anne, Biscay, Delmothe, and Hope, from 1665 to 1675. The existence of the territorial jurisdiction over them was maintained in the leading English work on international law of last century, Phillimore, throughout its editions; was admitted by Wheaton, the leading American authority of that century ; and also by Major-Gen. Hallack, of the United States of America ; and was supported by the English Attorney-General in the North Atlantic Coast Fisheries Arbitration in 1910. The alleged limit of ten miles in width which the Attorney-General contended was the boundary of that part of the channel which was wholly territorial (apart from the three miles coast limit) is not yet accepted, and undoubtedly has admitted exceptions in the case of British, American, French and other national waters. Finally, though neither the case of Rex v. Cunningham (Bell's Crown Cases, 72) nor the case of Direct United States Cable Company, Limited v. Anglo-American Telegraph Company, Limited (2 App. Cas., 394), the Conception Bay case, determined this question as a matter of law, it seems to me plain that Chief Justice Cockburn in the former case, and Lord Blackburn in the latter, treated the Bristol Channel as territorial waters in that part of it which is between Glamorgan and Somerset, i.e., at a width exceeding ten miles. And, in my view, considerable importance should be attached to the fact that Lundy Island, 20 miles to the westward of the locus in quo, is part of Devon. I mention these considerations, without further discussion of the various questions and authorities concerned, to support the statement which I have already made that in arriving at its conclusion the Court is not purporting to do more than give effect to the authoritative pronouncement of the Government. The appeal must be allowed, and the order for service of notice of the writ and the service must be set aside with costs here and below.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree. The question whether the alleged tort was committed within the jurisdiction of the High Court has given rise to an interesting discussion on the subject of the territorial character of inlets of the sea (such as bays, gulfs, estuaries and creeks, all of which for the sake of brevity I will call "bays").

As the territorial jurisdiction of the High Court extends over the whole of England (including the principality of Wales and the town of Berwick-on-Tweed) it follows that, if the spot where the collision occurred is in the realm of England, the alleged tort was committed within the jurisdiction. The real question, therefore, is whether that part of the Bristol Channel where the collision occurred is in the realm of England.

It is common ground that there is no international treaty or convention expressly sanctioning or recognizing any territorial rights of the Crown over the Bristol Channel. Further, no evidence has been adduced that the Crown has possessed itself of, or has effectively asserted any territorial rights over, that part of the Bristol Channel where the collision occurred. In the absence of any express treaty or controlling executive act of the Government, the question arises whether there is any established general rule of international law for determining the territorial character of bays. The consideration of this question has occupied the greater part of the hearing both in the Court below and in this Court.

The Attorney-General, in the course of his able argument, has cited and commented upon the opinion of jurists, the practice of nations, and the relevant judicial decisions. I do not propose to deal with these sources of information in detail, but content myself by saying that in my judgment the Attorney-General has established the proposition that, although the principal of claiming territorial rights over bays is well established as a rule of international law, and although there is no question as to the applicability of that principle in the case of bays the entire land boundaries of which form part of the territory of the same State and the entrances of which do not exceed six sea miles in width, yet there is no recognized general rule of international law by which it can be determined whether any given bay with an entrance wider than six sea miles does or does not form part of the territory of the State whose shores form its land boundary. Each such case must depend upon its own special circumstances.

There is another matter which deserves mention here, namely, the suggestion that because the Bristol Channel is within the limits of the so-called King's Chambers, therefore it is necessarily within the King's territory. An interesting historical account of the King's Chambers is to be found in Fulton, on the sovereignty of the sea (see Chapter iv., commencing at page 118), which records the fact that in 1604 James I. issued a proclamation prohibiting all hostile actions of belligerents within certain limits along the English coast which were fixed by a jury of 13 skilled men appointed by Trinity House. This proclamation had reference to the continuance of the war between the United Provinces and Spain (from which James had himself withdrawn), and according to Fulton (see page 9) is not to be regarded as in any sense an assertion of maritime sovereignty or jurisdiction beyond what was then customary.

Oppenheim, in his work on international law (2nd edition, Vol. I., page 263, 1912) (3rd edition, page 344, 1920), states that: "It must be specially observed that it is hardly possible that Great Britain would still, as she formerly did for centuries, claim the territorial character of the so-called King's Chambers, which include portions of the sea between lines drawn from headland to headland." In a note on the same page the author (after pointing out that whereas Hall, section 41, p. 194, 8th edition, 1924, says that England would, no doubt, not attempt any longer to assert a right of property over the King's Chambers, yet Phillimore (Vol. 1, section 200) still keeps up this claim, states that the attitude of the British Government in the Moray Firth case would seem to demonstrate that this claim is no longer upheld. The author is there referring to the fact that after the decision in Mortensen v. Peters (8 Fraser (J.), 93) Parliament passed the Trawling in Prohibited Areas Prevention Act, 1909 (9 Edward VII., chapter 8).

In the present case the Attorney-General has put forward no claim on behalf of the Crown to the territorial character of the Bristol Channel by reason of its being within the King's Chambers, and his statement to the Court, to which I will refer later, expressly negatives such a claim. In these circumstances, the fact that the Bristol Channel is within the limits of the King's Chambers cannot, in my opinion, be relied upon as proving that it is within the territorial jurisdiction of the High Court.

The next matter for consideration is whether Cunningham's case (Bell's Crown Cases, 72), upon which the learned Judge in the Court below based his decision, covers the present case. For the reasons stated by Lord Justice Bankes, with which I agree, I do not think that it does. That case was concerned with a different locality, and evidence was adduced there which satisfied the Court that the place where the offence was committed was within the parish and port of Cardiff, and therefore within the body of the county of Glamorgan. It was not necessary to decide and, in my opinion, the Court did not purport to decide that the Bristol Channel at the spot where the collision occurred in the present case was part of the territory of England. Therefore, even if the present case had been left where it was in the Court below, I should have felt great hesitation in agreeing with the conclusion reached by the learned Judge. But the matter does not rest there. It is the duty of the Court to take judicial cognizance of the extent of the King's territory; and, if the Court itself is unacquainted with the fact whether a particular place is or is not within the King's territory, the Court is entitled to inform itself of that fact by making such inquiry as it considers proper.

As it is highly expedient, if not essential, that in a matter of this kind the Courts of the King should act in unison with the Government of the King (see Foster v. Globe Venture Syndicate, Limited ([1900] 1 Ch., 811)), this Court invited the Attorney-General to attend at the hearing of the appeal, and at the conclusion of the arguments asked him whether the Crown claimed that the spot where the collision occurred was within the territory of the King. The Attorney-General, in answer to this inquiry, stated that he had communicated with the Secretary of State for Home Affairs, who had instructed him to inform the Court that "the spot where this collision is alleged to have occurred is not within the limits to which the territorial sovereignty of his Majesty extends."

In view of this answer, given with the authority of the Home Secretary upon a matter which is peculiarly within the cognizance of the Home Office, this Court could not, in my opinion, properly do otherwise than hold that the alleged tort was not committed within the jurisdiction of the High Court.

In the result, therefore, I am of opinion that the appeal succeeds, and that the order for service of notice of the writ on the defendants in Italy must be discharged, with costs here and below.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA v. CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Canada — British Columbia—Statute—Validity — Taxation — Whether "direct" — British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 3), s. 92—Fuel-Oil Tax Act, 1923, c. 71 (British Columbia statute), ss. 3, 6.

The Fuel-Oil Tax Act, 1923 (British Columbia statute), which provided that every person purchasing within the province fuel-oil sold for the first time after its manufacture in or importation into the province should pay a tax, to be collected and paid to the Government by the vendor, is invalid, since the tax is not a "direct" tax within s. 92 of the British North America Act, 1867.

Decision of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 185) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Government of British Columbia from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 185) relating to the validity of the British Columbia Fuel-Oil Tax Act, 1923. That judgment affirmed decisions of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia and Mr. Justice Morrison.

Mr. Farris, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and the Hon. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., appeared for the appellant; Mr. W. N. Tilley, K.C., Mr. E. P. Davis, K.C., and Mr. J. E. McMullen (all of the Canadian Bar) for the respondents.

VISCOUNT HALDANE, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said that the question was concerned with the validity of the British Columbia Fuel-Oil Tax Act, 1923, and especially with sections 3 and 6 of that Act. It was contended for the respondents that under section 92 of the British North America Act, 1867, there was no power in the Provincial Legislature to pass the statute, the ground being that the taxation attempted was not "direct." The purpose was to enact that every person who purchased within the Province fuel-oil sold for the first time after its manufacture in or importation into the Province should pay for provincial purposes a tax equal to ½c. per gallon on the oil so purchased.

By the definition clause "purchaser" was to mean "any person who within the Province purchased fuel-oil when sold for the first time after its manufacture in or importation into the Province." "Vendor" was to mean "any person who within the Province sells fuel-oil for the first time after its manufacture in or importation into the Province." By section 3 the purchaser was to pay the tax so defined. By section 4 the vendor, on the sale to the purchaser, was to levy and collect and pay it over to the Government. By section 6 every person who had in his possession for use or consumption fuel-oil on which the tax had not been paid was to pay it. The rest of the Act forbade the use of fuel-oil unless the tax had been paid, made an exception from liability to the tax for fuel-oil used in the operation of vessels plying between ports in the Province and ports outside the Dominion, and imposed penalties.

The first and cardinal question was whether the tax was direct or indirect within the meaning of the expressions used in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, 1867. If the tax was indirect, the respondents escaped wholly. Their Lordships entertained no doubt that, within the meaning placed on the language employed by a series of decisions in the Canadian Courts and in the Privy Council, the tax was indirect. If so, the statute in question was ultra vires.

In Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Attorney-General for Canada (41 The Times L.R., 409; [1925] A.C., 561) the Board held invalid an Act of Manitoba imposing a tax on persons selling grain for future delivery, notwithstanding that the Act declared in terms that the tax was a direct one. There was in that case an agreed statement that the ultimate price of the grain, which was called a "world price," was fixed, but it was little controlled by the producers and had to be looked to as covering all the items in the cost of production and transportation.

It was laid down by the Board that while a direct tax was one that was demanded from the very person who was intended or desired to pay it, an indirect tax was that which was demanded from one person in the expectation and with the intention that he should indemnify himself at the expense of another, as might be the case with Excise and Customs. A tax levied, as in that case the tax was, on brokers and agents and factors, as well as on sellers, obviously fell within the definition of indirect taxation. The meaning of the distinction had been settled by the exposition given of it by the political economists, whose broadly phrased definition had been adopted in earlier decisions, such as Attorney-General for Quebec v. Reed (10 App. Cas., 141, per Lord Selborne); Bank of Toronto v. Lambe (3 The Times L.R., 742; 12 App. Cas., 575, per Lord Hobhouse); and Brewers and Maltsters' Association of Ontario v. Attorney-General for Ontario (13 The Times L.R., 197; [1897] A.C., 231, per Lord Herschell).

It was true that the question of the meaning of the words used in sections 91 and 92 was one not of political economy but of law. Still, as Lord Hobhouse pointed out, the legislation must have contemplated some tangible dividing line referable to and ascertainable by the general tendencies of the tax and the common understanding of men as to those tendencies. The definition given by John Stuart Mill was, accordingly, taken as a fair basis for testing the character of the tax in question, not as a legal definition but as embodying with sufficient accuracy an understanding of the most obvious indicia of direct and indirect taxation, such as might be presumed to have been in the minds of those who passed the Act of 1867. Validity in accordance with such tendencies, and not according to results in isolated or merely particular instances, must be the test. The question of validity could not be made to impose on the Courts the duty of separating out individual instances in which the tax might operate directly from those to which the general purview of the taxation applied. An exhaustive partition would be an impracticable task.

Taking the principle so laid down as the guide to the solution of the present question, the result did not seem doubtful. There were two fuel-oil companies which were associated in business in a close fashion. The Union Oil Company of California sold its oil to the Union Company of Canada, which had large storage tanks at Vancouver which the former company kept replenished according to directions from the Canadian company. The respondents purchased oil in British Columbia from the latter company. It was sought to tax them as first purchasers under section 3, and as holders of the oil for consumption under section 6, which had to be read with reference to section 3. It might be true that, having regard to the practice of the respondents, the oil which they purchased was used by themselves alone and was not at present resold. But the respondents might develop their business so as to include resale of the oil which they had bought. The principle of construction as established was satisfied if that was practicable and did not for its application depend on the special circumstances of individual cases. Fuel-oil was a marketable commodity, and those who purchased it, even for their own use, acquired the right to take it into the market. It therefore came within the general principle which determined that the tax was an indirect one.

Other points were argued against the validity of the Act in question, as, for instance, that it contravened the special provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, in reference to Excise. On those points their Lordships abstained from expressing an opinion. The conclusion at which they had arrived rendered it unnecessary to discuss them and, in accordance with their practice, they accordingly avoided doing so. They agreed with the conclusion arrived at by all the Courts below, and they would humbly advise his Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

K.B. Div. (Salter, J.) } 1927. July 15.

WILLIAM BARKER (JUNIOR) AND CO., LIMITED v. ED. T. AGIUS, LIMITED.*

Contract—Sale of goods—Condition—Breach—Right of rejection—Whether validly exercised—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), ss. 11 (1) (c), 30 (3), 35.

The appellants sold to the respondents, for shipment from Hamburg to Liverpool, a cargo of coal to consist of briquettes, size 2in., the contract providing as follows:—

"Bills of lading to be accepted by buyers as absolute and conclusive proof of weight, quality, and description, the buyers having right of inspecting the cargo.

"No warranty is expressed or implied, and sellers accept no responsibility in regard to the description, size, quality, condition, or fitness for steaming purposes or otherwise of the coal or fuel contracted for or supplied, and no reduction in price will be made in respect of any such matters."

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The respondents required the coal to supply power stations, and at the time of the contract the appellants were aware of this. The cargo was shipped, some of it being in the holds and the remainder on deck and covering the hatch covers. On arrival at Liverpool the vessel had to wait for a discharging berth, and the captain, finding that the cargo in the holds was heating, bought the deck cargo from the respondents and removed it and opened the hatches. The respondents then found that though the briquettes on the deck were of the contractual size the briquettes in the holds were larger and were not suitable for use in power stations, and they gave notice of rejection of the whole cargo.

Held, on a case stated by an arbitrator, (1) that it was a condition of the contract that the briquettes should be of the size of 2in., and the condition was effective as the warranty clause dealt only with warranties as such and did not affect a condition ; (2) that the respondents had a right to reject the underdeck part of the cargo, but that as they had claimed the right to reject the whole cargo they had never validly exercised their right to reject the underdeck part ; and (3) that they were remitted to their right to recover damages for breach of a condition, namely, failure to ship a cargo in conformity with the contract.

In this case a dispute had arisen between buyers and sellers of German coal which was shipped to England during the coal strike of 1926. An arbitrator had made an award in the form of a special case, which now came on for argument. It raised a question as to the right under the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, of a buyer to give notice of rejection of the whole, or of part, of the goods purchased when he had already taken possession of and resold another part of the goods.

Mr. Bevan, K.C., and Mr. Willink appeared for the appellants, the sellers ; and Mr. Miller, K.C., and Mr. Chapple for the respondents, the buyers.

During the coal strike of 1926 the buyers, William Barker (Junior) and Co., Limited, arranged to buy from the sellers, Ed. T. Agius, Limited, a quantity of German coal. The coal was shipped at Hamburg, some of it being in the holds and the remainder on deck and covering the hatch covers. The vessel arrived at Liverpool, but had to wait for a discharging berth. The captain found that the cargo in the holds was heating. To be able to reach it he bought the deck cargo from the buyers and removed it and opened the hatches. The buyers then for the first time inspected the cargo in the holds, and found that it was not of the contract description. They then gave notice of rejection of the whole cargo, but the sellers contended that as the buyers had dealt with part of the cargo by selling it to the captain the right to reject had been lost. The arbitrator decided in favour of the buyers, subject to the opinion of the Court on a special case.

By a contract in writing dated October 26, 1926, Messrs. Agius sold to Messrs. Barker two cargoes of 1,500 tons (10 per cent. more or less) of brown coal briquettes, size 2in. The first cargo was to be shipped "about" November 9 and the second "within" November 20. Delivery was to be on the Elbe, f.o.b., and payment was to be net cash against documents at a named bank in London. The price was 34s. per ton of 1,000 kilos, exclusive of trimming, and the buyers undertook to take delivery of the coal whether the coal strike in England continued or not.

Particular clauses of the contract which were here material were as follows :—

"Bills of lading to be accepted by buyers as absolute and conclusive proof of weight, quality, and description, the buyers having right of inspecting the cargo.

"No warranty is expressed or implied, and sellers accept no responsibility in regard to the description, size, quality, condition, or fitness for steaming purposes or otherwise of the coal or fuel contracted for or supplied, and no reduction in price will be made in respect of any such matters."

The arbitrator found facts as follows :—

1. At the time of making the contract the sellers were aware that the buyers required the briquettes to supply power stations.

2. The cargo now in question was shipped in purported fulfilment as to one cargo under the contract on a vessel chartered by the buyers (the s.s. Slemish) at Hamburg about November 16, 1926, and was loaded in the four holds and on the deck. The deck cargo was loaded not only on deck but also on the hatch covers. When the vessel left Hamburg the deck cargo consisted of about 40 tons, but about 15 tons were lost on the voyage, so that only 25 tons arrived at Liverpool. The deck cargo consisted of briquettes of the contractual size of 2in., but the underdeck cargo in all four holds consisted in the main of briquettes substantially larger than the contractual size.

3. The cargo was shipped by suppliers who had sold it to a firm who sold it to the sellers, and the sellers were not aware until the buyers so informed them that any part of the underdeck cargo was not of the contractual size.

4. The vessel arrived at Liverpool on November 26, 1926, and the buyers paid on receipt of the bill of lading. An invoice from the sellers described the coal as "brown coal briquettes size 2in."

5. On the vessel's arrival there was no berth available and the cargo was heated. Mr. Barker on November 28 went on board and inspected the deck cargo, neither thinking, nor having reason to think, that it differed in any way from the underdeck cargo.

6. On December 6 the captain became alarmed at the heated condition of the cargo, and, wanting to open the hatches and get at the underdeck cargo, he offered to buy the deck cargo. The buyers sold the deck cargo to the master solely to help him and to secure the safety of the ship on the terms that no freight should be payable on it. The captain then had the deck cargo moved into the bunkers, this being the most reasonable and practicable means of getting it removed from the deck. The sellers did not know until the hearing before the arbitrator that the buyers had disposed of the deck cargo in this way.

7. On December 10 the covers were taken off the hatches and the buyers for the first time inspected the underdeck cargo, and discovered that the greater part of it was not of the contract size and was not suitable for use in power stations. Thereupon they wrote to the sellers declining to accept the cargo. On December 16 the cargo in the holds was discharged without prejudice to the rights of the parties.

The arbitrator held that it was a condition of the contract that the cargo should consist of briquettes of the size of 2in., and that, by reason of the composition of the underdeck cargo, the sellers committed a breach of that condition. The buyers could have inspected the cargo during the loading at Hamburg, and, if they had done so, they would have found that in the main it was not of the contractual size. In the circumstances, however, it was not unreasonable on their part to delay inspection until December 10.

"(a) Whether, on a true construction of the contract and on the facts as found, it was a condition of the contract that the briquettes should be of the size of 2in. ? (b) Whether, on a true construction of the documents and on the facts found, the buyers had a right to reject the underdeck cargo and validly exercised it ? (c) Whether, on a true construction of the documents and on the facts found, if the buyers had no right to reject, or, having one, did not validly exercise it, the buyers were entitled to recover such damages as they could prove from the failure to ship a cargo in conformity with the contract ? "

Mr. BEVAN, for the sellers, contended that the buyers had no right to reject. On a true construction of the contract it was not a condition that the briquettes should be of 2in. size. It was expressly provided that the sellers accepted no responsibility in regard, amongst other things, to size or description. Size was therefore not a condition of the contract, or, if it was held to be a condition, it was not actionable. Further, by the terms of the contract the bill of lading had to be accepted as conclusive evidence that goods of the contract description had been shipped. By taking the bill of lading the buyers agreed to accept the coal actually shipped as being in accordance with the contract.

On the facts, the buyers never made an effectual rejection. A buyer who thought himself entitled to reject must elect to do so within a reasonable time and must notify the seller of his election, and here the buyers did not give notice of rejection until they had already re-sold part of the cargo.

He referred to sections 11, 30, and 35 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Mr. MILLER, for the buyers, submitted that the right of inspection continued until the goods arrived at Liverpool. The provision in the contract that no warranty was given with regard to size must be ignored, for the size of two inches was specified in the body of the contract and was of vital importance to it and the buyers could not be forced to accept something which was not of the contract description.

He referred to Hardy and Co. v. Hillerns and Fowler (39 The Times L.R., 547 ; [1923] 2 K.B., 490) ; Cunningham v. Munro (28 Com Cas., 42) ; Moore and Co. v. Landauer and Co. (37 The Times L.R., 52, 452 ; [1921] 1 K.B., 73 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 519).

Section 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, gave a clear right to reject that part of the goods delivered which did not comply with the contract. By the correspondence it was evident that this was what the buyers here did. Rejection of the whole must operate as a rejection of that part of the whole which was still capable of rejection, so that even if the letter of rejection here was held to be a rejection of the whole it would still be valid in regard to that part which could still be rejected.

With regard to the point that the contract excluded any warranty as to size he referred to Wimble, Sons, and Co. v. Lillico and Son (38 The Times L.R., 296) ; Wallis, Son, and Wells v. Pratt and Haynes (26 The Times L.R., 572 ; [1910] 2 K.B., 1003 ; 27 The Times L.R., 431 ; [1911] A.C., 394). An exclusion clause, such as there was in this case, could not do away with the fundamental obligation of the contract.

Mr. WILLINK replied. The intention of the contract was that the buyers should inspect the coal at Hamburg on shipment and that from that moment the matter was to be closed. If the buyers took the risk of not inspecting at Hamburg they could not afterwards complain.

Section 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, had never been the subject of judicial decision. It only contemplated the case of the whole of the contract goods being properly delivered and having with them, by mistake or for some other reason, other goods which had nothing to do with the contract. The contract in this case was one for the sale of a whole cargo and was not severable. The buyers must be deemed to have accepted the whole of the cargo, as provided by section 35 of the Act.

The clause in the contract "no warranty is expressed or implied . . ." was so express and clear that it could not be overridden by anything in the other parts of the contract.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER said that originally the contract was for the sale of two cargoes, but by agreement that was varied and there was now only a contract for the sale of one cargo of 1,500 tons more or less "size two inches." The first question was whether the words "size two inches" constituted a condition of the contract. The briquettes were in fact required for use in the furnaces of power stations, and it was essential to their fitness for this purpose that they should be of the specified size. The sellers knew that the briquettes were intended for use in power stations, but the case did not find that they knew also that the size was essential. In the circumstances he had no doubt that the words "size two inches" were part of the description under which the goods were sold and were a condition of the contract.

Then the question arose whether it was an effective condition. The sellers contended that it was not, for two reasons. They said that the bill of lading clause meant that the buyers had the right to inspect the goods on shipment at Hamburg, and that after the issue of the bill of lading they could not dispute any statement in it as to weight, quality, or description, unless some inaccuracy was in fact discovered on inspection at Liverpool. In his opinion the words meant that inasmuch as the buyers had the right to inspect before the bill of lading was issued they were bound by any statement which the bill of lading contained as to weight, quality, or description ; but the matter now in issue was size, and as to size the bill of lading said nothing. There was therefore nothing in the bill of lading point to prevent the condition from being effective. The other reason relied on by the sellers was the clause, "No warranty is expressed or implied . . . in regard to size." If those words had stood alone, they might have affected the position, but in his view the warranty clause must be read as a whole, with reference to description, quality, condition, or fitness, as well as size, and he thought that it only dealt with warranties as such and did not affect a condition. He therefore held that the words "size two inches" were a condition, and an effective condition, of the contract.

The next question raised by the arbitrator was whether the buyers had a right to reject the underdeck cargo, and whether, if they had such a right, they had validly exercised it. The arbitrator did not rely on the fact that the buyers acted in an emergency, and the fact that there was an emergency need not be considered. The case was one in which the full contract quantity, and no more, had been delivered, and, before the cargo in the holds had been seen, the buyers thought fit to sell the cargo on deck. Was the right to reject the whole, or the underdeck part, of the cargo lost by the taking over and disposal of the part of the cargo on deck? That involved the consideration of sections 11 (1) (c), 30 (3), and 35 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893.

Section 11 (1) (c) provided that, where a contract of sale was not severable and the buyer had accepted part of the goods, the breach of any condition to be fulfilled by the seller could only be treated as a breach of warranty and not as a ground for rejecting the goods and for treating the contract as repudiated. If the matter had been free from authority, he personally should have thought that that subsection governed this case. The word "rejection" there was equivalent to rescission, and meant that the buyer would say that the tender of non-contract goods was a breach of the contract and entitled him to treat the contract as repudiated by the seller. For himself, in the absence of authority, he would have held that the effect of this subsection was that if a buyer so dealt with part of the goods tendered that he could not return the whole to the seller then he could not claim to return the part which he had not dealt with; if there was an unseverable contract and the buyer chose to accept and re-sell part of the goods tendered under it he could not return to the seller the other part of the goods.

Then section 30 (3) provided that where a seller delivered to a buyer the goods which he contracted to sell, mixed with goods of a different description not included in the contract, the buyer might accept the goods which were in accordance with the contract and reject the rest or might reject the whole. Dealing with that clause, in the absence of authority, he should have thought that it only referred to a case in which the seller had delivered the whole of the contract goods together with other goods which had nothing to do with the contract; but that construction had not been adopted.

Then section 35 provided that a buyer was deemed to have accepted goods when the goods had been delivered to him and he did any act in relation to them which was inconsistent with the ownership of the seller.

The position, however, was not free from authority. His Lordship then discussed the effect of Moore and Co. v. Landauer and Co. (37 The Times L.R., 452; [1921] 2 K.B., 519); Cunningham v. Munro (28 Com. Cas., 42), and Hardy and Co. v. Hillerns and Fowler (39 The Times L.R., 547; [1923] 2 K.B., 490), where Lord Justice Bankes approved of a dictum of Mr. Justice Greer, and said that any opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Greer, even if obiter, could not be neglected, particularly when it had been approved obiter in the Court of Appeal. The authorities were perhaps not strictly binding on him, but in view of the opinions expressed in them he felt that it would not be right to follow his own view of the effect of the sections. He therefore held that the buyers had the right to accept and deal with the 25 tons of cargo which was on deck and to reject that which was in the hold.

Assuming then that the buyers had the right to reject that part, did they validly exercise the right? [His Lordship dealt with the correspondence and with the conduct of the buyers, and came to the conclusion on the facts that the buyers had claimed to reject the whole, and that the right to reject only the underdeck part of the cargo had never been exercised.]

That being so, the buyers were remitted to their right to recover damages for breach of contract, and the sellers contended that the clause "No warranty is expressed or implied . . ." prevented the buyers from recovering any damages. But he thought that that point was disposed of by the decision in Wallis, Son, and Wells v. Pratt and Haynes (27 The Times L.R., 431; [1911] A.C., 394, at p. 395). The condition in the contract remained a condition and was not degraded into a mere warranty, and the provision excluding claims for a breach of warranty did not apply to exclude claims for breach of a condition.

The questions asked by the arbitrator must, therefore, be answered as follows:—(a) Yes. (b) The buyers had the right to reject the underdeck part of the cargo, but did not exercise it. (c) Yes.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1927. July 25.

MIDLAND BANK, LIMITED v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue—Stamp duties—Receipt forms issued by bank to customers—Availability for payment either to customer or to holder—Limitation to sums under £2—Whether subject to the same stamp duty as cheques—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., c. 39), s. 32.

The appellant bank introduced a scheme by which their customers could obtain free of charge a book of receipts containing forms which, when filled up, could be presented by a customer for payment at a branch of the bank or could be handed to a tradesman or other creditor in settlement of a debt and then presented by him for payment. The receipt forms were available only for the payment of sums under £2 and the bank contended that the forms did not require to be stamped with a 2d. cheque stamp.

Held, that as such a document "entitled" the recipient, within the meaning of s. 32 of the Stamp Act, 1891, to payment of the sum mentioned, it was subject to the same stamp duty as a cheque.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue pursuant to section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891. The case raised the question whether receipt forms issued to their customers by the Midland Bank for sums under £2 were subject to stamp duty.

On June 28, 1927, and July 4, 1927, respectively,

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

two instruments were presented on behalf of the Midland Bank, Limited (the appellants) by their solicitors to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue (the respondents) under the provisions of section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty, if any, with which the instruments were respectively chargeable.

The following was a copy of instrument No. 1 :—

"This receipt must only be used for amounts under £2.

0975 A

Paid 24th Jun. 1927.

Received of 24th June, 1927.

MIDLAND BANK LIMITED,

The following was a copy of instrument No. 2 :—

"This receipt must only be used for amounts under £2.

0976 A

Paid 2nd July 1927

Received of 30th June, 1927.

MIDLAND BANK LIMITED,

the sum of ten shillings at the debit of {my / our} account.

10. 0.
D/A

Coutts & Co. Strand 11.

T G. E. BALDRY."

Both instruments were unstamped.

The facts were as follows :—

During May, 1927, the appellants caused it to be publicly announced that they had been considering the objection which many people raised to the opening or more frequent use of a banking account—namely, the requirement of a stamp on every cheque drawn, and that to overcome that objection they had devised a new means of payment which should provide an added encouragement to the opening of a bank account. The bank announced that in future customers of the bank might obtain free of charge from any branch a "book of receipts" containing a number of forms which, being available only for the payment of sums under £2, would not require to be stamped.

The receipt form, somewhat similar in appearance to a cheque, would bear upon its face the wording "Received of the Midland Bank Limited..... Branch, the sum of ....." and provided space for the date, the amount in words and in figures, and the customer's signature. When the receipt had been filled in, it might be presented for payment in cash at the branch on which it was drawn, or handed to a tradesman or other creditor in settlement of a debt. In this and several other respects it possessed the advantages of a cheque.

The bank announced that the new system was to be put into operation forthwith and that books of receipts were available for old or new customers at any of the 1,940 branches of the bank in England and Wales. The effect of this statement was widely reproduced in the public Press. Mr. G. E. Baldry, who signed both of the instruments to which this case related, was a customer of the appellants and had had, at all material times, a current account in credit at the Threadneedle-street branch of the appellants. He signed and delivered to the appellants a request in the following terms, on a form of request supplied by the appellants for the purpose :—

"Midland Bank Limited.
"Threadneedle-street Branch.

"I/We request you to allow me/us to withdraw from time to time from my/our account with you sums under £2 each against delivery to you of receipts addressed to you and duly signed by me/us and I/we authorize you to pay the amount of such receipts to the bearer thereof and to debit the same to my/our account.

"Dated this 24th day of June, 1927.

"(Signature) G. E. BALDRY.

"Address—9, St. Mildred's-court, Poultry, E.C.2."

Thereupon the appellants delivered to Mr. Baldry a book of detachable forms to be used by him if he so desired. The instruments presented for adjudication were in that form. Each one of the forms was so marked, printed, lettered and numbered as to be separately identifiable by the appellants.

On June 24, 1927, the sum of 10s. was paid by a Mr. James to, and received by, Mr. Baldry. A liability was thereby created on the part of Mr. Baldry for payment of a like sum to Mr. James. Mr. Baldry thereupon signed one of the forms detached from his book of receipts, being instrument No. 1, and handed it to Mr. James, and it was the expectation of both parties that the instrument should be used by Mr. James for obtaining from the appellants payment of a sum of 10s. to be debited to Mr. Baldry's account in discharge of such liability by production and delivery of the instrument to the appellants by Mr. James, either personally or through his own bankers. The instrument was, in fact, so used by Mr. James.

Mr. James was a customer of the Threadneedle-street branch of the appellants and delivered the instrument to the cashier at that branch over the counter. The document was accepted and Mr. Baldry's account with the appellants was debited with the sum of 10s. and Mr. James's account with the appellants was credited with the like sum. The endorsement "Paid 24th June, 1927," appearing by means of a rubber stamp on instrument No. 1, was made by the appellants.

On June 30, 1927, the sum of 10s. was paid by a Mr. W. H. Beaumont to, and received by, Mr. Baldry. In this case Mr. Baldry detached instrument No. 2, which he handed to Mr. Beaumont. Mr. Beaumont was a customer of Messrs. Coutts and Co., bankers, of 440, Strand, and he delivered the instrument to Messrs. Coutts and Co.'s cashier with instructions to obtain payment of the sum of 10s. from the appellants. Messrs. Coutts and Co.'s representative attended at the Threadneedle-street branch of the appellants on July 2 and requested payment of the sum of 10s. in exchange for instrument No. 2. The sum of 10s. was paid to Messrs. Coutts and Co.'s representative, who handed over to the appellants instrument No. 2, and the account of Mr. G. E. Baldry at the Threadneedle-street branch of the appellants was debited with the amount. The endorsement, "Paid 2nd July, 1927," appearing by means of a rubber stamp on instrument No. 2, was made by the appellants. The endorsement, "Coutts and Co. Strand 11," appearing on instrument No. 2 by means of a rubber stamp, was made by Messrs. Coutts and Co.

The Commissioners expressed their opinion that each of the instruments presented for adjudication was a bill of exchange within the true intent and meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, and, being payable on demand, or at sight or on presentation, was chargeable with the duty of 2d. under that Act and section 36 of the Finance Act, 1918. The appellants declared themselves dissatisfied with the determination of the Commissioners on the ground that neither instrument was a bill of exchange within the meaning and effect of the Stamp Act, 1891. They, therefore, in pursuance of section 13 of the Stamp Act, 1891, required the Commissioners to state a case.

The question for the opinion of the Court as respects each of the instruments presented for adjudication was whether it was chargeable with the duty of 2d. applicable to a bill of exchange payable on demand, or, if not, whether it was liable to any duty, or whether it was exempt from duty.

Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. Andrewes-Uthwatt appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), and Mr. J. H. Stamp for the Commissioners.

Mr. GODDARD contended that there were three, and only three, ways in which the receipts could be used:—(1) For collection of a sum under £2 from the bank by the customer personally; (2) for collection from the bank of a sum under £2 by an agent for the customer; (3) for payment of a sum under £2 to a person not an agent of the customer. In his submission, both the documents in this case stood on the same footing and the fact that in one case the money was collected through a bank would make no difference.

A document was stampable according to its tenor; the same document could not be stampable in one set of circumstances and not stampable in another set of circumstances. Section 32 of the Stamp Act, 1891, defined "bill of exchange" as follows:—

"For the purposes of this Act, the expression 'bill of exchange' includes draft, order, cheque, and letter of credit, and any document or writing (except a bank note) entitling or purporting to entitle any person, whether named therein or not, to payment by any other person of, or to draw upon any other person for, any sum of money, and the expression 'bill of exchange payable on demand' includes—(a) An order for the payment of any sum of money by a bill of exchange or promissory note, or for the delivery of any bill of exchange or promissory note in satisfaction of any sum of money, or for the payment of any sum of money out of any particular fund which may or may not be available, or upon any condition or contingency which may or may not be performed or happen. . . ."

"Bill of exchange" for stamp purposes was an arbitrary thing having no relation to "bill of exchange" as defined in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. The Stamp Act, 1891, was aimed at documents, not transactions. If a transaction could be carried out in two ways, of which one required the use of a document and the other did not, it was quite legitimate to carry it out without the document and so avoid the stamp. It was only one step farther to say that if a transaction could be carried out either by a document requiring a stamp, or by a document not requiring a stamp, the one which did not require a stamp could be used and the Inland Revenue could not say:—"Because you might have used a document which requires a stamp you must stamp the document which you have in fact used." (Inland Revenue Commissioners v. G. Angus and Co. (5 The Times L.R., 697; 23 Q.B.D., 579); Brown, Shipley and Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (11 The Times L.R., 585; [1895] 2 Q.B., 598).

The document in this case purported to be nothing but a receipt; it bore no payee's name. If it required no stamp when filled in by a customer and presented by him, it required no stamp in any circumstances; otherwise the Inland Revenue would be stamping, not the document, but the transaction, and an inquiry would be necessary into each case. A clerk might go with two of those receipts; one to get £1 for his employer and one to get £1 which his employer owed him—one would be stampable and the other not.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—I suppose you do not receive a salary from the Exchequer? I do, quarterly. The document is always in the form of a receipt, and till a year or two ago I had to stamp the receipt. [Receipts for salary were exempted from duty by section 36 of the Finance Act, 1924.]

MR. GODDARD, continuing, said that the Crown must show that section 32 of the Stamp Act, 1891, was as comprehensive as section 17 of the Revenue Act, 1883. These receipts would have come within the definition in that section:—

"Sections 76 to 82, both inclusive, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 . . . shall extend to any document issued by a customer of any banker, and intended to enable any person or body corporate to obtain payment from such banker of the sum mentioned in such document, and shall so extend in like manner as if the said document were a cheque.

"Provided that nothing in this Act shall be deemed to render any such document a negotiable instrument. . . ."

These documents did not entitle the holder to payment from anyone. He could not sue the bank. If he wished to sue the customer he would have to do so on the original consideration, not on the document. Counsel distinguished Rothschild and Sons v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (10 The Times L.R., 328; [1894] 2 Q.B., 142) and Committee of London Clearing Bankers v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (12 The Times L.R., 283; [1896] 1 Q.B., 542).

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that he did not differ from the statement that a person was at liberty to select, if he could, a way of carrying out a transaction which avoided stamp duty, nor from the statement that one stamped documents, not transactions. But he did not agree that it was always irrelevant to consider the user of the document. By section 12 (2) of the Stamp Act, 1891 (the adjudication section),

"The Commissioners may require to be furnished with an abstract of the instrument, and also with such evidence as they may deem necessary in order to show to their satisfaction whether all the facts and circumstances affecting the liability of the instrument to duty, or the amount of the duty chargeable thereon, are fully and truly set forth therein."

These documents were clearly to enable a person to obtain money. Counsel drew attention to the caution inside the book—the ordinary caution which most banks put in their cheque-books—in particular, "the bank reserves the right not to honour receipts drawn against uncleared cheques." This document was a new invention of the Midland Bank and its purpose and effect had to be considered.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—When the very first bill of exchange was drawn—which was probably longer ago than people think—the right of recourse must have been a matter of arrangement.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—Clearly : then it became custom, then law merchant and, ultimately, statute law. The question whether one could sue on the document under discussion was immaterial. It was a document entitling the recipient to get the money from the Midland Bank and, as they themselves said, it possessed some of the advantages of a cheque. The form signed by the customer bore out the Crown's view. The bargain between the parties was that the document should entitle the bearer to payment and oblige the bank to pay.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—But is it a "document entitling" the bearer to payment ?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—It is the document and nothing else which entitles him to payment. It is only by presenting the document that the bearer could get the money. What had to be looked at was the substance of the transaction effected by the document, not its language only.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—You say that this document meant to every one concerned exactly what a cheque meant ?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL.—Yes. The effect of the arrangement between the banker and the customer was that it should operate as an order for payment. He referred to the cases cited by Mr. Goddard. In Rothschild and Sons v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (supra) the document was not an order to anyone to pay, but the Court said that they must look at the real transaction effected.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL also referred to Great Western Railway Company v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (10 The Times L.R., 128 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., 507, at p. 513) ; Mortgage Insurance Corporation, Limited v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (4 The Times L.R., 172, 173 ; 20 Q.B.D., 645 ; 4 The Times L.R., 710 ; 21 Q.B.D., 352). The Revenue Act of 1883 was narrower, not wider, than the Stamp Act, 1891. It was intended to bring certain documents within the crossed-cheque provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and it employed language taken from the Stamp Act, 1870.

Mr. GODDARD, in reply, said that to inquire into surrounding circumstances to see whether a document, prima facie liable to duty, fell within any exemption was a totally different thing from inquiring into surrounding circumstances to see whether a document, which on its face contained nothing to make it liable to stamp duty, could be brought within the purview of the duty by its use in a transaction not apparent on the face of the document.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT read the following considered judgment :—In this case the facts and documents make it abundantly clear that these so-called receipts were designed to serve the purpose of cheques, in that they were intended (to use the most neutral term that occurs to me) to put the money at the disposal of the persons to whom they were handed. They are not, however, cheques, and if it had been attempted to tax them as such because the transaction might have been effected by cheques, that attempt would have been defeated by the well-known principle exactly exemplified in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. G. Angus and Co. (5 The Times L.R., 697 ; 23 Q.B.D., 579). That is the point of that case. Here the tax is claimed not as if the documents had been cheques, or anything else which they are not, but because (so it is said) they are in themselves "documents entitling" a person to a payment by another person—which is a substantive subject of tax. I say "in themselves" because that raises a question which must be faced. If there is another advantage which accrues to the holder of a document by virtue of another arrangement dehors the document, the effect of that arrangement cannot be imputed to this document (if I may use that expression) so as to attract to it any duty to which a document embodying such an arrangement would be liable. That is made clear by Brown, Shipley and Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (11 The Times L.R., 585 ; [1895] 2 Q.B., 598). Mr. Goddard says that this is such a case, and, if it is, he is right.

He contends that what the recipient of this document gets is the benefit of a promise to him by the person who signs it that the bank will pay the money. But the Crown are not asking for duty as upon such a promise and Mr. Goddard does not say that they are. What he is really saying is a totally different thing—namely, that in considering what the document itself does, one has to look at the mere words in the document in the abstract, apart from the function of the document as intended and understood by the parties who employ it. That proposition, as it seems to me, receives no support from Brown, Shipley and Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (supra) and is negatived by the decision in Rothschild and Sons v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (10 The Times L.R., 328 ; [1894] 2 Q.B., 142), where Mr. Justice Mathew, at pages 146 and 147, treats himself as entitled to have regard (I quote his own words) to "what the document is and how it is used."

What, therefore, is this document and how is it used ? It is referred to as a receipt. But it is not a receipt unless and until it is used as such by being given as an acknowledgment of payment. When the person signing it gives it to his creditor he is not giving a receipt, and if it were for an amount of £2 or upwards he would not incur a penalty under section 103 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for giving a receipt not duly stamped. What, then, is it when it is used as it is here ?

The words of it, upon which Mr. Goddard says we are to concentrate, describe nothing occurring between the signatory and the recipient, and unless we are permitted to inquire what is the meaning of its existence in the hands of the bearer we must say that, as a document, it has at this stage effected nothing at all ; it has not indeed come into operation. If, as I think, this inquiry cannot be excluded, we find that it has effected something ; that it has come into operation as a delivered document and that (subject to one question as to the meaning of the word "entitled") its function has been to entitle the recipient to payment of the sum mentioned in it. Mr. Goddard correctly pointed out that the holder of this document cannot sue the bank, nor, upon the document itself, the signatory. I think, however, that the case of Committee of London Clearing Bankers v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (12 The Times L.R., 283 ; [1896] 1 Q.B., 542) shows clearly that no such right of action is necessary to bring a document within the phrase under discussion.

For these reasons I think that my decision must be in favour of the Commissioners, with costs.

BAKER v. ARCHER-SHEE.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Foreign securities, stocks and shares, and other foreign property —Whether foreign possessions — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Case V., rule 2.

A testator, who was a citizen of the United States, left his property to trustees in that country to be applied to the use of his daughter for life. The fund constituted under the will consisted of "foreign Government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property." The appellant, who resided in England, married the testator's daughter, and was assessed to income-tax on the income under Schedule D.

The trustees of the fund were a New York company, which was entitled to payment for its services, and the estate had been fully administered. The income was subject to American income-tax. It was admitted at the Bar that the income was not remitted to this country but was paid into a New York bank to the order of the testator's daughter, less the trustees' commission and the American income-tax.

By Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, residents in the United Kingdom are taxable under that Schedule on all property, wherever situate, except that by rule 2 of Case V. of that Schedule tax on income from foreign possessions other than stocks, shares, or rents, is to be computed only on so much as is actually received in this country.

The Special Commissioners of Income Tax decided that the assessment was good, but stated a case.

Held (Viscount Sumner and Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that as the estate had been fully administered the right of the respondent's wife, if American law was the same as English law, was not merely a right to the balance sum left after deducting the commission and American income-tax, but she was entitled in equity to the dividends, and the right was not a foreign possession, other than stocks, shares, or rents, within rule 2 of Case V., and the case must be referred back to the Special Commissioners to state, (a) The particulars of the "foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property" sufficiently to show first, which of them were, in their opinion, "securities" within Case IV., rule 1, and, secondly, which of them were, in their opinion, "stocks, shares or rents" under Case V., rule 1, and thirdly, which were, in their opinion, "possessions out of the United Kingdom other than stocks, shares, or rents" under Case V., rule 2, and (b) which of those they had assessed on the income of the year of assessment and which on the average of the three preceding years; and (c) that the sums paid into the New York bank had not been in whole or in part remitted to the United Kingdom.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 594; [1927] 1 K.B., 109) reversed.

This was an appeal by the Crown from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 594; [1927] 1 K.B., 109) reversing an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (42 The Times L.R., 367) on a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

By the will, made in New York, of Alfred Pell, a citizen of the United States and the father of the respondent's wife, Lady Archer-Shee, therein described as "my daughter Frances," it was directed, after various specific bequests, that the executors and trustees of the will should hold in trust all the testator's real and personal estate upon trust (inter alia)

"That in the event that my said wife shall die leaving no issue by me her surviving the whole of the said income and profits shall thereafter be applied to the use of my said daughter, Frances, during her life."

The will also gave power in events which in due course happened for a trust company incorporated under the laws of the State of New York to be appointed an executor and trustee with like powers as the original executors and trustees, which included power to retain and hold, or change, investments and to reinvest as they might deem expedient in their discretion. In 1904, on the death of the testator's widow leaving no issue, Lady Archer-Shee became entitled to the income of the trust fund for her life under the provision of the will above set out. That fund consisted of foreign Government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property.

In 1914 the Trust Company of New York was appointed to be executor and trustee of the will, and at all material times was sole executor and trustee.

Paragraph 4 of the case stated by the Special Commissioners was as follows:—

"During the three years ending 5th April, 1925, the appellant (the present respondent) was married to the said daughter (Frances) of Alfred Pell, who was entitled to have the whole of the income and profits from the said fund applied to her use. The Trust Company of New York have paid over such part of the sums which they received from the said fund as they considered to be income as the same accrued to her to her order at Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Company's bank in New York while retaining in their own possession such sums as they thought might be required to comply with the income-tax or other provisions of American Law."

In these circumstances, the question to be determined was whether the amount which the American Trust Company paid in the course of a year to Lady Archer-Shee's account in New York was income arising from specific securities and stocks and shares within Case IV. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, or within rule 1 of the Rules applicable to Case V., or was income arising from a foreign possession within rule 2 of the Rules applicable to

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Case V. It was not disputed that the respondent was chargeable under the Act for his wife's income. If the income was income arising from stocks and shares or from securities the respondent was liable to income-tax, whether the income was received in the United Kingdom or not, but if it was derived from foreign possessions he was liable only if it was remitted to the United Kingdom.

The respondent was assessed to income-tax by the Additional Commissioners for the Division of St. James's, Westminster, under the Fourth Case of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of income which included the interest arising from the securities forming part of the aforesaid trust fund for the income-tax years 1923-24 and 1924-25 as being income belonging to his wife. He appealed to the Special Commissioners against the assessments, and contended that only so much of the interest in question as was remitted to his wife in the United Kingdom was chargeable to income-tax.

It was contended that such income was assessable only under the Second Rule of Case V. of Schedule D as being income from a foreign possession (not being stocks, shares, or rents)—namely, the right which the respondent's wife had under the will of her father to have the trusts duly administered; and that the specific interest from the specific securities was not the income of the wife, and that the right of the wife under the trusts of the will was not a foreign security.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant, the inspector of taxes, that the income receivable under the will by the respondent's wife arose from the specific securities, stocks, and shares which formed part of the trust fund, and that it was chargeable to income-tax in respect of the full amount under the Rules of Case IV. of Schedule D, in so far as it was interest arising from securities whether it was actually remitted to the United Kingdom or not; and, similarly, under the First Rule of Case V., in so far as it arose from stocks or shares.

The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the inspector of taxes.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Warrington, and Lord Justice Sargant).

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the appellant; Mr. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. Edwardes Jones, K.C., for the respondent.

Viscount Sumner.—My Lords: In this case the respondent was assessed by Additional Commissioners in respect of the income-tax years 1923-24 and 1924-25. His appeal to the Special Commissioners failed. Their decision was in turn affirmed by Mr. Justice Rowlatt, but was set aside by the Court of Appeal. Hence the present appeal.

The respondent's wife was born in the United States. Under the will of her father, Mr. Alfred Pell, of New York, she is entitled, as tenant for life, to the income of a considerable estate now held in trust by the Trust Company of New York. So far as concerns the present appeal it is in respect of his wife's interest under this trust that the respondent is charged with tax.

Paragraph 2 of the case of the appellant, the inspector of taxes, runs thus:—"The question arising in this appeal is whether for income-tax purposes the income of foreign securities, held by the trustee of a foreign will resident abroad upon trusts which entitled the respondent's wife to the income during her life, belonged to the respondent's wife so as to be chargeable to income-tax under Case 4 of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, whether such income was remitted to the United Kingdom or not." In different words the respondent's case states the question to the like effect, and counsel so argued it on both sides.

The case stated sets out the relevant sections of the will. In the events which happened the whole income and profits of the trust estate were to be applied to the use of Lady Archer-Shee during her life. The trust fund consisted, in the years now in question, of foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property. The case stated says:—

"During the three years ending April 5, 1925, the appellant was married to the said daughter of Alfred Pell, who was entitled to have the whole of the income and profits from the said fund applied to her use."

So far it merely follows the will. It proceeds:—

"The Trust Company of New York have paid over such part of the sums which they received from the said fund as they considered to be income, as the same accrued, to her order at Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Company's Bank in New York, while retaining in their own possession such sums as they thought might be required to comply with the income-tax or other provisions of American law."

This is, in effect, a finding that no profits or gains in specie, arising from any particular trust investment, have been paid to Lady Archer-Shee at all. The trustees have throughout retained the receipt and control of the income from all sources. Your Lordships were told by the respondent's counsel, without contradiction, that the sums actually paid to Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Co. for Lady Archer-Shee's account were not remitted to her in this country, but were spent by her in the United States, and it has been the appellant's contention throughout, as the case stated recites, that the income arising from the trust property was taxable here, whether actually remitted to the United Kingdom or not. In truth the issue, as raised, is independent of the proportions in which the trust fund is made up of securities, shares, and other foreign possessions, and this is no doubt the reason why the Special Commissioners, with the concurrence of both parties, have thought it unnecessary to define those proportions.

There is no finding as to the law of the State of New York and, in accordance with the settled rule, we must presume that the general law of New York which is here relevant—namely, the law of trusts and wills, is the same as our own. How far any such presumption arises with regard to statutory law and particularly to revenue statutes is another matter. I am sure no well-wisher of the State of New York would willingly suppose that the income-tax law there prevailing is expressed in the same terms as our own.

Though the Attorney-General conceded at your Lordships' Bar that tax should not be claimed on any sums rightly deducted by the trustee before making payment to Lady Archer-Shee's New York bank, I still think that the Inland Revenue is logically committed to its original contention that, because she is the beneficiary for life under a trust vested in a New York trustee, she is now chargeable to English tax in a greater measure than if she had made these investments herself and had owned them absolutely at law, instead of being merely beneficially entitled to their income for life in equity. This broad contention is variously expressed, viz.:—(a) that the respondent was rightly assessed in respect of income arising from "securities out of the United Kingdom belonging to his wife" (Reason 1); (b) that the income of the securities, forming part of the trust fund, "belongs to the respondent's wife" (Reason 2); and (c) that it arose from the specific investments which constituted the trust fund, and must be charged upon the husband accordingly "in the full amount, whether actually remitted to this country or not." Accordingly we have to consider two kinds of question. (a) Does the income of a trust fund "belong" to the beneficiary, so that the beneficiary is chargeable as if it arose and accrued to him directly as his, and, if so, (b) is the amount so chargeable the gross amount paid by way of interest or dividend on the investments, or only the net amount received by the beneficiary after deduction of the tax and other charges, which the trustees have necessarily to pay out of the gross income of the trust fund which comes to them?

My Lords, the position of the equitable tenant for life and of the investments which form the trust fund, is so clear, both in law and in equity, that, apart from any special prescriptions, express or implied, of the law relating to income-tax, there can, I think, be no doubt about them.

The trustee has the full legal property in the whole of the trust fund and the beneficiary has not. Apart from special provisions in particular settlements, which do not affect the general principle, the trustee is not the agent of the beneficiary, who can neither appoint nor dismiss him. She cannot require him to change or forbid him to change the particular investments of the fund. There is no liability on the beneficiary for the trustee's acts on the principle of respondeat superior and, unless the trust deed otherwise provides, the trustee must act without remuneration to himself and cannot in any case sue the beneficiary on any implied promise to pay. It is the trustee alone who can give a discharge for interest, rent or dividends to the parties who have to pay them in respect of the invested trust estate, nor need they know the beneficiary in the matter. All that the latter can do is to claim the assistance of a Court of Equity to enforce the trust and to compel the trustee to discharge it. This right is quite as good and often is better than any legal right, but it is not in any case one which for all purposes makes the trust fund "belong" to the beneficiary or makes the income of it accrue to him eo instanti and directly as it leaves the hand of the party who pays it. I do not understand that, so far, there was any contest. The appellant's argument is that, whatever may be the legal position of the capital and the equitable position of the trustee and the cestui que trust, as regards the right to the income for income-tax purposes the law is different and that under the Income Tax Act, 1918, and by virtue of some implication the "accrual" is to the beneficiary.

I put aside the contention that, if the respondent is not held liable, trustees will be liable to supertax on trust funds and beneficiaries will be outside the benefit of exemptions from tax. It is not in this indirect way that the general law can be set aside for the convenience of the Revenue. Supertax and exemptions depend on the sections which impose or confer them, not on some supposed incidence, arising argumentatively from provisions as to the subject-matter which attract tax, or as to the extent of it. Supertax is chargeable in respect of the income of an "individual" from all sources. Even in the easiest case of a trustee to accumulate income, no one would say that his trust was a "source of income" to him as an "individual," as, in the case of several trustees, they are not "an individual" at all. The case of exemptions is similarly dependent on the construction of the relevant section.

It is not a private instrument, like a will, that can determine the question whether a fund is taxable or whether Lady Archer-Shee is chargeable in respect of it. That turns on the legislation, which deals with her rights, legal or equitable, for the purposes of taxation. It follows that it is on the terms of the Income Tax Act, 1918, or on some decided construction which binds your Lordships, that the Inland Revenue can alone find authority for the present contention that the person "entitled to" the income is the beneficiary, and a rule of "income-tax law," which so completely and uncompromisingly disregards the regular law of trusts and the ordinary law of property, is one that must be enacted beyond doubt or question.

The scheme of the Act is that income is taxed—that is, income which somewhere has been received, and persons are assessed to the payment of that tax. The income taxed and the charge upon it are, or should be, expressly and uniformly described on definite principles, but assessment is a matter of convenience, now on this plan and now on that. There is a good deal of practical advantage in tax-gathering on this indefinite scheme, but all the same the advantage must be taken cum onere and, if the right to charge and to assess is not to be found in the Act either in express terms or by necessary intendment (including what is called "the scheme of the Act"), the Crown fails. I have looked without success for either express words or a necessary implication that would enable the Revenue to tax a subject who is only an equitable tenant for life, as if she was both the beneficiary and the trustee in one, or to claim that securities and shares belong to her, as to which she has only a right to compel the administration of the trust. The rules applicable to Case IV. and rule 1 of those applicable to Case V. of Schedule D clearly apply to legal owners and, if words properly apt to charge them are also to charge equitable owners, it can be done only by ignoring the difference in this matter between law and equity.

On the argument for the appellant that the equitable tenant for life of the income of this trust estate may be directly chargeable there are two separate questions, (a) whether she can in any case be chargeable in respect of the difference between the gross income of the trust and the net income, which the trustees properly retain, and (b) where, as is here the fact, the whole fund and the income of it are abroad, whether she can be chargeable at all, in respect of income arising from foreign possessions other than securities, stocks, shares, or rents, which is not remitted to the United Kingdom? The first question would equally affect the case, where fund, trustee and beneficiary are all here; the second arises only where there is property abroad. It does not seem to matter whether the income aimed at is said to arise from or to accrue to or to belong to this or that property or person. In the present case, where the person assessed can only be the beneficiary or her husband for her, authority has to be shown for taxing her in respect of something that is not here and that she does not get. In others, however, the position of the trustee would arise for consideration, if the trustee were here.

I do not know of any provision which, clearly or at all, imposes either collection at the source or vicarious liability on a trustee, as such, as against the beneficiary, and in the case of foreign possessions, as in this case, there are express provisions to the contrary. The debatable question is generally one of the person to be assessed, without deciding anything about ownership or its rights. There is, however, no question here as to the person to be assessed; he must be Sir Martin Archer-Shee. Counsel for the Inland Revenue pointed to no authority that made his liability depend on anything but the nature and extent of his wife's right to the property which is charged.

In the present case it happens that the settlement is in the simplest form. There is only one tenant for life and, during her life, there is no other object of the trust to be considered. We hear of no matters in which a conflict between income and capital and their respective interests has arisen, nor of any business carried on by the trustee, as to which the more complex case of trading profits would replace the plain case of dividends paid. If there had been annuitants with a prior right to be paid or several beneficiaries entitled to share in the income, if there had been reversioners, who could claim that part of the annual receipts was in the nature of accretions to capital, if there was a trust for accumulation or a power to vary the amounts payable from time to time as between minors, the impracticability of saying that any or all of the beneficiaries entitled to income owned the whole or any part of that income from the moment when it became payable and was paid and to the full extent of the amount paid, would be evident. The same rule of "income-tax law" must, however, be applicable to all these cases. No doubt it is true that an accountant could always more or less simply appropriate certain fractions of each incoming and each outgoing to each object of the trust in a uniform proportion. That, however, is done by making assumptions, which may not correspond to the facts, and by computing accordingly. The trustee may in his discretion pay one beneficiary out of the money collected from a security, another out of a payment of rent, and a third out of the profits of a business. He may, on the other hand, if he thinks fit, pay everything received into one account and then draw on that account generally in favour of each beneficiary. In either case it is plain that no specific dividend or interest payment "belongs" in any proper sense of the word to any particular beneficiary. The distribution rests with the trustee, so long as he complies with his duties. A series of accounts could be made out between the trustee and each beneficiary, crediting the latter with a fraction of each item of income and debiting him with a fraction of each item of outlay, in such a way that, on aggregating all the separate accounts, the debits and credits would exactly correspond to the trustee's general account of his trust. Similarly, by appropriation of payments in the trust bank account, the source out of which any given payment was made can be calculated. Neither process shows anything material to the nature of the beneficiary's right. They both go only to the measure and discharge of it in money.

The fact appears to be that it has all along been the policy of the Legislature in regard to income-tax to keep aloof, as far as possible, from questions of title and to confine itself, as far as possible, to questions of administration. Money within the United Kingdom is taxed where it is most conveniently found, and, though that is prima facie in the hands of its owners, in a vast number of cases it is otherwise. Collection at the source is effected by express provisions, which enable specified persons to pay the tax thereon to the Revenue directly and in the first instance, and authorize them to deduct it against another person who is placed under a statutory obligation to allow it; e.g., under Schedules A and C, and No. 20 of the General Rules. As Lord Cave says in Blott's case (37 The Times L.R., 762; [1921] 2 A.C., 171), a company pays as taxpayer and then deducts; it does not pay as agent for the shareholder. Where the person to whom the money belongs is out of the country, his agent, who is here and handles the money, may be taxed for him. In some cases, mostly similar to this, the assessment and charge are made on the trustee here for the beneficiary abroad. Nothing in this scheme catches the taxpayer who is in the United Kingdom and whose trustee and trust fund are not.

On suitable occasions the Act deals expressly with the respective positions of trustee and beneficiary and distinguishes between legal and equitable ownership, e.g., section 37 (i.) (a), "hereditaments . . . belonging to any hospital . . . or vested in trustees for charitable purposes"; section 103 (1) and (3), in which the case of a trustee "who has authorized the receipt of profits arising from trust property by the person entitled thereto," is distinguished from that of an agent or receiver, and also from that of a "person, who, in whatever capacity, is in receipt of . . . profits or gains . . . of or belonging to any other person, who is chargeable in respect thereof." Section 54 (4), and Schedule C, General Rule No. 2 (d) proviso, make express special provisions for substituting the acts of beneficiaries for the action of trustees, which would in general be alone material, and, in one single case, for the elimination of the trustee as owner of the trust securities and the substitution of a beneficiary, who, in that single case, is to be "deemed" to be the person owning the securities, though, in general, of course he is not.

I come now to the decisions which were supposed to be in point. The appellant contended epigrammatically that "for income-tax purposes the trustee is eliminated," a contention which goes far and unwarrantably beyond the words of the Act. The authority on which it was rested, Singer v. Williams (36 The Times L.R., 659; [1921] 1 A.C., 41, at p. 65), turned on the question whether or not the trustee, resident here, was chargeable. The fund was abroad, and he had authorized the beneficiary, who was abroad also, to collect the income abroad where it arose. The difference between legal and equitable rights only came in question because it enabled the Inland Revenue to argue that the legal owner alone was chargeable, and that the income must be deemed to have accrued or arisen to him, that is to say, here. There is no such contention in the present case, nor was the distinction between the gross amount collected by a trustee and the net amount duly distributed by him to the beneficiaries one which arose on the facts of Singer v. Williams (supra). The decision of the House was that the trustee was not chargeable to tax here, and sundry expressions used, to the effect that the beneficiary resident here is chargeable, are only correlative to the ratio decidendi in its actual form and have no reference to the questions now in debate. Again the case of Lord Sudeley v. Attorney-General (13 The Times L.R., 38; [1897] A.C., 11) is said by Lord Justice Sargant to be in its general reasoning precisely applicable. The points referred to there were, first, the local situation, for the purposes of English taxation, of an equitable right to have an estate administered, in which the testatrix was interested as a residuary legatee at the time of her death, and, second, the question whether for such taxation her interest was to be deemed to be confined to a specified fraction of the residuary estate, corresponding to her share under her husband's will, or to be extended to the whole of that residuary estate. In applying this to the present case the learned Lord Justice says that Lady Archer-Shee has not any specific right to any particular item of income, but, following Lord Herschell's reasoning, only an equitable right to have handed over to her the net income of the estate, subject to all proper deductions, which right of hers is a form of property situate in New York, in whose Courts it would have to be asserted. I think the reasoning of this judgment is correct. It is immaterial that in Lord Sudeley's case (supra) the estate of the husband of the testatrix had not yet been administered, whereas here, no doubt, this has been long ago accomplished. Nobody at any rate has argued the contrary, and the point does not need discussion. Furthermore, the rules of Case 4 of Schedule D, which are applicable on this occasion, say expressly that, where no money has been remitted to this country, the taxpayer here is not chargeable in respect of foreign possessions, other than stocks and shares, securities and rents.

Lady Archer-Shee, for the reasons already given, does not for income-tax purposes, in my view, own, and is not entitled to, any of the stocks, shares, securities, or real property that form part of the New York trust estate. These belong to the trustee company, to which also the annual payments made in respect of them, by way of rent, interest or dividends, "arise," "accrue," and "belong." All that she has is a right, in the forum of the trustee and of the trust fund, to have the trust executed in her favour under an order to be made for her benefit by the appropriate Court of Equity, and this "possession" neither consists in the trust's investments or any of them, nor is situated here. It is "foreign."

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal fails. I attach no importance to the obvious slip, made in one of the judgments in the Court of Appeal, as to money having been remitted to Lady Archer-Shee here and I need say no more about it, as I do not think that it affected the reasoning of the judgment appealed from.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords: The testator in this case, Alfred Pell, the father of Lady Archer-Shee, in the sixth paragraph of his will, dated May 4, 1899, directed that all his real and personal estate, except what was thereinbefore disposed of, should be held in trust by his executors and trustees; that they should, during the life of his wife, apply two-thirds of the income and profits thereof to her use, and the remaining one-third to the use of his daughter, or any issue whom she (i.e., his wife) might leave surviving her. He then provided for the event which has in fact occurred in these words: "In the event that my said wife shall die leaving no issue by me her surviving the whole of the said income and profits shall thereafter be applied to the use of my daughter Frances during her life."

The testator then by the ninth paragraph of his will appointed his wife and John Pierpont Morgan, Junior, to be executors of his will and trustees of all the trusts created or declared thereby. He gives his executors the very widest powers of dealing with, selling, investing or disposing of his real and personal estate, and changing any of the investments upon which any portion of it might be invested. He further provided that if the executor, John Pierpont Morgan, Junior, should decline to qualify or act as an executor or trustee under his will, or should die, resign or become incapacitated, he authorized his wife, or in case of her death or incapacity his daughter Frances, to nominate and appoint some trust company organized under the law of New York State as executor and trustee in his, Pierpont Morgan's, place or stead, such appointment to be made in writing and duly acknowledged by her, and to be filed in the office of the Court in which his will had been proved. The trust company so appointed was to become one of the executors and trustees of his will, and was to perform all the duties, and have all the powers, authority, and discretion, as if it had been appointed by his will. This last provision is curtailed by that which follows in section 10. By this latter section he confers upon the trust company power to retain any investment of which he was seized or possessed, and also the power to invest and re-invest his estate, in any securities which might be approved of in writing by his wife or daughter and by the said trust company.

It is found in the case stated that the testator died before the year 1904, and that his wife died in that year. Mr. Pierpont Morgan, Junior, on her death became the sole trustee and executor under the testator's will. This gentleman seems to have occupied that position for a period of about ten years; presumably he discharged the duties belonging to it till he retired in the year 1914. Lord Justice Sargant, in giving judgment, said ([1927] 1 K.B., at p. 127): "No importance is to be attached to the fact that the trust fund in this case was originally formed or was derived from a residue, because having regard to the date at which the testator must have died, we must assume that the estate has been quite fully administered long ago, so that here we have a definite and specific trust fund."

I quite concur, but may one not justly assume that the words "long ago" extend to the year 1914, when Mr. John Pierpont Morgan terminated his ten years' administration of the estate? It would be strange indeed if a business man like him, who, unless he belies his name, is skilled in financial affairs, should not have completed the work of this administration in that length of time. If he had done so, it would have furnished a reason for his retirement. Then, when he did retire, one finds this young lady, Miss Pell, who, it is contended, has now no property in or rights to this fund beyond the right in equity, by suit presumably, to compel the trust company to pay to her the portion of the income to which she is entitled, dominating the situation, and by written instrument duly acknowledged and filed in the Court named, appointing not a named company but some company, i.e., some company which she may select, to fill the office of executor and trustee instead of Mr. John Pierpont Morgan, Junior, retired. The choice is left with her. In addition, her powers and responsibility are not ended there. She has, under section 10 of the will, power over the investment and re-investment of her father's estate in any securities, in that her consent is necessary for any such operation. I think it is not an unreasonable inference from these matters that the life interest given to her by her father's will had become vested in her, and that the trust company which she had appointed were merely her agents to administer the fund for her and in her interest. If that be so, payments necessarily made properly in the administration of the fund are made in her interest and on her behalf, and, in my view, are made with her money.

The learned Master of the Rolls is in error in supposing that the trust company remit what they receive from the trust fund or any portion of it to the respondent's wife in this country. That is evident from the following paragraph in the case stated:—

"In the year 1914, the said J. Pierpont Morgan, Junior, resigned the trusteeship, and under the power conferred by section 9 of the said will the Trust Company of New York, being a company constituted under American law and resident in the State of New York, was appointed to be executor and trustee of the will. The fund constituted under section 6 of the will consisted of foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property.

"During the three years ending 5th April, 1925, the appellant was married to the said daughter (Frances) of Alfred Pell, who was entitled to have the whole of the income and profits from the said fund applied to her use. The Trust Company of New York have paid over such part of the sums which they received from the said fund as they considered to be income, as the same accrued, to her order at Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Company's bank in New York while retaining in their own possession such sums as they thought might be required to comply with the income-tax or other provisions of American law."

But even with that correction I am unable to understand what precisely is meant by the two following passages in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls ([1927] 1 K.B., at pp. 120, 122). They run thus:—

"It appears from that statement of fact that what they remit is not what I will call the dividends in specie in their actual form; what they remit is the balance in their hands after they have carried out their trust and defrayed the expenses which fall upon the trust. They do not remit the whole of the income from the profits but they remit a sum which has lost its origin or parentage; it has lost the shape of dividends, share warrants, or the like, and it is merely a sum of money which represents the balance after payment of the sums which would properly fall upon the trust."

"But is this sum income arising from securities? In Singer v. Williams (36 The Times L.R., 659; [1921] 1 A.C., 41) it was decided that shares in a foreign trading company are foreign possessions and are not foreign securities within Case IV. of that schedule, and the present Lord Chancellor gave an indication or definition of what is the meaning of the word 'securities.' This lump sum of money, this balance, does not appear rightly to fall within the words of Case IV., r. 1, as income arising from 'securities.' Exactly what those securities are it is unnecessary at present to define or to determine, but, from what I have already said, it is plain that this balance has lost its original character as being dividends from debentures or shares or the like, and it appears to me that it does not fall within Case IV., r. 1, as income arising from securities."

The trustees undoubtedly do not remit to the beneficiary the income of the fund in specie, if that means, as I suppose it must mean, forwarding to her the dividend warrants, cheques, and such like things received by them in payment of debts due to the fund. It would be unbusinesslike and ridiculous to do so. What the trustees properly and rightly do is to cash those dividend warrants and cheques, &c., and pay into the bank of the beneficiary the money which they thus receive. If the trustees paid into the bank of the beneficiary all the income of the fund which they received, retaining nothing, I assume, on the reasoning in these paragraphs, that there would be no loss of origin, no loss of "parentage," of any portion of the sums paid in. If that be so, I am utterly unable to understand how the retention by the trustees in their own hands of a portion of the income which they receive in order to pay lawful claims upon the fund, and charges which probably the lady herself would have had to pay or get paid for her, if she was resident in New York, and which the trustees will have to account for fully, can change the "origin or parentage" of the residue of the income received, lodged with the bankers of the beneficiary.

This residue has no doubt lost the shape of dividends, share warrants or the like, but so would the entire income of the fund if it had been lodged in the same way with the lady's bankers.

On the first of those two paragraphs it would appear to me as if nothing can preserve the true character and origin and parentage of the income paid to the beneficiary through her bankers unless that be done by lodging with those bankers the dividends, share warrants and the like received by the trustees but not cashed. With all respect I am quite unable to concur in this reasoning. I think it misleading.

An idea similar to that expressed in the two passages quoted from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls seems to me to underlie the following passage from the judgment of Lord Justice Warrington as he then was. The passage runs thus ([1927] 1 K.B., at p. 126):—

"They therefore found that the income arising or accruing to this lady in the present case is not the actual income derived from the various sources of investment, but that it is such sum as the trustees from time to time considered to be the income, while retaining in their hands the sums which are referred to in the findings of the Commissioners."

This passage would appear to indicate that in order to satisfy the word "accruing" or "arising" to the lady the trustees should remit to her all the dividend warrants, cheques received by them, and such like, in payment of the income, with the consequence which I have already mentioned. The lodgment of the entire income with her bankers would not apparently satisfy these words, or if it would, how and why the lodgment of 95 per cent. of the income, 5 per cent. being retained to satisfy some lawful claim upon the fund, which the beneficiary, if she was resident in New York, would probably have had to pay, would not satisfy them I cannot understand. The trustees do not, I think, properly speaking, consider what is to be the income which the beneficiary is entitled to receive. They lodge the whole income, less what they consider it is necessary to retain to discharge lawful claims upon the fund. I am unable to follow the reasoning that leads to the conclusion that, by the deduction of these sums, the character of the balance lodged changes; and acquires a character different from that which the entire income would have borne if it had been lodged.

Lord Justice Sargant expresses his view of the case in the following passage:—

"The learned Judge has summed up the position, in my judgment, perfectly accurately in a passage of his judgment which I will now read. He says this: 'What this lady enjoys is not the stocks, shares, and rents or other property constituting the trust fund under the will; what she has is the right to call upon the trustees, and, if necessary, to compel the trustees to administer this property during her life so as to give her the interest of it, and so on, according to the provisions of the trust. Her interest is merely an equitable one and it is not an interest in the specific stocks and shares constituting the trust fund at all.'"

He apparently considered that in that state of things the reasoning of the Judges and the members of the House of Lords who took part in the case of Lord Sudeley v. Attorney-General (13 The Times L.R., 38 ; [1897] A.C., 11) was applicable to this case. That case has been frequently referred to in the argument in this case, and, almost consistently, the important point decided is disregarded. That point was, that the claim upon or against the residue of a testator's property could not be enforced until the testator's estate had been fully administered, and the net residue, which might ultimately be nothing, ascertained. Lord Justice Sargant himself states that it must be presumed, owing to the lapse of time, that the testator's estate has been fully administered. The remarks of the Judges to whom the learned Lord Justice refers, have reference to the fact that the testator's estate had not been fully administered, and do not, it appears to me, help to the conclusion at which the learned Lord Justice has in this case arrived.

The evidence set out in the case stated is extremely scanty. It does not indicate with any particularity the sources from which the trust fund is derived, whether it be from foreign "Government securities, foreign stocks and shares, or other foreign property." I have had the pleasure and advantage of reading the judgment about to be delivered by my noble friend Lord Wrenbury. It is, I think, clear and convincing. I concur with him in his view of the case, and approve of the suggestion that he makes as to a reference back to the Special Commissioners to restate the case by setting forth the particulars which he has indicated.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords : Section 1 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, enacts that income-tax for any year "shall be charged for that year in respect of all property, profits, or gains respectively described or comprised in the Schedules marked A, B, C, D, and E." I note here the words "all property."

Schedule D enacts that tax under that Schedule shall be charged in respect of (a) the annual profits or gains arising or accruing (i.) to any person residing in the United Kingdom "from any kind of property whatever, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere." It further enacts that tax under the Schedule shall be charged under certain Cases and after specifying five Cases it adds :—

Case VI.—"Tax in respect of any annual profits or gains not falling under any of the foregoing Cases, and not charged by virtue of any other schedule." No words could be more plain to include all annual profits of every kind.

In the case of a person residing in the United Kingdom, therefore, the tax is imposed upon all property, whether situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere and whether described in any of the five Cases or not.

Case V., however, which relates to "possession out of the United Kingdom," consists of two parts. The former has to do with "stocks, shares, or rents in any place out of the United Kingdom"—the latter with "possessions out of the United Kingdom other than stocks, shares or rents." In the latter case the tax is to be "computed only on the full amount of the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom."

The result of the above may be shortly stated by saying that in the case of a person residing in the United Kingdom all his property whatever, situate in the United Kingdom or elsewhere is charged to tax, but, if he shows that a particular part of his property is within Case V. (2), then the tax is computed only upon so much of the income as is actually received in the United Kingdom.

In this case the taxpayer is a British subject resident in England. The property from which the income is derived is in America. The income is not remitted to this country. The case states that the income has been paid to Lady Archer-Shee's order at Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Co.'s bank in New York. It stops there, and does not go on to state that it has not been remitted by New York to this country but it is admitted at the Bar that this is the case. In these circumstances the question is whether the income is such that in that state of facts it is taxable to income-tax.

The income in question is income of Lady Archer-Shee under a gift in the will of her father Mr. Alfred Pell, of New York, in the following terms :—

"I direct that all my real and personal estate except what is hereinbefore disposed of be held in trust by my executors and trustees as follows . . . (3) that" (in an event which happened) "the whole of the said income and profits shall thereafter be applied to the use of my said daughter Frances during her life." Lady Archer-Shee is the said daughter Frances.

The date of Mr. Pell's death does not appear, but it was before 1904. It is not disputed that the estate has been fully administered. The Trust Company of New York have been appointed as, and now are, trustees of the fund, and it is not disputed that the funds are now in their hands as trustees upon the trust above stated.

The securities, stocks, and shares are liable to American income-tax and the Trust Company of New York are entitled to commission or other payment for their services. Subject to these Lady Archer-Shee is during her life entitled to the income arising from the securities, stocks and shares, and foreign possessions.

In this state of facts Lady Archer-Shee's interest under her father's will is beyond all question "property." The question for determination is what is the nature of that property, is it a "possession out of the United Kingdom other than stocks, shares, or rents" within Case V. (2) ? To escape taxation the respondent must establish that it is.

What, then, is the property to which Lady Archer-Shee is entitled ? The will is an American will. The law of America is in an English Court a question of fact. In the case stated by the Special Commissioners there is no finding as to what is the American law in the light of which the construction of Mr. Pell's will is to be ascertained. We have not heard that there has been any agreement between the parties on the point, and I have not traced that there has been any reference to it in the course of the proceedings. The members of the Court of Appeal do not appear to have considered the matter. They, and in particular Lord Justice Warrington, seem to have treated the question for decision as purely a question of fact, and without any finding as to the American law as a question of fact they contented themselves with referring to paragraph 4 of the case and founded themselves upon the statement that there is paid over to Lady Archer-Shee's account only such part of the sums which the trustees have received from the funds as they considered to be income. My Lords, the question is not what the trustees have thought proper to hand over and have handed over (which is a question of fact) but what under the will Lady Archer-Shee is entitled to (which is a question of law). The trustees, of course, have a first charge upon the trust funds for their costs, charges, and expenses, and American income-tax will be a tax which they would have to bear and which would fall upon the beneficiary. But this does not reduce the right of property of the beneficiary to a right only to a balance sum after deducting these. If an owner of shares deposits them with his banker by way of security for a loan he is not reduced to being the owner of a balance sum, being the difference between the dividends on the shares and the interest on the loan. He is the owner of the equity of redemption of the whole fund. If a landowner employs an agent to collect his rents and authorizes him to deduct a commission he does not cease to be owner of the rents. Under Mr. Pell's will Lady Archer-Shee (if American law is the same as English law) is, in my opinion, as a matter of construction of the will, entitled in equity specifically during her life to the dividends upon the stocks. If, say, in January, £100, after deduction of American income-tax, was received for a dividend and there was nothing owing to the trustees which they were entitled to deduct, Lady Archer-Shee could, in my opinion, call upon them to pay her that £100. If such a property is not taxable it results that a person residing here, whether a British subject or not, could, by creating a foreign trust of stocks and shares and accumulating or spending the income abroad, escape taxation upon that income.

If the estate had not been fully administered I could well understand a contention that the right to whatever in administration might turn out to be the fund, the subject of this gift, was a "foreign possession," and fell under Case V. (2). But that is not the case. I have to read the will and see what is Lady Archer-Shee's right of property in certain ascertained securities, stocks and shares now held by the Trust Company "to the use of my said daughter." It is, I think, if the law of America is the same as our law, an equitable right in possession to receive during her life the proceeds of the shares and stocks of which she is tenant for life. Her right is not to a balance sum, but to the dividends, subject to deductions as above mentioned. Her right under the will is "property" from which income is derived.

The statute itself provides for deduction of income-tax (see Schedule D, Cases IV. and V.); the commission payable to the Trust Company is a debt due from the beneficiary to the trustee—neither the one nor the other is relevant to the title of the beneficiary as distinguished from the amount which the beneficiary is entitled to receive by virtue of her title.

The case does not give particulars of the sources of the income beyond stating that the fund from which it arises consists of "foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property." "Securities" are the subject of Schedule D, Case IV. (1). "Stocks, shares, or rents" are the subject of Case V. (1). Foreign possessions, other than stocks, shares and rents, are the subject of Case V. (2). The first are taxable on the full amount arising in the year of assessment, whether the income has been or will be received in the United Kingdom or not, subject to deduction as there mentioned, including the deduction of any sum which has been paid in respect of income-tax in the place where the income has arisen (in the present case American income-tax). The second are taxable on an average of the three preceding years, whether the income has been or will be received in the United Kingdom or not, subject to deductions as before. The third are taxable only on the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom from remittances payable in the United Kingdom, &c., on an average of three years.

To succeed on this appeal the respondent must establish that the securities, stocks, shares, and property of which Lady Archer-Shee is tenant for life are within Case V. (2). But in the absence of particulars as to the nature of the "foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares and other foreign property," mentioned in paragraph 4 of the case stated, and of information upon which of them (a) the assessment has been made under Case IV. (1) on the amount arising in the year of assessment, and (b) under Case V. (1) on an average of the three preceding years, and (c) under Case V. (2) there has been no assessment at all because there has not been receipt in the United Kingdom, it is impossible to say whether the assessment is right or wrong. Your Lordships are not concerned with the figures. They are for the Special Commissioners. It is for them to make the assessment. But you are concerned with the principles upon which the Special Commissioners arrive at the figures, and without knowledge with respect to these it is not possible either to confirm or to disallow the assessment. The only information before the House is that upon an income of £12,000 an assessment has been made of £2,700. This is simply 4s. 6d. in the £ upon £12,000 and must have been made upon the assumption that the income arises from securities within Case IV. (1). The House has no means of saying whether this has been arrived at upon a right or upon a wrong principle.

The Master of the Rolls more than once in the course of his judgment says that the balance of the income is remitted to this country. This is not so. If the case were within Case V. (2) (which he holds it to be) there would be nothing to assess, because the income is not remitted to the United Kingdom. And all the members of the Court of Appeal fell into error, I think, in failing to treat the construction of the will as a matter of American law, and in deciding the case upon the footing that they were bound by a finding of fact in the case stated by the Special Commissioners that the income paid to the lady was not the actual income but such balance sum as the trustees considered to be income after retaining such sums as they thought might be required to pay American income-tax.

My Lords, in my judgment the appeal must be allowed and the matter referred back to the Special Commissioners to re-state the case by stating:—

(a) The particulars of the "foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property," sufficiently to show first, which of them are, in their opinion, "securities" within Case IV. (1), and, secondly, which of them are, in their opinion, "stocks, shares, or rents" under Case V. (1), and thirdly, which are, "in their opinion, possessions out of the United Kingdom other than stocks, shares or rents" under Case V. (2), and stating

(b) Which of these they have assessed on the income of the year of assessment and which on the average of the three preceding years, and

(c) Stating (as was admitted at the Bar) that the sums paid as stated in paragraph 4 of the case into the New York bank have not been in whole or in part remitted to the United Kingdom.

The order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt must also, I think, be discharged and the case referred back to the Special Commissioners with a direction as above stated. Any costs paid under the orders below must be repaid as the Court upon the re-hearing shall direct. The appellant will have his costs here and below.

Lord Carson (read by Lord Blanesburgh).—My Lords: I do not think it necessary, having regard to the full discussion which has taken place in the speeches which have been already made, to discuss the sections of the Income Tax Act, 1918, or the Schedules which have been already referred to. The question which emerges from these is whether the money paid by the trustees of the will of Alfred Pell to the order of Lady Archer-Shee at Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Company's bank in New York or any part of it, though not remitted to this country, was chargeable to income-tax under the rules of Case IV. of Schedule D, in so far as it was interest arising from securities, and under the first rule of Case V., in so far as it arose from stocks or shares; the contention being on behalf of the respondent that in the circumstances of the case the sum so transferred constituted in the hands of the respondent's wife a foreign possession, and did not come within the rules mentioned as being either interest arising from securities or from stocks and shares.

It is, I think, essential in the first place to remember that the property which it is sought to tax in this case was in the hands of the trustees, to use the words of Lord Justice Sargant, "a definite and specific trust fund" to the whole of the income and profits of which the respondent's wife was entitled under the will of her father Alfred Pell. Had the residue been still undetermined or had the share of Lady Archer-Shee been a proportion only of the income or profits of the residue other questions would, no doubt, arise. The Special Commissioners in the case stated have found that the fund constituted under section 6 of the will (being the residue mentioned before) consisted of foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property, that the respondent's wife was entitled to have the whole of the income and profits from the said fund applied to her use, and that the Trust Company of New York (as trustee) had paid over such parts of the sum which they received from the said fund as they considered to be income, as the same accrued, to her order at a bank in New York, whilst retaining in their possession such sums as they thought might be required to comply with the income-tax or other provisions of American law. The Special Commissioners also held that the income receivable by the wife of the respondent from the Trust Company of New York arose from "the specific securities, stocks, shares, rents, or other property which constituted the trust fund." My Lords, in these circumstances I cannot myself draw any distinction between such a trust fund and one where specific securities, stocks and shares were vested in trustees to pay the rent and dividends to a cestui que trust for life. In my opinion upon the construction of the will of Alfred Pell, when once the residue had become specifically ascertained, the respondent's wife was sole beneficial owner of the interest and dividends of all the securities, stocks and shares forming part of the trust fund therein settled and was entitled to receive and did receive such interest and dividends. This, I think, follows from the decision of this House in Singer v. Williams (36 The Times L.R., 659; [1921] 1 A.C., 41, at p. 65), and in my opinion the Master of the Rolls correctly stated the law when he said ([1927] 1 K.B., at p. 123): "In considering sums which are placed in the hands of trustees for the purpose of paying income to beneficiaries, for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts you may eliminate the trustees. The income is the income of the beneficiaries; the income does not belong to the trustees."

The Master of the Rolls, however, yielding to the argument so put forward by the respondent, held ([1927] 1 K.B., at p. 120) that, having regard to the facts found, "what they remit is not what I will call the dividends in specie in their actual form; what they remit is the balance in their hands after they have carried out their trust and defrayed the expenses which fall upon the trust. . . . It has lost the shape of dividends, share warrants, or the like." In aid of this view he cites certain statements made by noble Lords in this House in the case of Attorney-General v. Lord Sudeley (13 The Times L.R., 38; [1897] A.C., 11), and amongst others that of Lord Halsbury at page 15: "It is uncertain until the residuary estate has been ascertained of what it will consist. It may consist of many things—it may consist of only a sum of money—and until that has been ascertained the actual right capable of instant assertion does not exist." My Lords, with great respect to the Master of the Rolls, I do not think either his own reasoning or the quotations upon which he relies have any application to a case such as the present when, as I have already pointed out, we are dealing with "a definite and specific trust fund." My Lords, I am unable to understand why or how the character of the sum paid to the respondent's wife ever became changed, or, as the Master of the Rolls graphically says, "was no longer clothed in the form in which it was originally received, having no trace of its ancestry," simply because the deductions due by law have been made and because it has been mixed up with other trust moneys by the trustees. It is, in my view, in the same position as if the trustees had arranged to have the interest and dividends paid directly to the respondent's wife and she had discharged the necessary outgoings in accordance with the law. Whether the necessary outgoings according to law were discharged by the trustees or by the cestui que trust cannot, in my opinion, make any difference. I think the appeal should be allowed, but as it is evident that no distinction was made at the hearings before the Special Commissioners or Mr. Justice Rowlatt between the amounts which consisted of securities or stocks and shares or other foreign property, and as different considerations apply under the income-tax law to these different classes of property, I agree that the matter must be referred back to the Special Commissioners, and as a consequence that the order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt must be modified or discharged.

Lord Blanesburgh.—My Lords: The ultimate question in this appeal turns upon the description which in income-tax phraseology ought properly to be applied to the moneys paid during the two years in question by the Trust Company of New York to the order of Lady Archer-Shee, the respondent's wife, at Messrs. J. P. Morgan and Company's bank there. None of these moneys have been received in the United Kingdom. It is that fact which, if his contention as to their true description be correct, enables the respondent to say that he is not liable to pay income-tax in respect of them, either in whole, in part, or at all.

Lady Archer-Shee's interests arise under the will of her father, an American citizen, domiciled at his death in or about the year 1904 in the State of New York. The Trust Company of New York are the present trustees of his will. In them the residuary settled estate is vested. That estate, now ascertained as a corpus, consists, it is found in the case, of foreign Government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property. The entire interest, dividends, and profits of these are received by the trustees. Upon them the trustees are chargeable with American income-tax, as, if they were English trustees, they would be chargeable with United Kingdom income-tax. Being, however, resident Americans, they are no more chargeable with that income-tax upon these "foreign" receipts than would any other resident American citizen receiving them on his own account. It is convenient to note at once the reason, and the only reason, why in this case the trustees are not alone liable for this income-tax upon these receipts as such. The point is not without significance, because Lady Archer-Shee's position in relation to these receipts is, of course, in no way affected, so far as her rights under the will are concerned, by the accidental nationality of the trustees for the time being.

In the events which have happened the trustees hold the settled residue upon trust to apply its income and profits to the use of Lady Archer-Shee during her life. She has no interest in the corpus. In default of issue surviving her the entire settled residue, subject to a payment thereout of $50,000 to a niece of the testator, is to be held in trust for Columbia College, in the city of New York. It follows that Lady Archer-Shee is in no sense in control of the fund. The trustees are as much trustees for those entitled in remainder as for herself.

It was in pursuance of the trust in her favour that the payments referred to were made. Their nature is stated in the case. They were payments over by the trustees of "such part of the sums which they received from the said fund as they considered to be income, as the same accrued, . . . while retaining in their own possession such sums as they thought might be required to comply with the income-tax or other provisions of American law."

There can, I think, be no doubt as to the meaning of that statement. It means that the payments made to Lady Archer-Shee were payments of all that remained of a fund of miscellaneous income receipts after there had been paid or retained thereout sums deemed by the trustees to be sufficient to discharge the trust and other outgoings that had first to be provided for. The payments represented, in other words, the actual net residuary income available for the tenant for life, ascertained and only ascertained after payment or provision had been made of or for all prior claims against the gross residuary receipts. The income which the lady received was the income of a totality, not of particular items of property. Such seems to me to be the meaning of the statement.

Its implications, however, are no less clear. No suggestion of irregularity on the part of the trustees being made, the statement implies that Lady Archer-Shee had no right, during these two years over which the payments extended, to demand more than she received or to demand any of it at any earlier date than she received it. More important still, the statement, I think, implies, for the same reason, that until the moneys paid to her were actually paid over she had neither property in them nor right to receive them. The proper result of any account taken would have shown—so much the statement implies—that the liability of the trustees to pay, and in the precise amounts, accrued only at the respective times at which the payments were actually made. Accordingly, if the statement in the case must be accepted by your Lordships, it is with reference and with reference only to a fund so circumstanced that the question of the liability of the respondent for income-tax in respect of it must be determined.

And, my Lords, although the statement with its implications, appears, superficially, to be concerned as much with law as with fact, it is, in truth, a statement of fact only. As such, it is one by which your Lordships are, I think, bound. For the law which is referred to is, or should be, the appropriate American law by which the rights and duties of the trustees of this American testator's will are defined and the nature of the interest thereunder of Lady Archer-Shee is determined. The true effect of American, as of any other foreign law, is in England a question not of law but of fact. As such therefore this statement must, I think, be regarded, and, if so, it must be accepted by your Lordships. This was, I conclude, the view of the Court of Appeal. If it was, I agree with it.

But, my Lords, I am the more ready without further inquiry to accept the statement with all its implications as a correct finding of the American law ascertained by the Special Commissioners like any other fact, because I am myself satisfied that if this were the will either of a Scottish or of an English testator, the Special Commissioners' statement would be exactly paralleled. In other words, the case is not one in which the position is at all affected by any speciality of American law.

I take the case of a Scottish will first, because in relation to such a will your Lordships have the assistance of a decision of the First Division of the Court of Session in a case very close to the present. In Murray v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, cited in argument and decided on June 18, 1926, (No. 245 Tax Cases), the facts were that the appellant's father by his will gave his residuary estate on trust for the appellant and her sister equally during their respective lives and directed the trustees to pay the expenses of management of the trust. The position in other words is indistinguishable from the present. There the gross income of the estate, after deducting an annuity of £70 payable to the testator's widow under an ante-nuptial marriage contract, was £608 0s. 2d., and the whole of it suffered income-tax in the hands of the trustees. The appellant's only other income was £10 War Loan interest, and for the purposes of a claim for repayment of income-tax in respect of personal allowance, &c., she contended that her taxed income under her father's will was one half of the gross income of the estate, i.e., £304 0s. 1d., without any deduction in respect of the expenses of the management of the trust. The First Division, at the instance, in that case, of the Crown—there is a certain piquancy in that fact—repelled the claim : "It is as plain as day," said Lord Clyde in delivering judgment, "that if a life-renter returns his or her income what he returns is precisely what he gets and nothing more nor less. It is as plain as day that the total revenue which arose from the residuary estate was not the income of any of the life-rent beneficiaries in the residuary estate, but, on the contrary, was the income of the trustees who were administering the residuary estate. It was for them to pay the full income-tax which the receipt by them of that income made incident upon them. It was for them to pay whatever may have been the expenses of administering it, and after meeting those expenses to divide the income of the residue among the life-rent residuary beneficiaries. But there was no justification whatever either under the statute or, as far as I can see, in any view consistent with common sense for the course taken here."

Lord Sands is equally express and refers to an aspect of the matter which is very relevant in the present case. The plaintiff's view, he says, was that one half of the £608 0s. 2d. belonged to her. And he continues, "That would be a sound view no doubt if any expenses that were incurred before any payment was made to her had been expenses incurred by somebody she had employed to collect the money, because then these expenses would have been her expenses if they had been incurred, as I say, by someone whom she was free to employ or not to employ. But that is not the situation. The expenses which were deducted before any payment was made to her were incurred not by anyone she employed but expenses incurred by the trustees whom the truster had appointed to manage his estate and whom he had directed to pay all necessary charges of administration before any division took place." Lord Blackburn gives as an illustration that which is the present case. "The lady in this case is seeking to recover income-tax upon an income taxed at source. If the position had been just the other way about, and if she was making a return of her income for the purpose of having the income-tax assessed upon her income, I entertain no doubt whatever that she would have returned the sum which she actually received from the trustees as her income under the trust disposition and settlement of her father." "What the appellant was entitled to under the bequest," said Lord Ashmore, "was only one half of the full residue after deduction of the appropriate proportion of the expenses of the trust management."

I have cited these judgments at length because the report of them may not be readily accessible. The decision shows, I think, clearly that the statement made in the case here by the Special Commissioners would be an exact representation of Lady Archer-Shee's position if a Scottish Court were in relation to her father's will the forum of construction and administration.

And, my Lords, speaking for myself, I cannot doubt that the same would be true if this were an English will with its residuary funds vested in English trustees. In that case, Lady Archer-Shee's only specific interest in the income of the residuary estate would be an interest in that income, cleared of all proper administrative or other payments thereout ranking in priority to any beneficial interest of her own.

The right of the trustees to retain moneys to answer these payments in praesenti or even, in a proper case, in futuro, is undoubted (see, e.g., Stott v. Milne, 25 Ch. D., 710, at p. 715). Their duty, themselves to execute their trust, is equally undoubted. No receiver of the gross residuary income could be obtained against them except on proof of misconduct, actual or contemplated, and then only in a suit for the execution of the trusts of the will. In other words, the interest in the eye of a Court of Equity of Lady Archer-Shee in the gross income of the estate is not that of a mortgagor in the property charged but is exactly analogous to the interest of a residuary legatee of corpus before that residue has been actually ascertained. I agree with Lord Justice Sargant that to the case with which we are here concerned the reasoning of this House in Lord Sudeley v. Attorney-General (13 The Times L.R., 38 ; [1897] A.C., 11) in relation to an unascertained capital residue is precisely applicable.

It is, of course, merely an accident that Lady Archer-Shee is sole life tenant. During the life of the testator's widow each was entitled to a moiety of the residuary income. The position was in no way different then, and it would have been in no way different, however numerous were the persons entitled to share the income between them. It would, however, be difficult to suggest, if the body of life beneficiaries were numerous, that there could be any normal right in any or all of them together other than a right to require the trustees to account for their receipts and payments in a due course of administration. Such, in my judgment, was Lady Archer-Shee's right and, in the absence of misconduct, no other.

My Lords, her position from an English point of view, could not, I think, be better put than it is by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in his judgment. "What this lady enjoys," he says, "is not stocks, shares, and rents or other property constituting the trust fund under the will ; what she has is the right to call upon the trustees, and, if necessary, to compel the trustees to administer this properly during her life so as to give her the income arising therefrom according to the provisions of the trust. Her interest is merely an equitable one, and it is not an interest in the specific stocks and shares constituting the trust fund at all. There is no doubt about the correctness of that proposition."

I agree in that statement, and it is clear that, basing himself upon it, the learned Judge would have decided the case in favour of the present respondent had he not misapprehended the effect of Singer v. Williams (36 The Times L.R., 659 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 41) by failing to note, amongst other things, that the foreign dividends there in question had been in forma specifica actually received by the foreign beneficiary by the direction of the trustee.

Be that, however, as it may, it is now, I think, agreed on all hands that if the view of the will so expressed by the learned Judge be correct, the respondent here must succeed. For, my Lords, what Lady Archer-Shee actually received at her bank in New York was, on that view, not income from securities, stocks, shares, or rents in any place out of the United Kingdom, but was, in the language of the Income Tax Act, 1918, "income arising from possessions out of the United Kingdom other than stocks, shares, or rents," income which while chargeable to income-tax is only so chargeable to the extent to which it is received in the United Kingdom.

Such equally is the position if the result be reached by reference to the statement in the case—the proper foundation as I conceive for your Lordships' judgment —or by reference to the Scots Law as expounded in the judgments which I have cited.

My Lords, I confess to a sense of relief in being able to reach this conclusion. If the alternative view prevails and the respondent is charged with income-tax according as the sums paid to his wife can, on dissection, be traced in their different parts to income received by the trustees from "foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property" respectively, a burden is placed upon him which, as it seems to me, he cannot discharge, and an inquiry is set on foot which may never be capable of answer. For, in view of the statements in the case, it is, to my mind, more than doubtful whether the trustees themselves could trace the payments to their sources. They are, of course, in no way concerned with any question of United Kingdom income-tax, and for the purposes of their own administration they have no intelligible purpose to serve by appropriating their retentions to any particular receipts, either rateably or in any other way, and I cannot suppose that they have ever done so. In any case, the respondent, who is not a beneficiary under the testator's will, could not require the trustees to do anything so entirely superfluous, and in the absence of any such declared appropriation he would himself be quite unable to furnish any of the statements X. or XI. (1) of the Fifth Schedule to the Act which on this footing would be required of him. These practical difficulties confirm me in the view that this is not the kind of case to which either of these statements has any reference at all.

It has been suggested that the view of this case which I have taken may encourage evasion of a tax which ought to be paid. With reference to that, I would only observe that before 1914 no foreign income of any kind was taxed unless it was received in this country. In 1914, with what almost seems an arbitrary exception, such income, arrived at as is prescribed in the statute, is now taxed whether received in this country or not. All that is involved in the view which I have taken is that this particular interest of Lady Archer-Shee is at present within that exception. It will rest with the Legislature to introduce the necessary amendment to the Act if, in its view, the time has come for limiting the exception by now excluding such a foreign possession as that of Lady Archer-Shee from its benefit.

My Lords, I do not doubt that the actual form of Mr. Justice Rowlatt's order was adopted in the circumstances stated by the noble and learned Viscount on the Woolsack. It was a form which effectively concealed the difficulties involved in the principle thereby adopted. But, like my noble and learned friend, I deprecate, in any event, any further inquiry in this case. With him, however, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed altogether.

FORBES, ABBOTT, AND LENNARD, LIMITED v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Negligence — Vessel in dock—Condition as to sole risk of owners of vessel—Injury in lock through negligence of dock-owners' servants—Whether dock-owners protected by condition—Whether lock included in "dock."

The defendants, who were the owners of Chelsea Dock and of a lock connecting it with the River Thames, received the plaintiffs' barge into the dock on the condition that "All barges or vessels while in Chelsea Dock are at the sole risk of owners or persons bringing or causing the same to be brought into the dock." While the barge was in the lock on its way out from the dock to the river, it was damaged through the negligence of the defendants' servants.

Held, (1) that the words of the condition were not adequate to exempt the defendants from liability for the negligence of their servants, and (2) that although for some purposes, such as the jurisdiction of the dock-master, the word "dock" might include the lock, yet the condition did not clearly and unambiguously apply to the lock so as to exempt the defendants from liability.

His Lordship delivered a considered judgment in this action in favour of the plaintiffs, Forbes, Abbott, and Lennard, Limited, who were the owners of a barge, and who claimed damages for injury thereto occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the defendants, the Great Western Railway Company, while the barge was being passed from Chelsea Basin through the lock connecting the basin with the River Thames. Both basin and lock belonged to the defendants. The defendants denied negligence, and further said that the barge was in the lock at the plaintiffs' sole risk. They relied upon public notices affixed to the lock.

The jury found for the plaintiffs on the issue of negligence, and the damages were agreed at £175.

Mr. Charles, K.C., and Mr. Rowland Thomas appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Avory, in giving judgment, said:—In this case the jury found that the damage to the plaintiffs' barge, resulting from the grounding of the barge in the defendants' lock, when she was leaving the defendants' dock called the Chelsea Dock or Basin, was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants.

Mr. Schiller, on behalf of the defendants, submits, notwithstanding this finding, that the defendants are entitled to judgment on the ground that condition No. (1) of the terms and conditions on which the defendants receive barges into Chelsea Dock, of which the plaintiffs are to be assumed to have had notice, exempts them from liability for such negligence. The condition is in the words following:—

"All barges or vessels while in Chelsea Dock are at the sole risk of owners or persons bringing or causing the same to be brought into the dock."

In support of his submission, Mr. Schiller contends that the word "dock" which is found in this condition includes the lock, and that the terms used are sufficient to exclude any liability for damage caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants. Two questions therefore arise for determination: (1) Whether the terms of the clause are sufficiently clear and unambiguous to exempt the defendants from liability for any such negligence; and (2) whether such exemption extends to a case where damage is caused in the lock by such negligence. If the word "dock" in the clause in question does not include the lock, then cadit quaestio.

Upon the first question several cases have been cited bearing upon the owner's risk clause, each of which has fallen to be decided upon the particular words used. In Reynolds v. Boston Deep Sea Fishing Company (38 The Times L.R., 429), a case somewhat analogous in the facts to the present case, the words which were held to be sufficient to exempt were:—

"No liability whatever shall attach to the company for any accident or damage done to or by any vessel either in taking her to the slip or when on it or when launching from it."

These words are obviously more specific and comprehensive than those in the present case. Applying the test laid down by Lord Justice Scrutton in the case of Rutter v. Palmer (38 The Times L.R., 555; [1922] 2 K.B. 87, at p. 92), I think in the present case there were possible risks other than of negligence to be provided against by the defendants, and that, in any event, the words used are not adequate to exempt the defendants from liability for the negligence of their servants.

Upon the second question, I have been referred to the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, sections 2 and 83, where the word "dock" is defined in section 2 to include "the works connected therewith"; and to the West London Extension Railway Act, 1859 (22 and 23 Vict., c. cxxxiv.), sections 4, 50, and 164. Although I do not doubt that for some purposes, such as the jurisdiction of the dock-master, the word "dock" may include the lock, it appears to me that the terms and conditions, including No. 1, upon which the defendants rely, apply only to the dock as distinguished from the lock; see, particularly, condition No. 7. In any view I think that condition No. 1 does not clearly and unambiguously apply to the lock as distinguished from the dock so as to exempt the defendants from liability.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for the agreed amount of damages.

K.B. Div. (Horridge, J.) 1927. July 21.

KETTLE v. DUNSTER AND WAKEFIELD.*

Bills of Exchange — Company — Receiver for debenture-holders — Signature as drawer — Words of description—Surrounding circumstances—Intention of parties—Right of receiver to sue acceptors—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 26 (1) (2).

By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 26, subsection 1 : "Where a person signs a bill as drawer, indorser, or acceptor, and adds words to his signature, indicating that he signs for or on behalf of a principal, or in a representative character, he is not personally liable thereon ; but the mere addition to his signature of words describing him as an agent, or as filling a representative character, does not exempt him from personal liability." By subsection 2 : "In determining whether a signature on a bill is that of the principal or that of the agent by whose hand it is written, the construction most favourable to the validity of the instrument shall be adopted."

The plaintiff, who had been appointed receiver on behalf of the debenture-holders of a limited company, sued the defendants as acceptors of a number of bills of exchange. The bills were signed by "R. Kettle, Receiver, Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited" as drawer. They had been accepted in respect of goods supplied by the company to the defendants, and the plaintiff had stated that it must be "clearly understood that I am in no way accepting any liability or responsibility whatever in respect of the orders themselves." The defendants contended that these were "surrounding circumstances" from which the inference should be drawn that the plaintiff did not intend to make himself personally a party to the bills and that, therefore, he was not entitled to sue upon them.

Held, that the above were not "surrounding circumstances" from which the intention of the parties could be inferred, and that such intention must be gathered from the terms of the document alone ; that the words "Receiver, Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited" were words of description only, and that the bills did not purport to have been drawn on behalf of the company. The plaintiff, therefore, was entitled to recover against the defendants upon the bills.

Chapman v. Smethurst (25 The Times L.R., 383 ; [1909] 1 K.B., 927) and Elliott v. Bax-Ironside (41 The Times L.R., 631 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 301) followed and applied.

The plaintiff in this action, Mr. Russell Kettle, who had on March 1, 1926, been appointed receiver on behalf of the debenture-holders of the Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited, sued the defendants, Messrs. Dunster and Wakefield, of Blackfriars House, New Bridge-street, London, E.C., upon a number of bills of exchange accepted by them. The bills were dated on various days between April 16 and April 30, 1926, and were accepted by the defendants in respect of deliveries of paper by the above company to the defendants. They were accepted "payable at Midland Bank, Limited, 5, Princes-street, E.C." and the acceptances were in every case forwarded to the plaintiff with the drawer's name left blank, and were subsequently signed by "R. Kettle, Receiver, Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited," as drawer. The bills having subsequently been dishonoured upon presentation, the plaintiff sued the defendants for £6,365 6s. 9d., the amount of the bills and interest thereon, after the deduction of a sum due to the defendants. The defendants contended that the bills were drawn, on the face of them, on behalf of the company and that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue personally upon them. They further contended that they were entitled to set-off against their liability, if any, in the action an equivalent part of moneys due to them from the company for alleged fraudulent misrepresentation and breach of warranty.

On the appointment of the plaintiff as receiver, the defendants had on March 4, 1926, written to him expressing a desire that he should continue to execute certain pending contracts for the delivery of paper to them, and had added the words "subject to your not being involved in litigation now pending." An action had been commenced by the defendants against the Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited, and another company on August 14, 1925.

The Hon. R. Stafford Cripps, K.C., and Mr. D. B. Somervell appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. B. B. Stenham for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Horridge.—In this case the plaintiff claims upon a number of bills of exchange, and the defendants say, first, that he is not entitled to sue on the bills of exchange because they are drawn, on the face of them, on behalf of a company of which he is receiver and, further, that, if he is entitled to sue, they are entitled to set off against him a claim which they had made against the company in another action and which they repeat in this action.

The facts of the case are that Mr. Kettle was appointed receiver on behalf of debenture-holders on March 1, 1926, and took possession on March 2. Up to the time when he was appointed receiver there had been numerous transactions between the Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited, of whose assets he was appointed receiver, and the defendants. There were at the time orders which had not been executed and which were lying on the premises of the Ford Paper Works. The litigation, as I have said, was pending between the defendants and the Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited, and other parties. The position, therefore, was that Mr. Kettle could, if he had liked, have not gone on with any contracts or made any further deliveries of paper to the defendants. The defendants, as appears by the letter of March 4, to which I shall refer later, were desirous of having the orders completed. That being the state of affairs, the correspondence, to which I shall refer later, passed between the defendants' solicitors and Mr. Kettle. After that correspondence had passed, a number of deliveries were made by the works, on the instructions of Mr. Kettle, to the defendants. When the payment became due, invoices, made out by the Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited, were forwarded by them to Mr. Kettle, who sent on to the defendants the invoices and bills for their acceptance with the drawer's name left blank; the defendants accepted the bills, and a sample of the letter in which they enclosed such acceptances is to be found at page 30 of the correspondence: "Herewith we hand you our acceptances for £1,637 17s. 10d., due August 13, instalment on account for week ended April 10." Those acceptances are the ones on which the plaintiff sues in this case, and the acceptances are admitted all to be in the same form. The form in which they are drawn is: "On August 10 next after date pay to my order" and "for value received," and they are signed: "R. Kettle, Receiver, Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited." On behalf of the defendants it is said that these were bills drawn, on the face of them, on behalf of the Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited.

The cases with regard to this matter are very well summarized in a judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton, in the case of Elliott v. Bax-Ironside (41 The Times L.R., 631; [1925] 2 K.B., 301, at p. 308). The learned Lord Justice there refers to the case of Leadbitter v. Farrow (5 M. and S., 345), where Lord Ellenborough gave the judgment, and to the judgment of Chief Justice Cockburn in Dutton v. Marsh (L.R., 6 Q.B., 361, at p. 364), and he says: "Those cases were before the Bills of Exchange Act, and when Parliament came to codify, and to some extent alter, the law in that Act, they did so in this way." Then he cites section 26, subsection 1 and subsection 2. Subsection 1 is: "Where a person signs a bill as drawer, indorser or acceptor, and adds words to his signature, indicating that he signs for or on behalf of a principal, or in a representative character, he is not personally liable thereon; but the mere addition to his signature of words describing him as an agent, or as filling a representative character, does not exempt him from personal liability"; and then subsection 2, which is an addition to the law in the sense of being for the first time incorporated in any statute, says: "In determining whether a signature on a bill is that of the principal or that of the agent by whose hand it is written, the construction most favourable to the validity of the instrument shall be adopted." That was the portion of the section which was construed in the case of Elliott v. Bax-Ironside (supra). Now the law as laid down previously seems to me to be summarized by the quotation which he gives from Chief Justice Cockburn's judgment in Dutton v. Marsh (supra): "The effect of the authorities is clearly this, that where parties in making a promissory note or accepting a bill, describe themselves as directors, or by any similar form of description, but do not state on the face of the document that it is on account or on behalf of those whom they might otherwise be considered as representing—if they merely describe themselves as directors, but do not state that they are acting on behalf of the company—they are individually liable. But, on the other hand, if they state that they are signing the note or the acceptance on account of or on behalf of some company or body of whom they are the directors and the representatives, in that case, as the case of Lindus v. Melrose (3 H. and N., 177) fully establishes, they do not make themselves liable when they sign their names, but are taken to have been acting for the company, as the statement on the face of the document represented." It was argued before me that in looking at the face of these documents I must take into consideration all the surrounding circumstances; but when those surrounding circumstances come to be analysed they seem to me not to be surrounding circumstances at all. It was said that I must take into account the fact that the company had supplied all the goods; secondly, that I must take into account the fact that in the witness-box Mr. Kettle said that he would have been very much surprised if he had been told he was liable; and, thirdly, it was said that I must look at the letter which he wrote on March 4, in which the expression occurs: "It must be clearly understood that I am in no way accepting any liability or responsibility whatever in respect of the orders themselves." All those matters to me seem not to be surrounding circumstances at all, but evidence from which I am asked to infer the intention of the parties in making the document. Now, I cannot look at those matters at all, in my view. What I have to do is to take the document itself and from that, and from nothing else, except surrounding circumstances which may really be surrounding circumstances, draw an inference as to what it means. I think that is quite clear from the case of Chapman v. Smethurst (25 The Times L.R., 383; [1909] 1 K.B., 927, at p. 930), where Lord Justice Kennedy quotes, with approval, the language of Mr. Justice Channell: "I am of the same opinion on both points. I agree with Mr. Justice Channell when he says that the question 'depends upon the intention of the parties, which intention I think must be gathered from the terms of the document alone.'" Now, applying those tests to this document, I am clearly of opinion that the words "Receiver, Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited" are only words of description and that the documents do not purport to have been made on behalf of the company at all, and that therefore Mr. Kettle is both liable to be sued and able to sue upon these bills of exchange.

Beyond that, a further question arises in regard to the set-off. I think it is clear law, and it really has not been substantially contradicted by Mr. Cripps, that apart from these documents, to which I am shortly going to refer, there would have been no answer to the set-off, because the claim in respect of these bills of exchange is a claim made by Mr. Kettle as receiver for the debenture-holders. It is clear law that the receiver for the debenture-holders is the agent of the company. Therefore, these bills in respect of which he is suing are bills which he held as agent for the company, and as against him and apart from the documents to which I am going to refer, I think the defendants would have been entitled to set off any cross-claims which they had against the limited company. But it is said that these documents amount to an agreement which, at any rate in equity, would bar the defendants' right of set-off. To my mind, the question is: What do these documents mean? Let me look at the circumstances in which they were written. Mr. Kettle had just taken possession as receiver. As I read the letter of March 4 the defendants were desirous that he should continue to execute the orders. He himself could not, in my view, have been joined in any way as a defendant in the then action which was being raised by the defendants against the company, because it was entirely in respect of transactions before he was appointed receiver. Therefore I have, in that state of circumstances, to make up my mind what is the true meaning of the words "subject to your not being involved in litigation now pending." Am I to put upon them the literal construction : "subject to your not being made a party to a pending action," or am I to read them : "We will not avail ourselves of the matters in the pending litigation by using them in any way against you." I have no doubt myself that both parties knew about what they were intending to agree, and I have no doubt myself that what the liquidator intended to protect himself from, and what the defendants knew he intended to protect himself from, was the prior claim against the company being used against him as a set-off. He consented to deliver the goods of the company in respect of which liability would arise, and, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the real meaning of the words "subject to your not being involved in litigation now pending," must be this : that there was an agreement not to raise matters which were the subject-matter of that action against the company in any way in respect of transactions which Mr. Kettle agreed to execute on their behalf. It is said that there is no consideration for this agreement. What might have been the position if the agreement had remained purely unexecuted I do not say ; but here in pursuance of these letters the receiver has himself caused the company to deliver goods and has given ample consideration for the agreement. For these reasons my judgment must be for the plaintiff for the whole amount claimed.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton and Sargant, L.JJ.)
1927. July 21.

REX v. COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE—EX PARTE PEGLER.*

Intoxicating liquors — Tied house — Increase of duty — Apportionment by Commissioners of Customs and Excise — Tenancy entered into after the Act — Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII., c. 8), s. 46.

Section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, which provides for the apportionment between landlords and tenants of "tied" houses of the increased licence duties imposed by that Act, does not apply to tenancies entered into after the Act came into force. So held by Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Sargant, L.J. (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting).

Decision of the Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 441) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the applicant, Mr. Frederick Pegler, the licensee of the City Arms, Bell-lane, Gloucester, from a decision of a Divisional Court—Mr. Justice Avory and Mr. Justice Talbot, Mr. Justice Swift dissenting (43 The Times L.R., 441)—discharging a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus directed to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise commanding them to hear and determine the proportion of the increased duty payable in respect of the appellant's licence under section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910.

Mr. Pegler contended that the Commissioners were bound to hear his application, and that the section authorizing an apportionment of the increased duty was not limited to licences and licence-holders existing at the date when the Act came into operation, but applied to covenants and agreements entered into after the date of the Act. The Commissioners contended that the section related only to covenants, agreements, and licences in existence at the date when the Act was passed.

By section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 :—

"Where a licence-holder is bound by any covenant, agreement, or undertaking, or is otherwise under any direct or indirect obligation of any kind, to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from any person or persons, the licence-holder shall be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to recover as a debt due from or deduct from any sum due to any such person so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement determined by the Commissioners to be proportionate to any increased rent of the licensed premises, or increased prices of intoxicating liquor supplied, or other benefit obtained by such person by reason of any such covenant, agreement, undertaking, or obligation as aforesaid."

Mr. Pegler originally became tenant of the City Arms from Messrs. Arnold, Perrett, and Co., Limited, under a lease dated August 31, 1911, containing a covenant by the tenant to pay

"all rates, tithes, taxes, charges, assessments, duties, and outgoings whatsoever, whether Parliamentary, parochial, local, or of any other description, which are now or may at any time hereafter be assessed, charged, or imposed upon the said demised premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof, the landlords' property tax alone excepted."

There was also a covenant to purchase all liquor from the landlords. The lease was renewed to Mr. Pegler on April 15, 1912 ; to Mr. Pegler and his wife (owing to his war service) on November 4, 1916 ; and to Mr. Pegler on March 5, 1920, that being the subsisting lease and containing the same material covenants as the original lease.

The landlords' business was acquired in 1924 by the Cheltenham Original Brewery Company, Limited, who were now the landlords.

On April 28, 1926, Mr. Pegler, by his solicitors, applied to the Commissioners to determine the proportion of the increased licence duty payable under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. The Commissioners declined to do so on the ground that the section only applied to agreements in existence at the date of the passing of the Act. Mr. Pegler then obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus.

The Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Swift dissenting, discharged the rule, holding that the section applied only to agreements and covenants by licence-holders which were in existence when the Act was passed.

Mr. Pegler appealed.

Mr. Roland Burrows appeared for the appellant ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead for the Commissioners ; and Mr. Mitchell Banks, K.C. (with whom was Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C.) for the landlords.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, stated the question at issue, and said that the facts of the case were fully set out in the judgment of Mr. Justice Swift. By the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, section 43, increased duties were imposed on licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors. The charging section recognized that the new duties created a new situation, owing to the anomalous and peculiar conditions of the liquor laws. Section 43 provided for an adjustment of duty in the case of any licences granted between July 1, 1909, as from which date the duties were first charged, and September 30, 1909. A number of provisions collected in section 53 were labelled "Temporary Provisions."

Section 46 dealt with the case of the tied tenant. The section was intended to meet the new situation and to mitigate the difficulties which might thereby arise for tied tenants under existing tenancy agreements. It opened with words which were agreed by all parties to be colourless. They might be operative at any time, or they might be restricted to leases in existence at the date of the Act. The Court must look at the context to ascertain the meaning of the opening words. In his opinion the object of the section was to restore freedom of contract and to leave the parties free to deal by agreement with a situation which neither of them could have contemplated. The words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" obviously reopened the matter as between the parties. The words "any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act" appeared to refer to matters introduced or brought about by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910.

The parties might agree if they could; if not, the matter must be determined by the Commissioners, upon certain principles, proportionately to the increased rent of the premises or the increased prices of liquors. If the section were to apply to agreements entered into after the Act was passed it would give an opportunity to the tied tenant to reopen a contract into which he had entered with full knowledge of the provisions of the Act. The words of Baron Parke in In re Knight (1 Ex., 802), in which he said that the words of an Act might be reasonably construed to mean "notwithstanding any agreement subsisting between the parties at the time of the passing of that Act," were applicable. He (his Lordship) had found no assistance from the cases which had been cited—Wooler v. North-Eastern Breweries (26 The Times L.R., 129; [1910] 1 K.B., 247) and Watney, Combe, Reid, and Co., Limited v. Berners (31 The Times L.R., 449; [1915] A.C., 885).

It was suggested that some assistance might be afforded by section 2 of the Finance Act, 1912, since repealed. The observations of the Solicitor-General were well founded that, if the construction contended for by the appellant was right, it would have been necessary in 1912 not only to provide for cases of agreements made before the passing of the Act of 1910, but also for cases where leases or agreements had been made since 1910—and that the Act of 1912 did not do. The interpretation which he (his Lordship) thought that the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, ought to bear brought it into line with section 2 of the later Act. Beyond that he could get no assistance from the later Act. The purpose, he thought, of section 46 was to restore freedom of contract in those cases where it was necessary to restore it. After the passing of the Act the parties were free to contract how the licence duties should be borne. He agreed with the judgments delivered by Mr. Justice Avory and Mr. Justice Talbot below. The appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Scrutton said that the case was a very difficult one, as was shown by the dissent of a Judge below and by the dissent which existed in this Court. He had come to the conclusion that the decision of Mr. Justice Swift was right and that the appeal ought to be allowed.

If he (his Lordship) could gather from the language of the Act any scheme which necessitated the adoption of a particular meaning he was entitled to adopt it. Some things he could not do; he could not, for instance, look at what the Minister in charge of the Act said about it in Parliament; nor could he look at a comment in a text-book by a writer who happened to be the draftsman of the Act. He could not speculate as to the facts as a means of construing the Act. He entirely agreed with the observations of Lord Sumner, sitting in the Court of Appeal, in the case of Watney, Combe, Reid, and Co. v. Berners (30 The Times L.R., 577; [1914] 3 K.B., 288, at p. 297), where he said:—

"I think we are not entitled to make any assumptions about the policy of the sections, but have simply to construe them. It seems to have been the view of the Divisional Court that the Legislature could not have meant a liquor-seller to make a profit out of the increase of duty, at any rate not out of a landlord. I think this is an assumption, not a construction. It is an accident that the claimants here are brewers; they succeed, if at all, as mesne landlords. We were given numerous illustrations, by means of hypothetical figures, of the way in which the section might work on alternative constructions of it. These would be very proper for the consideration of those who enacted the section. I think them of no assistance for us, who have only to construe it. When grammar fails, arithmetic will not help us out; so I do not discuss them. The words of this section exactly fit the case before us, and it is only by assuming a limited object for the enactment that a limitation can be put on its words. I have no knowledge of the object in view beyond the enactment itself, and no right to use it if I had any."

He (Lord Justice Scrutton) proceeded to deal with the section, acting on those observations, with which he thoroughly agreed. Having read section 46, his Lordship proceeded. Did the words "where the licence-holder is bound" mean "is bound at the date when the Act was passed"? He thought not. The ordinary meaning of those words in the English language was "is bound when the case comes before the Commissioners to determine it." In In re Stevens—Ex parte M'George (20 Ch. D., 697), Sir George Jessel, discussing the meaning of the words "being a trader" in section 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, said:—

"What do the words mean? Their literal meaning is carrying on trade at the time when the act in question is committed. If there had been no prior statutes and no prior decisions, I do not suppose the point could have been decently argued."

And in In re Pulborough School Board Election (10 The Times L.R., 349; [1894] 1 Q.B., 725) the words "where a debtor is adjudged bankrupt" were held not to have a retrospective effect but to apply to the present time.

He thought that the words in the present Act related to the time when the Commissioners met to consider whether they had jurisdiction to apportion the increased licence duty between landlord and tenant. But was there anything in the section itself to show that a meaning other than the literal meaning should be put on the words, and that they meant "is bound at the date of the passing of the Act"? Those words were not used in the Act, but they were used in the Finance Act, 1912, and might have been inserted by Parliament in the Act of 1910 if they had desired to do so.

The Solicitor-General had argued that the presumption was that Parliament desired to restore freedom of contract. Two of the Judges in the Court below also largely rested their judgments on the presumption that Parliament was not interfering with liberty of contract. On the contrary, Parliament had constantly interfered and prevented parties from making bargains except on the terms of an Act of Parliament. Four years before the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, was passed, the Courts having held that workmen could contract out of the Workmen's Compensation Act then in force, Parliament, by the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, prohibited agreements to contract out of the Act, but expressly permitted agreements fixing the amount of compensation payable.

Parliament had constantly interfered between landlord and tenant in favour of the tenant, who was deemed to be a person in need of protection. That was the origin of the Rent Restriction Acts.

He thought that the later words of the section now in question were equally consistent with either interpretation. Not much light could be got from Wooler v. North-Eastern Breweries (26 The Times L.R., 129 ; [1910] 1 K.B., 247). In Watney, Combe, Reid, and Co., Limited v. Berners (30 The Times L.R., 577 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 288 ; 31 The Times L.R., 449 ; [1915] A.C., 885) three of the Judges took the view that the Act of 1910 applied to contracts entered into after it was passed. He agreed that that was not the point which they had to decide in that case, but it was some consolation to a Judge who was in a minority to find three Judges in another case who were in agreement with him.

Nor could he get any light from a view of the whole Act as to the policy of the Legislature. If the tenant had a tied house, then he could put part of the increased duty on the landlord ; if he had not, but his house was free, then he could not do so. He (his Lordship) could not derive any policy from that. For the reasons stated, he came to the conclusion that the view taken by Mr. Justice Swift was right and that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he agreed with the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. The question was to what time the word "is" was referable, the date of the passing of the Act or the time when an application was made for an apportionment. He differed from the judgment just delivered in thinking that "is" might mean either one or the other, and that the question which time was meant must be determined by the rest of the section. Did not the words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" refer to an agreement in existence at the passing of the Act? No doubt Parliament had often interfered with freedom of contract. But where, of two equally admissible constructions, one led to an interference with freedom of contract and the other did not, the latter should be adopted. He (his Lordship) saw no necessity for Parliament to limit freedom of contract in the future under the Act, and he saw in the section definite indications that such was not the intention. The words "so much of any increase of the duty as may be agreed upon" entirely let in freedom of contract. It was perfectly competent for the tenant to agree with the landlord that he should only deduct an agreed proportion of the increased duty. Therefore he thought the words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" were only to prevent any existing contracts from being rendered unfair to the tenant. The words used were much more apt to refer to an increase of an existing burden on the tenant. In the case of future contracts the amount that would be paid by the tenant could hardly be described as an increase of licence duty payable under the Act. If any indication was to be found as to the meaning in the Finance Act, 1912, section 2, it was so faint that it could not be compared to the very definite words of the existing section. The case was very similar to that of In re Knight (1 Ex., 802), where Baron Parke held that the reasonable meaning of an Act was that the "agreement to the contrary" referred to existing tenancies. The case of Watney, Combe, Reid and Co., Limited v. Berners (31 The Times L.R., 449 ; [1915] A.C., 885) was of a very different nature. There the House of Lords declined to sanction the introduction of any additional words to explain the meaning of an Act. Here the earlier words of the section were equally capable of either interpretation. The applicant, in his Lordship's judgment, had failed to make out his case, and the appeal would be dismissed, with costs. The landlords would also be entitled to their costs.

Court of Criminal Appeal.
(Lord Hewart, C.J., Avory and Salter, JJ.)

1927. July 26.

REX v. HARRIS.*

Criminal Law—Procedure—Right of Judge to call witness—Close of defence—Limitation on right—Something arising ex improviso.

On a criminal trial the right of the Judge to call a witness, after the close of the case for the defence, is limited to cases where in the course of the defence something has arisen ex improviso which no human ingenuity could foresee.

The Court quashed the conviction of Dora Harris, who had been sentenced at the Liverpool Quarter Sessions on June 9, 1927, to 15 months' hard labour for receiving stolen goods in circumstances which are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Maxwell Fyfe appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Lynskey for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Avory, in giving the judgment of the Court, said that five persons were charged before the Recorder at the Liverpool Quarter Sessions with stealing goods and with receiving them knowing them to have been stolen. The two male prisoners, James William Benton and Keyran Meagher, who were charged with stealing, pleaded guilty. The three women, Dora Harris, Lily Sing Sai, and Catherine Lightburn, were charged severally with receiving. The case proceeded with the two admitted thieves in the dock, and evidence was given for the prosecution establishing some sort of prima facie case against the three women. Thereupon each of the women went into the witness-box and gave evidence that she had bought the goods without knowing that they had been stolen, and each was cross-examined. That concluded the case for the defence. The Recorder then said to the prisoner Benton :—

"Benton, are you prepared to give evidence?"—"Yes."

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Recorder.—"I am asking you to give evidence here. I simply want you to tell the truth. You must not imagine you are getting any advantage whatever from what you say."

Benton.—"Yes."

The Recorder.—"I think it is more satisfactory we should hear the boy on the subject. The prosecution, as is usual in these cases, do not call him. I think we might as well. I do not know what he is going to say, but I have some idea."

Benton was then called, undoubtedly making the case against Harris much stronger than before. His examination in chief was conducted by the Recorder, who then said :—

"It is the practice in a case like this to allow cross-examination, though there is no claim as of right. Of course, I permit you to cross-examine the boy, Mr. Fyfe."

At the conclusion of Benton's evidence the Recorder seemed to have formed the view that there was no case against Lightburn, and he directed the jury to return a verdict of "Not guilty" in her case. No suggestion or invitation seemed to have been made to Dora Harris whether she would like to go back into the witness-box. In the result she was convicted.

In these circumstances two questions arose for determination in this Court : (1) Whether the course taken by the Recorder in calling the prisoner at that stage was in accordance with the regular practice at a criminal trial ; (2) assuming that there was no irregularity, whether the Recorder gave the jury the appropriate warning as to the danger of convicting on the evidence of an accomplice.

It had been clearly laid down by the Court of Appeal that in a civil suit the presiding Judge had no right to call a witness without the consent of the parties. It also seemed clearly established that that rule did not apply to a criminal trial, where the liberty of the subject was at stake and the only object was to ensure that strict justice was done between Crown and subject. The two cases of Reg. v. Chapman (8 C. and P., 558) and Reg. v. Holden (8 C. and P., 606) established the right of the Judge to call such a witness. In none of the cases had there been laid down any definite rule limiting the point in the proceedings at which the Judge might exercise that right, but it was obvious that injustice might be done to an accused person unless some limitation were put on the right. The Court adopted the rule laid down by Chief Justice Tindal in Reg. v. Frost (4 State Trials, New Series, 86, at p. 386) :—

"There is no doubt that the general rule is that where the Crown begins its case like a plaintiff in a civil suit, they cannot afterwards support their case by calling fresh witnesses, because they are met by certain evidence that contradicts it. They stand or fall by the evidence they have given. They must close their case before the defence begins ; but if any matter arises ex improviso, which no human ingenuity can foresee, on the part of a defendant in a civil suit, or a prisoner in a criminal case, there seems to me no reason why that matter which so arose ex improviso may not be answered by contrary evidence on the part of the Crown."

That applied only to a witness called by and on behalf of the Crown, but the Court thought that it should apply also to the case where the Judge called a witness in a criminal trial after the close of the case for the defence—i.e., that it should be limited to something arising ex improviso which no human ingenuity could foresee. His Lordship also referred to the observations of Baron Bramwell in Reg. v. Haynes (1 F. and F., 666).

In the present case there was a further objection to the course adopted, because Benton had been in Court during the whole trial. When he was asked to give evidence he must have understood that he was being asked to supplement the case for the prosecution. He was a prisoner who had pleaded guilty and had not been sentenced, and had, therefore, everything to gain by doing what he thought would be pleasing to the Recorder.

Without laying down any general rule that in no case could a Judge call a witness after the close of the case for the defence, the Court thought that in this case it was irregular and calculated to prejudice the trial of this woman Harris.

The Court had also to consider whether, this witness having been called, a proper warning was given to the jury. His Lordship read the warning which was in fact given in the summing up, and said that with all respect to the Recorder it appeared to be defective in exactly the same way as the warning in the case of Rex v. Beebe (41 The Times L.R., 635). The appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Atkin, and Lawrence, L.JJ.) 1927. July 13.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE MINES DRAINAGE COMMISSIONERS v. ELWELL AND SONS.*

Rating — Statutory body — Mine drainage—Power to levy rate—Mortgage of future rates—Cessation of drainage works—Survival of rating powers—South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Acts, 1873 to 1923.

A body of Commissioners was created by statute for the purpose of underground and surface drainage of a mining area with power to levy rates upon occupiers of mines. Power was also given them to borrow money upon mortgage of the produce of future rates, and this power was exercised. Owing to financial and other difficulties the Commissioners ceased to carry on drainage operations in 1919. In 1926 they levied a rate upon the defendants as occupiers of mines in their area. In an action by the Commissioners for the amount of the rate,

Held, that they were entitled to levy the rate notwithstanding the cessation of drainage operations.

Decision of MacKinnon, J. (43 The Times L.R., 471), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice MacKinnon in an action by the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Commissioners for £2,019 13s. 9d., arrears of drainage rates.

The plaintiffs, who were a statutory body, sued the defendants to recover certain sums alleged to be due as rates pursuant to the statutory powers of the plaintiff body. That body was constituted by an Act of Parliament of 1873, called the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Act. There was a series of eight Acts of Parliament, beginning with that first one of

* Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1873, and ending with the eighth one of 1923. It was provided by the first section of the Act of 1923 that this series of eight Acts should be cited together as the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Acts, 1873 to 1923.

The purpose of the original incorporation of the plaintiff body was with a view to providing drainage of water for the South Staffordshire coalfield. The scheme of it was that the Commissioners were to provide drainage of two sorts—first, surface drainage, and secondly, underground or mine drainage. They were, by certain machinery provided in the first Act, to divide up the whole of the South Staffordshire coalfield into certain districts, which districts were to be treated as separate entities. It was provided by section 40 of the Act of 1873 that any particular district by a vote of its electoral members could contract itself out of the operations of the Commissioners as regards the underground mines drainage, though it remained liable to support the Commissioners and to pay rates in respect of the surface drainage. There were about five districts created under the first Act. These five districts included the Tipton district, which came into the scheme and remained in the scheme both as regards the mines drainage and the surface drainage. The other four districts contracted themselves out of the mines drainage and only remained in the scheme as regards the surface drainage. In the history of the operations of the Commissioners, especially as regards the Tipton district, they were faced to an increasing degree as time went on with two difficulties—first, the difficulty of the water, which defied their efforts to pump it or drain it, but, still more seriously, the increasing flood, not of water, but of indebtedness, and that arose more acutely as regards the Tipton district. These difficulties, particularly as regards indebtedness, culminated in 1919 in disaster. The Commissioners were unable, despite several schemes which in these successive Acts had been provided, to raise more money, and the water was becoming increasingly difficult to deal with, and in 1919, as regards the Tipton district, the whole of their pumps and apparatus for the underground mines drainage broke down and were disused, and as from August 31, 1919, there was no more pumping ; but under provisions in several of these Acts the Commissioners had raised money by mortgaging the future produce of the rates which they were entitled to levy, and had issued mortgage debentures to various persons who lent them the money, and since 1919, though no mines drainage had been done in the Tipton or any other district by the Commissioners, they have continued to levy rates in the manner prescribed by the Acts in order to provide funds, not so much for paying off the capital sum of the indebtedness—because that is beyond their powers—but to keep down the ever-increasing burden of interest upon it.

By sections 42 and 43 of the Act of 1873 the Commissioners were given power in respect of the surface drainage to assess and levy upon the occupiers of mines an annual rate, to be called the general drainage rate, to be assessed in respect of all minerals gotten from the mines within the drainage area, and, by section 43, as regards the mines drainage rate, they had power to assess and levy upon the occupiers of mines an annual rate in respect of all minerals gotten from such mines. The maximum amount of these rates was provided by various schedules. That was amended by section 23 of the Act of 1878, chiefly in the way of machinery. That section provided for half-yearly payments instead of the single annual payments. The Commissioners, purporting to act under the powers to levy rates thereby provided, served notices of the making of the rates on the defendants.

Shortly after the coal strike broke out in 1926, the defendants made an arrangement with the agent of Lord Dudley, who owned a large property in this South Staffordshire region and in this Tipton district. Certain letters passed between the defendants and the estate agent and the mineral agent of Lord Dudley.

On May 3, 1926, Mr. Hutton, the estate agent, wrote to the defendants : "Confirming my conversation with you this morning, I am prepared to give you the sole right of the coal pickings from the Conygree and Foxyard area so long as the general strike lasts," with certain exceptions. "After giving full consideration to question of price, I am prepared to accept 1s. 9d. per ton for the coal pickings, as I consider they are fully worth that figure." That the defendants agreed to by a letter of May 4. These letters dealt with coal pickings only, which meant not the winning of virgin coal but the collection of the remains, around old pit-heads, of coal which had been already won but had been wasted and dropped and otherwise not carried off. The operations of the defendants were extended by subsequent letters. On June 5, Mr. Clark, the mineral agent of Lord Dudley, wrote to them : "With reference to the interview you and your son had with Mr. Dudding and me at Dudley yesterday, enclosed I send you tracing showing the Foxyard area and Conygree area edged blue, under which you are to have the sole right of coal pickings," except certain parts. "As arranged yesterday the royalty payable by you for all coal and slack raised up to last night is to be 1s. 9d. a ton (2,240lb.), from thence onwards 3s. 9d. a ton (2,240lb.), you to supply the estates office with the tonnage of coal pickings taken away, and you to pay for the same each month. It is also understood that if Earl Dudley should wish to take away any of the coal pickings, you agree to sell the same on the basis of cost of getting it plus some remuneration for your superintendence and haulage, if any. It is also understood that the numerous little shafts which you have sunk and will sink will have to be filled up again at your cost." The defendants acquiesced.

Pursuant to that arrangement with Lord Dudley's agent, the defendants first of all arranged with a few men that they should go out into this area from which the defendants were given the sole right to get coal and get as much coal as they could, and the defendants would pay them 7s. 6d. a ton for slack and 15s. a ton for coal (described as not slack) loaded into carts. The men so employed increased in numbers considerably and the system came to be one under which a certain number of foremen of gangs, called "staff men," used to deal with the defendants, work with their gangs, get paid for the coal won, and settled with the members of their gangs. Under this system the defendants, according to the evidence, got more than 100,000 tons of coal.

The plaintiffs claimed, under the rating sections above referred to, to be entitled to recover from the defendants the rate assessed and levied on the defendants, as occupiers of mines, in respect of minerals gotten by the defendants from such mines.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon held that the plaintiffs were entitled to levy the rate notwithstanding the cessation of drainage operations (see 43 The Times L.R., 471).

The defendants appealed.

Mr. J. B. Matthews, K.C., Mr. L. J. Sturge, and Mr. Short appeared for the appellants ; Mr. H. H. Joy, K.C., and Mr. R. A. Willes for the respondents ; and Mr. Tristram Beresford held a watching brief for Lord Dudley.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon, and the matter has been very fully argued. A great many sections of these Acts of Parliament have been referred to, but I will state my judgment in as few words as I may.

The action was brought by the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Commissioners, who are a statutory body set up and continued under a series of Acts of Parliament commencing in the year 1873. The claim was for what was said to be the defendants' proper contribution to the mines drainage rate for the Tipton district for the two years June 24, 1925, to June 30, 1926, and for the first moiety of the rate from June 23, 1926, to June 30, 1927. The defendants objected to pay the rate on the ground that they were not liable. Before Mr. Justice MacKinnon and before us four points were taken; three of them went to the entire liability, the fourth went only to the liability in respect of the rate for the first of the two years. The three points that went to the whole claim were, first of all, that the coal which had been gotten by the defendants was not gotten by mining operations; the second was, that even if that were not so, Messrs. Elwell were neither occupiers nor owners of the mines, and for that reason they were not liable. The third ground was that, in the events which had happened, the Commissioners were no longer able to perform their statutory duties and obligations, and that under these circumstances it was not competent for them to assess a rate upon these defendants or anybody. The last point was that in respect of the claim for the first of the two years the rate had not been properly assessed.

Now these were the four points. In order to understand how the claim arose and what it was about, it is necessary just to give a short statement of the facts. These Commissioners were set up to deal with an area in South Staffordshire which is referred to in the statutes as the South Staffordshire coalfield. We have seen a drawing of a section of that coalfield, and it appears that the main seam, the thick seam, which is the seam which was worked in the district, lies to a depth, I think, of about 400 feet, or somewhere thereabouts, but there are upper seams, and very narrow seams; one of them, the uppermost, is only some 2ft. thick, and it outcrops to the surface or very near the surface in certain parts of the district. Owing to the thinness of the seam, it is apparently not a paying proposition to attempt to work it under ordinary conditions. The whole scheme of these statutes, so far as it related to the drainage of the area by pumping operations, had ceased to operate in 1919, owing to the fact that the water had overcome the pumping power of the Commissioners, and they were not really in a position to deal with the water; they had no money, and pumping operations had practically ceased; the mines had become flooded, and coal was not being raised from the lower seam. In 1926 there came the coal strike, and then the conditions so altered that it became profitable to work this upper seam from the surface; Messrs. Elwell, seizing the opportunity in May of 1926, apparently commenced working an area in this coalfield. It was on June 5, 1926, that the representative of the royalty owner, Lord Dudley, whose estates were carried on by, or had been merged into, a private company, the Himley Estates Company, wrote a letter which defined the position of Messrs. Elwell in reference to this area. He begins by saying: "With reference to the interview you and your son had with Mr. Dudding and me at Dudley yesterday, enclosed I send you tracing showing the Foxyard area and Conygree area edged blue, under which you are to have the sole right of coal pickings, excepting under Clarke's take, Wall's take, the area sold and Baggott's take, shown approximately on the same plan." We have seen the tracing, and it shows a very considerable area, and it shows these excluded portions. "As arranged yesterday the royalty payable by you for all coal and slack raised up to last night"—which shows that they had been working for some time before this letter was written—"is to be 1s. 9d. a ton (2,240lb.), from thence onwards 3s. 9d. per ton (2,240lb.), you to supply the estates offices each week with the tonnage of coal pickings taken away, and you to pay for the same each month. It is also understood that if Earl Dudley should wish to take any of the coal pickings, you agree to sell the same on the basis of cost of getting it plus some remuneration for your superintendence and haulage, if any. It is also understood that the numerous little shafts which you have sunk and will sink will have to be filled up again at your cost." Under this authority Messrs. Elwell commenced to work, and there is no doubt as to the system of working adopted, and there is no doubt that it was not a question of getting out a few hundredweights of coal about which it might be said de minimis and you cannot apply the term "mining" in respect of it—by the system which was adopted they raised and disposed of considerably more than 100,000 tons. Now what was the method adopted? This letter refers to the permission to work under the surface, and it speaks about "the numerous little shafts which you have sunk and will sink" which will have to be filled up. The system has been quite clearly described—"little pot-holes" Mr. Matthews chooses to call them: that is only his opprobrious expression. They were in fact holes, and in reference to getting coal from below the surface the mining expression in reference to such a hole is a shaft, and a shaft may be a deep shaft, or it may be a very shallow shaft, but the proper expression, with deference to Mr. Matthews, in reference to any hole by which you seek to get coal perpendicularly from the surface, is a shaft, and it is so described in this letter which I have just read.

These shafts varied in depth, as one may imagine, because coal was reached at distances from the surface which varied possibly according to the lie of the coal, possibly according to the lie of the surface, but in some cases they were as deep as 30 feet. In my opinion the hole, whether it is 30 feet deep or 20 feet deep, is properly described as a shaft, and it is properly described as a shaft within the meaning of the Mines Act. I think anybody who dug a hole 30 feet deep for the purpose of getting coal, lead, or any other minerals, and left it unfenced on the ground that it was not a shaft, would find himself in difficulty. However, these holes were dug, and in my opinion they are properly called shafts. From the bottom of these shafts coal was obtained by driving adits following the coal. I do not know whether the coal lies flat, or whether it dips—there must be some sort of a dip, or else it would not come to the surface, I imagine. The coal was followed and it was followed underground so long as it was safe to follow it without incurring the expense of timbering, or without getting into any difficulty with regard to ventilation. As soon as the point was reached when the men who were working thought it was dangerous to proceed further, what they did was, they ceased to work there and proceeded to sink—I think that is the right word—another small shaft, and conduct the operations underground from a new position.

Now we have heard a great deal about what constitutes a mine, and we have had a great many cases referred to. It is a difficult question in many cases. I think in all the cases you find that it is laid down that the question what constitutes a mine may be properly said to be partly a question of law and partly a question of fact, but it is always largely a question of fact, and what I think is accepted as a very good test, if not a conclusive test, is whether the mineral, be it what it may, is worked underground or not so as to leave the surface untouched, and also, I think, one has to consider the nature of the mineral. Here it is coal, it is coal approached by means of a shaft, coal worked by an underground working, and in my opinion it is impossible successfully to contend that this mineral—amounting to 100,000 tons—was not got by mining operations, and by mining operations which constituted the place where the operation was carried out a mine. That disposes of one of the main points which were taken by the defendants.

The second point was that they were not occupiers, and they sought to establish that in this way. It was said on their behalf that in the first instance they employed five or six men, who were in the position of gangers, I suppose, if there had been a lot of navvies, and they allowed them to do the work and to get as many people as they liked to help them to work. The terms were that they were to be paid so much a ton, and that they would distribute the money so earned among those who had worked under them ; but so many men were out of work, and so obviously easy was it to raise coal under these conditions in considerable quantities, that a very large number of men offered themselves, and they were allowed to go to work in this area upon the condition that whatever coal they raised should be placed at the disposal of the defendants at a certain price per ton and put into their carts, the defendants sending their carts to the mouth of the shaft. Having regard to the definition in the Act of "occupier," it seemed to us—the point does not seem to have been taken before Mr. Justice MacKinnon, at any rate he does not seem to refer to it—quite obviously under these circumstances the defendants came within the statutory definition of occupier in section 3 of the Act of 1873, which is : "The expression 'occupier' means any person actually working any mine or entitled to work such mine, and includes any lessee so working a mine." When it was pointed out to Mr. Matthews that, having regard to this form of working, it could not really be seriously argued that Messrs. Elwell, his clients, were not persons either actually working in this way in the mine or entitled to work such mine, and that under the circumstances they came within the definition of occupier, Mr. Matthews did what he does not often do, he gave up the point. That disposes of the second point.

Now I shall take the fourth point, which deals only with the first assessment. The point is this—on the face of it it is a very good point and remains a good point until you ascertain the facts—the awards of the arbitrators in respect of this particular area have to be made in June or July of each year—in fact, the award was made in June of this particular year. There are two provisions in the statute which it is material to consider : one is a provision dealing with the case where an award has been made but it may become necessary to amend that award because the quantity of coal gotten is either more or less than the estimated amount in the award, and that is dealt with by section 24 of the Act of 1878 ; and there is a later section, section 30 of the Act of 1891, which allows the Commissioners to assess and levy the rate upon every occupier who may commence his occupation after the general yearly assessment. In this case the defendants commenced their operations towards the end of the year of assessment, and it was not a case, therefore, where it was possible, at that late stage, to amend the existing assessment, because in fact there was no existing assessment in respect of their particular working. What the Commissioners in fact did was to proceed under section 30 and make an assessment on the footing that the defendants had commenced their occupation after the general yearly assessment, and having done that they proceeded afterwards to amend. Now the point was made upon the assumption that no assessment had been made under section 30, but that the Commissioners had made a mistake and had dealt with the matter as though they were in a position to amend an existing assessment. Mr. Matthews contended that that assessment was bad. The learned Judge in his judgment came to the conclusion that an assessment was made under section 30, and having been made under section 30, and having been made during the year of assessment, it was competent for the Commissioners afterwards to amend that assessment. If the learned Judge was right in his conclusion of fact that the assessment under section 30 was in fact made, and was in fact made during the year of assessment, Mr. Matthews's point from that point of view fails, and it now appears that what happened apparently at the trial was that the learned Judge had the witness up on to the Bench, or close to him, and he explained the book in which the assessment is entered, and satisfied the Judge that the assessment was in fact made during the year of assessment.

The learned Judge does not deal with that point at length, but simply states his conclusion that the assessment had been made. During the discussion in this Court the point has been made plainer by the production of the resolution making the assessment under section 30, and that resolution appears to have been passed during the year of assessment. Mr. Matthews says that it is not sufficient, because he says it does not constitute an assessment unless there is not only the passing of the resolution, but the entering of the fact of the resolution having been passed in the assessment book, and notification to the person assessed. The answer to that seems to me to be this: It cannot be necessary as a matter of common law, it can only be necessary if it is a requirement of the statute that the entry should be made in the book, and that notice should be given to the person assessed in order to constitute a good assessment. Apart from any such statutory provision, it seems to me to follow that if Commissioners are given the power to make the assessment, and they do meet and they do fulfil all their statutory requirements with regard to meeting—that is to say, a majority, and all the rest of it—and they do formally pass a resolution making the assessment, that constitutes a good assessment within the meaning of the statute. I think, therefore, that point fails.

Now the third point, which is undoubtedly the most important, is one which requires a very careful and full examination of the statutes, and I do not propose to follow the arguments that have been addressed to us, but merely to summarize my conclusions. The point taken is, that by analogy to such authorities as Aiton v. Stephen (1 App. Cas., 456), or by analogy to such rules of law as are applicable to the case of franchises and markets and tolls, a person cannot claim a statutory or other toll or payment unless he is able and in a position to prove that he is capable of performing the duty or the obligation in respect of which the payment is to be demanded and to be made. It is admitted that no authority directly bearing on the point can be found. This is not surprising, because it seems to me that the principle is wholly inapplicable to this particular collection of statutory duties and obligations. One has to bear in mind, and as far as one can to summarize, what the position created by these statutes is. The South Staffordshire coalfield was liable to flooding, and liable to extensive flooding, because of the number of mines without sufficient barriers between them, and because of the surface water which had accumulated and was finding its way underground and drowning out the whole of the available mineral, so that unless there could be some combination of the mineral owners it would be impossible to work the coal in the district. For that purpose the first Act of 1873 was passed, which recites the difficulties, and, shortly speaking, was passed for the purpose of meeting the difficulties and overcoming them if possible. This was the scheme : There was to be a body of Commissioners representative of the district, and the Commissioners had power to appoint arbitrators. The arbitrators were to consider the needs of the district, the amount required in order to cope with the difficulties, and then as far as possible, first of all, to ascertain the amount that was required to meet and counter the difficulties, and also it was within their province to consider the position of individual mines, and to consider how far they were likely to be benefited, or how far they were contributing to the mischief, and generally, if in their opinion it was equitable, to treat certain particular mines either by relieving them to some extent or by requiring them to bear a greater burden ; it was in their jurisdiction to do that. Having made their award, the Commissioners were then to assess the various mines. The amount of the rate and the way in which it was to be ascertained were set out in a schedule. I will just deal with one—the later schedule—which I think is in the Act of 1878. Form A of the Second Schedule there gives the form for the general drainage rate, and Form B the form for the mines drainage rate. In each case the rate is so much per ton of mineral, and it is noticeable, I think, in reference to Mr. Matthews's argument, that the general drainage rate is 1d. per ton on the various kinds of minerals described, "raised" out of all mines within the drainage area. In the mines drainage rate it is so much per ton on the various forms of minerals "gotten" from all mines within the area. I should like just to call attention to this, which seems to me not immaterial when one is considering Mr. Matthews's argument : that where a drainage rate is leviable over an area and ascertained per ton of mineral raised, as a matter of business it follows that it is the royalty owner, the mineral owner, who has to bear, at any rate to some extent, and very often to a large extent, the drainage rate, because anybody who wants to work the mineral, in considering what royalty he is prepared to pay, and can afford to pay, will always take into consideration the fact that he is liable, and will become liable, to the drainage rate. Therefore it seems to me, as a matter of course, to follow that where any such scheme as this is in operation it is the royalty owner who, to a large extent, has to bear whatever the drainage rate may be, although the drainage rate is recoverable from the occupier. In this particular case these defendants, Messrs. Elwell, elected to commence this very large operation of mining, and elected to commence it within this drainage area, but under circumstances in which the mines were not troubled with water, and therefore no doubt it is open to them to say that this drainage scheme, and these drainage operations, even if they were in full operation, would have no effect upon them ; they would not have benefited them in any way, but, of course, if the pumps had been working they could not have raised the argument which they have raised. They would have had to pay the rate, although it did not benefit them in the least. Their argument is that, because in 1919 the Commissioners had to shut down operations for want of funds and inability to cope with the volume of water, they are no longer in a position either to assess anyone, or any mine, or to demand a rate. The answer to that seems to me to be this : It is quite true that when you read the earlier sections you come to the conclusion that the primary duty of the Commissioners was to deal with the water trouble by pumping operations, and that they were under a statutory duty to do that, and to take the necessary steps in order to raise the money to enable them to fulfil that statutory duty ; but it is plain from the recitals in the statutes themselves that there came a time when they were unable to perform that statutory duty for want of money, and an appeal had to be made to the public to subscribe the necessary funds to enable them to raise a sum which it was thought at that time would be sufficient to enable them to continue operations with some reasonable hope of paying the interest on any money that the public subscribed.

The second set of statutes, if I may use that expression, consisted of statutes passed for the purpose of enabling money to be subscribed by the public, and it seems to me that, although it was a secondary purpose, from the time when these statutes were passed the statutory obligation of the Commissioners to raise whatever money could be raised in the interests of the persons who had lent the money was just as strong and just as binding as their original statutory obligation to carry out the pumping operations. It does not seem to me, in the face of this scheme of legislation, that it is possible to contend that the Commissioners were no longer performing their statutory duties, because their statutory duty to raise a rate upon every ton of coal mined within the area was just as strong as their statutory obligation to continue pumping as long as they had funds to enable them to do so, and when you find that this very large amount of coal, over 100,000 tons, was raised within this area by mining operations from mines—when you find that, what answer would the Commissioners have received, if they had said to anyone who was entitled to complain in reference to the performance of these duties : "We are not going to attempt to get any drainage rate in respect of these tons of coal, because we cannot any longer carry out the pumping operations" ? The answer would be : "You are under an equally peremptory statutory duty to raise a rate on every ton of coal in the interests of the people who advanced the money in the hope of saving this scheme." It does not seem to me to be an answer to that to say : "The thing is in a hopeless position now ; any money we raise will be of so small an amount that really if it went into the pockets of the persons who lent the money, it would be such a small amount that it ought not to be considered." Until Parliament intervenes, and it may be that the time has come when Parliament should be asked to intervene, the statutory duty upon the Commissioners is absolute, and they must in respect of every ton of coal raised within this area by mining operations levy the rate even though it appears in the events which have happened to be unlikely that the persons for whose protection that statutory duty was imposed would benefit by it.

That is my view about the construction of these statutes as a whole, and so the answer is the one which Mr. Justice MacKinnon gave. Taking these points one by one they fail, and the result is that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin.—This is an action brought by the South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Commissioners in pursuance of a series of Acts dating from 1873 and extending to 1923. The Commissioners were incorporated by the Act of 1873, which is an Act that recites : "Whereas there are within the portion of South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire known as the South Staffordshire coalfield large mines of coal, ironstone, and other minerals, some of which are already so flooded with water as to prevent the working thereof, whilst the working of others is impeded and rendered more costly by the flow of water into them either immediately from the surface or from other mines, or by percolation, and large bodies of water are now collected and are increasing in exhausted and abandoned mines, the irruption of which water into existing workings will not only prevent those workings, but has been and is likely to be destructive to human life : And whereas the mining operations within the limits of this Act have disturbed the surface of the soil, and have thus diverted the ancient water-courses and have caused ponds from which the water flows into the mines : And whereas the purposes of this Act are to remedy the existing mischiefs and to prevent the recurrence thereof, and for those purposes it is of great public and local importance that provision should be made—For disposing of the surface water falling or flowing into or pumped from the mines within the limits of this Act, so that the same shall not find its way into the mines within those limits ; For pumping out the water already collected in mines still working, or in disused mines ; and For preventing as far as may be the accumulation of water in any such mines, whether by percolation or irruption or otherwise : And it is expedient that Commissioners should be appointed." It then proceeded to give the Commissioners powers which included the appointment of arbitrators to divide the area into various districts, and the function of the arbitrators was primarily—that is to say, in the first instance—to develop a scheme, or a number of schemes, for the proper pumping of the particular district. These schemes, when approved by the Commissioners, were to be carried out by them. For the purpose of raising the necessary money there was power in the Commissioners to levy rates upon the occupiers of mines within the district, and there is a series of elaborate provisions as to the way in which these rates are to be assessed and are to be levied. For this purpose the arbitrators are to be employed annually—each year the arbitrators are to decide what tonnage rate will be required in the forthcoming year for the purpose of meeting the expenses under the Act. Their power was limited to saying what the amount of the tonnage rate should be within a limit of 6d. per ton for coal raised. That was altered afterwards, I think in 1894, to 9d., which is the maximum now ; but the arbitrators were not only to do that, they were to survey the whole of the mines upon the occupiers of which an assessment was to be made, and they were to take into account the special conditions of each mine. They had power to exempt certain mines altogether from being liable to the rates, and they could apportion the rate which they were to fix between the other mines. In the words of the Act as now amended, that is, by the Act of 1878, they were to make draft awards as to the amount per ton of mines drainage rate that would be required to be levied upon minerals in each drainage district for the drainage of mines, and they were to take into account the amount of reduction per ton to be made in the mines drainage rate in favour of any particular mine or mines in any such district or sub-district in consideration of the circumstances of such mine or mines in relation to the other mines or mine in such district or sub-district, and they were to take into account the total exemption of any particular mine or mines, if any, in any such district or sub-district in consideration of the circumstances of such mine or mines in relation to the other mines or mine in such district or sub-district, and they were to make a draft award which was to be submitted to the Commissioners. They could hear the parties who were interested in the award, and after hearing such parties then the final award would be made, and upon the final award it would be for the Commissioners to assess the occupiers of the different mines and to levy on them the rate which had been allowed by the arbitrators.

Section 43 of the Act of 1873 provides : "The Commissioners shall also, after the settlement of the award or awards of the arbitrators relating thereto, assess and levy upon the occupiers of mines an annual rate in respect of all minerals gotten from such mines and such rate . . . shall be fixed according to the scale with respect to each drainage district"—that is, the scale the arbitrators have fixed—"and (if the award shall so prescribe) with respect to the particular mines in each district which the award of the arbitrators shall have prescribed ; and the said mines drainage rate shall in no case exceed in respect of each class of mineral mentioned in the said Schedule II. the amount specified." As I said, originally it was 6d. and it is now 9d. That procedure is supposed to have been gone through, and must be assumed to have been gone through, in the case of the assessments made upon the defendants in this case for the year ending June 30, 1926, and the year ending June 30, 1927. The defendants have been assessed to a rate by the Commissioners, and for that sum they are being sued in pursuance of the powers in the Act which authorizes the Commissioners to proceed by action. They say in the first place that, inasmuch as the power under section 43 is to assess the occupiers of mines, (a) that from which they are raising coal is not a mine, and (b) they are not occupiers, and therefore the assessment was wrongly made upon them. The position was that the working of coal in this particular area arose by reason of the great coal strike last year. It appears to me from the documents and from the evidence that has been given that the defendants were in fact working mines in the area under powers which had been granted to them by the document to which my Lord has referred. There is a very extensive area in which they are entitled, with certain small exceptions, to work the coal, no doubt to work it, as it was called, by picking it and to work it below a certain seam, which seam either outcropped or was very near the surface. The way in which the defendants proceeded in the first instance was by agreeing with six or seven men that they would in fact win the coal and they would then sell the coal to the defendants at 15s. per ton, and that the defendants would then have the disposal of the coal. The defendants paid a royalty to Lord Dudley's company. No doubt the scheme of only employing six or seven men was enlarged, at first against the will of the defendants, for it became apparent that a large amount of coal was to be got and a large amount of profit was to be made, and apparently numbers of gangs of men proceeded to work in this area with the eventual consent of the defendants, and they all worked upon the same terms. I think it is probably right, as Mr. Matthews has said, that they were all sub-licensees of the defendants, but larged against the will of the defendants, for it became the result was that a very large tonnage was raised and the workings took different forms, going deeper below the surface at some places than at others, but in some cases forming holes or shafts as much as 30 feet deep, and then after the shaft, which apparently went into the seam, was sunk—the coal was excavated as far as the area of the shaft—the men proceeded to run tunnels or roads as far as they could either into the coal or along the face of the seam so that they could win the coal in these roads or tunnels. It appears to me that that is certainly mining and these were mines. They were, if you please, miniature mines as compared with the full grown, fully developed, mine with which we are familiar, but the whole process seems to me to be entirely the same, and there is no doubt that, even if some degree of underground working is necessary before one can say that there is a mine, here there was that underground working. I think this coal was obtained from coalmines, and I am quite clear that these works were within the purview of these Mines Drainage Acts and were mines.

The other question is whether or not the defendants, who adopted this procedure, were occupiers of the mines. We are relieved from considering the somewhat difficult questions which arise in rating cases when you are considering questions of rating for Poor Law purposes, because there is a definition of occupier in the Act of 1873, in section 3, which no doubt was intended for the purpose of obviating these difficulties. That section says : "The expression 'occupier' means any person actually working any mine or entitled to work such mine." I myself have no difficulty at all in coming to the conclusion that the defendants here were working these mines through their sub-licensees, from whom they bought the coal at the surface and loaded it into carts, and therefore, as far as that is concerned, the assessment seems to me to have been regular.

I think perhaps this is a convenient moment to deal with the point taken in Mr. Matthews's argument as to whether the first assessment was irregular. The point that was made about it was this : The defendants only began this working in May, 1926, within the last two months of the ordinary year which terminated at the end of June, 1926, and therefore they were not included in the first assessment that was made in the ordinary course of business by the Commissioners at the commencement of that year, but they were in fact assessed, and they were given notice, as we know, in July of an amended assessment which purports to be made under section 24 of the Act of 1878. Mr. Matthews says that that can only refer to an amendment of an assessment already made, and that there was no assessment which could be amended under section 24 of the Act of 1878, and he says, "Inasmuch as you have only served me with notice of an amendment of an assessment you cannot rely upon any powers to assess me." The power to assess an occupier who is not included in the original assessment is given by the Act of 1891, section 30, which says : "The Commissioners shall assess and levy the mines drainage rate in each drainage district of the drainage area on every occupier who may commence his occupation after the general yearly assessment shall have been from time to time made," and what is, I think, a very material provision :— "Every such assessment shall in all respects take effect as if made at the time when the general assessment was made." It was, I think, proved that the Commissioners did make an additional assessment in pursuance of that section upon the defendants in June, 1926, for we have their minute, and their minute is dated June 23, 1926. The additional assessment is in fact entered up in the assessment book of the Commissioners, though I think it is fairly plain that it was not completed until at any rate July 10, 1926. I think it is plain also from the correspondence that notice of that assessment was in fact given to the defendants, because they returned it in their letter of July 13, 1926, and it was sent back to them by the Commissioners on July 15, 1926. Therefore I think the position is that an assessment was made and notice of it was given to the defendants in July, 1926. The assessment was made in June and notice was given on or about July 10, 1926, and then notice of the amended assessment was given on July 30, 1926.

Now I am not disposed to discuss the question raised by Mr. Matthews as to whether an assessment can be said to be complete until the notice has been given. I think it is very likely that that may be so, but his further point is that the assessment was not made within the year of assessment, within the year in which the rate was due. As to that all I can say is that I see in the Act no provision which compels the assessment to be completed within the year for which the rate is claimed, and it appears to me that the provision as to assessing persons who come into occupation after the year has begun might be found quite unworkable if the words were as rigid as that. I know of no principle of law which compels us to come to that conclusion. Unless there are statutory provisions to the contrary, an assessment may be a good assessment though it was not made within the actual year, provided that it is bona fide made for the purposes of that year. Therefore it seems to me that the defendants fail.

Now there was a further point that was raised by Mr. Matthews, or sought to be raised by him, and that was to the effect that section 30 could not be operated at all in the case of an occupier of a new mine because, it is said, the scheme of the Act plainly shows that it was intended that the arbitrators should have the opportunity, in the first instance, by their draft award of considering whether any mine, the occupier of which was to be assessed, should be exempted altogether or should have the rate reduced on taking into consideration the relation of his mine to the other mines, the question being as to the extent of the benefit that he really received from the drainage operations, past or present, of the Commissioners. I say nothing about that because I am satisfied that that point was waived by agreement in the Court below. I think it is a point which may deserve serious consideration hereafter, but it is one which is not open to the appellants in this case, and therefore I say no more about it.

That only leaves the other and very substantial point which is raised by Mr. Matthews. He says that in the circumstances that have happened the Commissioners have lost their power of levying any rate at all for the purposes of the Act. If recourse is had to the evidence of the history of these Commissioners from the year 1873, it is plain that in this Tipton district it has proved to be a career of disaster. As early as 1891 the Commissioners had borrowed a sum of over £200,000. There were difficulties then in the repayment of these sums and in providing for the interest, and it was thought that if more money were borrowed and thrown into the flood there would be more chance of improving the pumping operations and getting more coal and raising more money from the rate, and thereby achieving the purposes of the Act, but unfortunately these expectations were disappointed. In August, 1919, the works of the Commissioners were apparently overwhelmed by water, and from about that time they did no pumping at all; the only pumping that has been done has been the pumping that was done by the Birmingham Canal Company with a view to supplying themselves with water. The report of the engineer for the year in question, the first year, says that the Commissioners did no pumping during that year directly or indirectly; therefore the money that was levied from the defendants was clearly not levied for the purpose of pumping, which Mr. Matthews says was the primary obligation for which the Commissioners were entrusted with their statutory power.

Now I think there is a good deal to be said for that proposition, speaking generally. One is very familiar with the grant of powers of levying money, by way of toll, to persons who have been given special powers of levying the toll either by charter or by grant, or some other way. In these cases the right to levy a toll has always been granted with a duty corresponding, either a duty of maintaining a ferry, or repairing a highway, or repairing a bridge, and so forth. In these cases it has frequently happened that the person who neglects the duty for which he is granted the right of toll is subject to indictment or other appropriate remedy, and there is no doubt also that there are cases where he has ultimately failed to perform his duty and has also been held necessarily to have forfeited his right to toll. That does not extend merely to cases of grants by charter or otherwise, but in the case of Aiton v. Stephen (1 App. Cas., 456) it was applied by Lord Cairns in the House of Lords to a case of a grant of a right of toll under a statute where the owner of a harbour was granted the right of demanding a toll for boats laid up in the harbour, and where he had refused to allow the fishermen to beach their boats on the part of the harbour that belonged to him. It was held that he was only granted by the statute the right to demand a toll in consideration of his performing his statutory duty of allowing the fishermen to lay up their boats in the ordinary way, in that case by beaching. For my part I am inclined to think that that might very well apply to statutory powers of levying rates—that is to say, if the person to whom is entrusted the statutory power of levying a rate for the purpose of performing a statutory duty has ceased to perform that duty altogether, I think it may well then be said, not that the Act of Parliament has come to an end, because I think the statute continues—it is an odd position to say that statutory rights and duties can be terminated by the will of the parties in these circumstances—but I think it may very well be said that the person who is granted the statutory right is not in fact exercising his statutory right for his statutory purposes, and therefore that is an objection, and a valid objection, to his seeking to enforce the right. In this particular case there can be no doubt, I think, under the statutes, that there are duties imposed upon the Commissioners to raise money by these rates for the purpose not only of making the actual drainage works and carrying out the drainage, but also for the purpose of recouping themselves the money which they have borrowed and of providing the interest for the persons who have lent the money on the faith of these statutory powers. That the obligations for these purposes still have to be carried out in the sense that money is still due there can be no question at all, as I will shortly mention. It appears to me, therefore, in the circumstances of this particular case, that it is impossible to say, in view of the very specific obligations imposed upon the Commissioners to levy the rate for the purpose of raising the interest as long as that interest remains unpaid, that the Commissioners are guilty of any irregularity, or are not levying the rate for some of the statutory purposes.

That being so, I think it is impossible in law to say that the Commissioners are not within their rights, but at the same time I feel bound to say that it appears to me a matter of great public importance that light should have been thrown upon the circumstances of these Commissioners, and upon the existing state of things in reference to the Tipton district, because the state of things at the present moment as disclosed in the accounts of 1926—and these are the only accounts that we have got—is that at the present moment there is due for principal—that is to say, for money lent—a sum of £472,000, and there is now due for interest and arrears of interest from the Commissioners for the same district no less than a sum of £390,000—that is, a sum of £862,000 altogether. It also is shown by these accounts that after raising from tonnage rates a sum of £1,500 odd, which is £400 or £500 more than it was the year before as shown by the report of the receiver, by reason of the windfall occasioned by these pickings during the strike, the total revenue only came to £1,500, and the expenditure was £1,981, which was merely the expenditure for meeting the general charges, which means rent of offices, and so on, apportioned to each district, and a sum of about £400, or something less, for the inspectors who find out that there is £1,500 worth of tonnage in the district which can be levied, and £400, I suppose, as an apportioned charge for the receiver's remuneration; so on revenue account there is a deficit of £400, and that deficit has to go to meet an annual amount of interest due of £16,230. It is a matter of interesting calculation as to the period of time at which a deficit of £400 a year will finally wipe out a total indebtedness of over £800,000 with an annual amount of interest due of over £16,000, and there are no prospects, or no substantial prospects, of any alleviation in that position. Such amount at any time as will go to the creditors will be something quite infinitesimal, and to attempt to pay them by these means would be something like the attempt to drain the South Staffordshire area with a tea-spoon. But the position in law in view of our decision is this, that for all time, because these obligations exist for all time, it would be possible to levy these rates upon the persons who are liable to pay any toll at all in this particular district, and it appears that for all time the ultimate destination of the money so paid will be more likely to go to meeting the expenses of officials who no doubt thoroughly earn their money than to affording any prospect at all of making any kind of diminution of the growing load of debt. Of course, if matters of this sort were put before the Court in the course of ordinary litigation, it would be the duty of the Court to put a stop to them at once, and to see that the necessary steps were taken to wind up a body which was in that position, but that, of course, is not the function of this Court in relation to this statutory body. All that I can say is that I think these facts and circumstances do suggest that it is very much to the advantage of the public that both in this district and elsewhere the Mines Department should direct their attention to this matter and should obtain some legislative provision for terminating such an extremely unsatisfactory state of things. In the meantime, I think the proposition of law must be that the Commissioners retain their right to make these levies, and therefore they were right in making this claim. As regards the point that has not been dealt with, it is of course open on any other future occasion, but at present it appears to me that the judgment of the learned Judge was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed, with the usual consequences.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree. Speaking for myself, I am quite content to let the case rest on the careful judgment of Mr. Justice MacKinnon, with which I fully agree and to which I do not think I could usefully add anything.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton and Sargant, L.JJ.)
1927. July 29.

ALBEMARLE SUPPLY COMPANY, LIMITED v. HIND AND CO.*

Lien — Hire-purchase agreement — Taxicabs — Repairs — No authority to hirer to create a lien — Possession parted with for limited purpose.

The plaintiffs let three taxicabs to B. on hire-purchase agreements which provided that B. should not have authority to create a lien on the taxicabs in respect of repairs. Up to May 1, 1925, the cabs, with the consent of the plaintiffs, had been garaged at the defendants' garage and B. owed the defendants the balance of a general account for garage rent, goods supplied, and washing, cleaning, and repairing the cabs. The defendants had never been aware of the terms of the agreements between B. and the plaintiffs. On May 1, 1925, the plaintiffs terminated the agreements as B. was in arrear with his payments, but the defendants refused to hand them the cabs, asserting that they had a lien for repairs. In an action for the delivery-up of the cabs and damages for their detention,

Held, that the lien might attach notwithstanding the provision that B. should not have authority to create a lien, and that, although the defendants did not have continuous possession of the cabs, yet since, in letting B. take them out to ply for hire, they parted with possession without any intention to abandon the right of lien, the action failed.

Decision of Swift, J. (43 The Times L.R., 652), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of Mr. Justice Swift (43 The Times L.R., 652) in an action of detinue.

The plaintiffs, the Albemarle Supply Company, Limited, claimed from the defendants, Messrs. Hind and Co., the delivery-up of three motor-taxicabs, which they alleged to be their property, or the value of the taxicabs, and damages for their detention.

The defendants denied that they had detained the taxicabs from the plaintiffs, and alternatively said that, if they had detained the taxicabs, they had done so under a lien to which they were entitled.

The plaintiff company, among other things, let out taxicabs on the hire-purchase system. On May 3, 1921, September 13, 1922, and May 5, 1923, they let three Fiat taxicabs to one John Botfield on hire-purchase agreements. The agreements were in the same terms. They provided for the payment of hire and for the purchase of the vehicle when a certain sum had been paid by the hirer to the plaintiffs.

By clause 5 of each agreement it was provided that the hirer should not have, or be deemed to have, any authority to pledge the credit of the owners for repairs to the vehicles, or to create a lien upon the same in respect of such repairs. In 1925, the hirer being in arrear with the rent payable under each of the hire-purchase agreements, the plaintiffs terminated the hirings by a letter of May 1 of that year.

At that time the taxicabs were garaged, to the knowledge of the plaintiffs, at the garage of the defendants, and had been garaged there for a considerable time. Botfield had, between May 9, 1924, and May 5, 1925, become indebted to the defendants in sums amounting to £1,222 7s. 10d for garage rent, goods, washing, cleaning, and repairs of five taxicabs which he kept there. He made payments generally on account, leaving a balance of £94 11s. 1d.

Mr. Justice Swift held that the defendants were entitled to appropriate payments made to them up to the last moment, so as to leave a balance owing for repairs in respect of each taxicab and to base a lien thereon; that the defendants could assert a lien on the taxicabs, though when they claimed to retain them they had not ascertained the amount due in respect of each of them; that the defendants' lien attached, notwithstanding the provision in the hire-purchase agreements; and that the lien might exist although the defendants allowed Botfield to take the taxicabs out from time to time to ply for hire. The learned Judge therefore dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. E. W. Cave, K.C., and Mr. A. E. Woodgate appeared for the appellants; Serjeant Sullivan, K.C., and Mr. Martin O'Connor for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls, in his considered judgment, said that, by a letter dated May 12, 1927, the defendants had purported to make an appropriation of the sums received from Botfield so as to leave only their charges for repairs still owing. They could not do that, because the accounts had been delivered week by week, and Botfield had made weekly payments, and the defendants had appropriated the amounts so paid so as to leave a balance outstanding, made up of the balance previously due and the week's charges for supplies and work done. The accounts could not be opened up and re-adjusted, so as to substantiate the claim that the whole of the balance was due for repairs alone. In any event, however, a portion of the balance was due in respect of repairs. While the plaintiffs relied upon clauses 4 and 5 of the hiring agreements, as preventing Botfield from creating any lien which would prevent their obtaining the return of the taxicabs, the defendants, though knowing that Botfield held the cabs under hire-purchase agreements, did not know of the precise terms of the conditions contained in those agreements. That such a repairer's lien arose as a right of the repairer was clear from the decisions in Keene v. Thomas (21 The Times L.R., 2 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 136) and Green v. All Motors, Limited ([1917] 1 K.B., 625), and clauses 4 and 5 did not defeat the right of the defendants, which was a right derived not from Botfield, but against Botfield upon the execution of the repairs. Such a right could not be defeated by an unknown condition in the agreements between Botfield and the plaintiffs.

It had been argued that the lien was lost by the despatch of the taxicabs from the garage for use in the ordinary course. But there was evidence that an agreement had been made by the defendants with Botfield in December, 1924, that the taxicabs, even if permitted to leave the garage for use, should be treated as being "in pawn." In his (Lord Hanworth's) opinion the defendants had a right of lien upon the three taxicabs in their possession. Botfield could not have complied with the terms of his agreement to keep the taxicabs in repair without the lien arising in favour of the defendants if their account for those repairs was unpaid.

There remained the question whether the defendants lost their lien by demanding a sum beyond the true sum for which their lien was good. In many cases of lien it was not possible to name the exact sum due, as in Huth v. Lamport (16 Q.B.D., 735). The plaintiffs for their part had refused to recognize any claim for lien at all. They were not ready to make any tender to satisfy it. On the whole, it did not seem that the defendants had lost their right by making a larger demand : see Scarfe v. Morgan (4 M. and W., 270) and Dirks v. Richards (4 M. and G., 574). The appeal must be dismissed, but, as each side had pressed for too much, there would be no costs of the appeal.

Lords Justices Scrutton and Sargant delivered judgments to the same effect.

IN RE PRIOR AND OTHERS.*

Insurance (Unemployment)—Excepted employments — "Agriculture" — "Horticulture"—Meaning of these expressions—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), Schedule I., Part II. (a).

By Part II. (a) of the First Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, "agriculture" and "horticulture" are employments excepted from the Act.

Held, that persons are employed in agriculture and horticulture when employed upon any operations done about the production, preparation, or transfer of the products of farm or garden or orchard in the best saleable condition to a first buyer or to a salesman or agent for sale if one be employed, or to a distinct business under one proprietorship. But if the industrial status and occupations of the employed persons are such that, though they are working about or in connexion with a farm or garden or orchard, they may properly be said to be essentially pursuing their own special occupations, they are not employed in agriculture or horticulture within the meaning of this rule.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

His Lordship delivered a considered judgment in these six issues referred to him by the Minister of Labour under section 10 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920. The applicants were Thomas Rochford and Sons, Limited, Lowe and Shawyer, Limited, and the executors and trustees of E. C. Adcock, deceased.

All the cases raised the same question—namely, whether persons employed, in one case as a foreman and in the other cases as regular or seasonal workers, in preparing the produce of nurserymen and market gardeners for transport (e.g., by trimming and bunching cut flowers, grading fruit, and packing) were "employed in horticulture" within the meaning of exception (a) of Part II. of the First Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920.

Mr. C. W. Lilley appeared for the Minister of Labour ; Mr. Hubert Hull intervened by leave for the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries ; Mr. Harold Murphy for the Farmers' Union and the executors of Mr. Adcock.

Mr. Justice Roche, in giving judgment, said :—These cases came before me by way of reference by the Minister of Labour, pursuant to section 10 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, in order that I might decide whether the six persons concerned in the six cases are employed persons within the meaning of that Act so as to be insurable thereunder.

The substantial question is the same in all the cases, and is the question whether these persons, hereinafter described as the employees, are employed in horticulture, which is an employment excepted by the First Schedule to the Act.

The employees, one man and five women, are all of them employed by horticulturists or nurserymen, growers of fruit, tomatoes, plants, and flowers, which are sold by the employers either to florists or to buyers in Covent Garden or other markets. The man Prior is a foreman ; the women are workers engaged, some for the whole year, and others for particular seasons. The work of the women, so far as is now material, consists in preparing the products of their employers for sale—e.g., by trimming and washing the plants, selecting and bunching cut flowers, grading the fruit and tomatoes, and packing for dispatch all these products. Prior is a foreman in superintendence over such of these operations as are necessary in the establishment of his particular employers. The cases, therefore, are sufficiently various to raise well the point for decision, but, in the view at which I have arrived after a full argument and after consideration, the variety of the circumstances gives rise to no distinction in principle or in result.

Sitting in my capacity as the Judge appointed to deal with questions under this Act, I have not infrequently lacked the advantage of an argument between opposing counsel. In such cases Mr. Lilley for the Minister of Labour has, at my request, assisted me much by presenting both sides of the question, but in this case, by reason of the appearance of counsel for the Minister of Agriculture and for the Farmers' Union, as well as for some of the employers, who have put the case for uninsurability, Mr. Lilley has been left free to present the case for insurability, unembarrassed by any other conflicting duties.

The interest of the Ministry of Agriculture in this matter is considerable, because amongst other reasons the administration of this Act and of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, impinge upon one another.

I have derived much assistance from the clear and forcible arguments addressed to me by all three of the counsel engaged.

The contentions on the two sides may be summarized as follows :—

A.—For the Minister of Labour : That the employees are engaged in processes forming a part of the marketing of products and not in their culture or production, and therefore they are not employed in horticulture and are insurable.

B.—For the other interests : That these and all persons employed by producers and engaged in making produce ready for the consumer or for the buyer from the producer are employed in horticulture or agriculture, as the case may be, and therefore are employed in excepted employments.

Contention A, in my judgment, gives much too narrow a construction to the words of the exception. It is in reality based on the proposition that no marketing is within the scope of horticulture or agriculture.

Contention B, in my judgment, is a little, but not much, too wide. It needs some qualification and some re-statement, which I will hereafter specify. But the matters in which it requires qualification do not, in my opinion, affect the present cases, and the result at which I have arrived is that these persons are engaged in horticulture and are not insurable.

My reasons are as follows. Contention A is based on an expression occurring in the course of my judgment in the case of In re Daniels Brothers (92 L.J., K.B., 229). Messrs. Daniels were at the same time seed growers and seed merchants. Martha Wright was engaged in separating and purifying the seeds grown and vended by Messrs. Daniels. I held that she was engaged in the harvesting and not in the marketing of the seeds and was, therefore, employed in horticulture. By the word "marketing" in that case I was referring to the vending or merchanting of seeds by Messrs. Daniels as seed merchants. I did not intend to lay down, and in fact did not lay down, a general proposition that all marketing operations were outside the scope of agriculture and horticulture.

The contrary proposition is, I think, involved in my reasoning in Vellacott's case (38 The Times L.R., 113 ; [1922] 1 K.B., 466). It is also expressly laid down by Lord Constable in his judgment in Dryburgh's case ([1926] Sc. L.T., 99). I desire respectfully to concur with and to adopt the learned Lord's opinion on this point. I desire also to make it clear that I do not rest my decision in this case on any predominance of the horticultural elements in the occupations of these employees over other elements. I rest it on a conclusion that the operations upon which they were engaged, and their work therein, were entirely horticultural within the meaning of this Act. The elements of skill and knowledge of plants were great in Prior's case, appreciable in the case of some of the women, slight and perhaps negligible in the case of the casual workers, but nevertheless they were, in my judgment, each and all doing horticulturists' work.

I was referred to a transcript of the judgment of Mr. Justice Brown in the High Court of Northern Ireland, deciding the case of In re Hatrick (unreported) under this Act. The transcript does not set out the facts of the case with any fullness, but I gather that the facts were such as to lead the learned Judge to the conclusion that Hatrick, the employer, had a milk-vending business as distinct from his farming business, and that the employee in question was not employed on the farm or in agriculture. I should respectfully concur in the conclusion that a whole-time milk roundsman, though employed by a farmer, was, by reason of the provisions of section 47 (2) of the Act, and by reason of his own industrial status and occupation, not employed in agriculture. I should regard the case as a parallel to that with which I myself dealt and which I decided in the case of a lorry driver, the case of Vellacott (supra). But if there is any conflict between the decision in Hatrick's case and the decision in Dryburgh's case (supra) I prefer the latter. I desire to make it plain that in my judgment retail milk distribution in a village or adjoining a town may be and often is part of a farmer's operations, and that persons employed therein are employed in agriculture unless they are special employees such as I conceive a whole-time milk roundsman to be.

I hope I have now made plain my reasons for my decision and the qualification which I attach to the contention that, in the main, I adopt. The qualification is the exclusion from the exception of certain specialized workers whose own industrial status or occupation is not agricultural or horticultural. I may, however, add as an illustration of such a specialized worker the clerk or bookkeeper who may be employed on or about a large farm or estate but is not, in my opinion, employed in agriculture.

There remains one other matter. After I had intimated what my general view on the question was, counsel for the Minister of Labour and for the Farmers' Union asked that I should, if I found it possible, formulate a general rule applicable to the industries of agriculture and horticulture for the purposes of the working of this Act in this class of case. I do so with some reluctance, as it is difficult, if not impossible, to forecast what cases may arise in future. But I yield to the request with the reservation that I can only state a working rule such as I should adopt myself on my present information, and such as I should regard as open to correction and modification if circumstances make it necessary or desirable.

I further add that I asked counsel for the Minister of Labour and the Farmers' Union, the parties here concerned, after discussion before me, to submit to one another and to me a draft of a suggested formula, and that they have done so. I have derived further assistance from their joint efforts, and have in part adopted the result. But, while they have given me this valuable assistance, I assume all responsibility for a formula or working rule in terms as follows :—

"Persons are employed in agriculture and horticulture when employed upon any operations done about the production, preparation, or transfer of the products of farm or garden or orchard in the best saleable condition to a first buyer or to a salesman or agent for sale if one be employed, or to a distinct business under one proprietorship as in Daniels' case (supra). But if the industrial status and occupations of the employed persons are such that, though they are working about or in connexion with a farm or garden or orchard, they may properly be said to be essentially pursuing their own special occupations, they are not employed in agriculture or horticulture within the meaning of this rule."

The formal conclusion of this matter is that I answer the question referred to me in the negative in all six cases.

CLARK v. WESTAWAY.*

Betting—Betting duty—Bookmaker—Certificate—Carrying on business without—Conviction—Previous conviction on same transactions for keeping betting house—Whether bar to second conviction — Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 119), s. 3—Finance Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 22), s. 17 (1) (b).

A conviction of a person for keeping a betting house under s. 3 of the Betting Act, 1853, is not a bar to his conviction, arising out of the same transactions, for carrying on business as a bookmaker without a proper certificate under s. 17 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1926.

This was a case stated by justices of the peace in and for the county borough of Bootle.

At the Court of Summary Jurisdiction sitting at Bootle an information was exhibited by the respondent, Clarence Clifton Westaway, one of his Majesty's officers of Customs and Excise, under the Finance Act, 1926, against the appellant, Arthur Clark, for that he between December 6 and December 19, 1926, at the county borough of Bootle did carry on business as a bookmaker without having in force a proper certificate as by section 15 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1926, was required, whereby, and by force of section 17 (1) (b) of the Act, he was liable in respect of such offence to an Excise penalty of £100. The information was heard on March 17, 1927, when the Court convicted the appellant and imposed a fine of £25 or one month's imprisonment.

The appellant, being aggrieved and dissatisfied with this determination as being erroneous in point of law, applied to the justices to state this case setting forth the facts and the grounds of the determination for the opinion of the Court.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted :—

(1) That the appellant had on January 5, 1927, been committed for trial at the then next Liverpool Assizes by the justices in the Court of Summary Jurisdiction aforesaid, and on February 1, 1927, had been convicted before Mr. Justice Greer for that he the said appellant on and between December 7 and 18, 1926, being then the occupier of a certain house and yard at 176, Wadham-road, Bootle, unlawfully did keep or use the said house and yard for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto upon certain events and contingencies of and relating to certain horse-races and football matches contrary to the statute in such case made and provided.

(2) That on December 17, 1926, one Richard Henry Benson made a cash bet with the appellant at the premises aforesaid, but received no revenue ticket.

(3) That on December 18, 1926, the said Benson made a cash bet with the appellant at the aforesaid premises, but received no revenue ticket.

(4) That on various occasions between December 9 and 18, 1926, bets were made by divers persons with the appellant at the said premises.

(5) That on entering the premises aforesaid on a warrant the police found a large quantity of betting slips and money therein.

(6) That the appellant had in November, 1926, applied at the Customs House, Liverpool, for a bookmaker's licence for ready-money betting, but the clerk there said "I can't give you that as a ready-money betting certificate."

On the part of the appellant it was contended that (1) the conviction under section 3 of the Betting Act, 1853, was a bar to a conviction under section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926 ; and (2) section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926, did not apply to illegal betting.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that :—(1) The said previous conviction was not a bar to a conviction under section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926 ; and (2) section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926, applied to illegal betting.

The attention of the justices was drawn to the following authorities :—Reg. v. Miles (6 The Times L.R., 186 ; 24 Q.B.D., 423) ; the Interpretation Act, 1889, section 33 ; the Finance Act, 1926, sections 15, 17, 18 ; Inland Revenue Commissioners v. von Glehn and Co. (36 The Times L.R., 463 ; [1920] 2 K.B., 553) ; Saunders v. Baldy (L.R., 1 Q.B., 87).

The justices were of opinion that (1) the said previous conviction was no bar to a conviction under section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926 ; and (2) section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926, applied to illegal betting. They accordingly convicted the appellant and fined him as stated.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

Mr. Maxwell Fyfe appeared for the appellant ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Bowstead for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice said :—The first argument advanced on behalf of the appellant was that his conviction under section 3 of the Betting Act, 1853, was a bar to a conviction of him under section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926. It seems to me that that point is disposed of by the provisions of the section itself, for it provides that "if any person . . . carries on business as a bookmaker without having in force a proper certificate . . . he shall (without prejudice to his liability to any other penalty or his liability to pay any sum in respect of duty under this Part of this Act) be liable, in respect of each offence, to an Excise penalty of £100."

The words which I have emphasized seem to make it clear that the penalty to which a person's conduct may expose him under that section is intended to be cumulative on any penalty to which that conduct may expose him under some other statute. This view is reinforced by the case of Saunders v. Baldy (L.R., 1 Q.B., 87), where it was held that a person using a trap for taking game without a certificate during the prohibited season was liable to a penalty under one section of the Game Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 32), although he might also be liable to penalties under another section. "I see no reason," said Chief Justice Cockburn (L.R., 1 Q.B., at p. 89), "why a man should not be liable to two penalties for the two offences—one against the laws for preservation of game, and one against the revenue, no matter at what season of the year. I think the respondent was guilty of the offence charged, inasmuch as he used an engine for the purpose of killing game without a certificate." In other words, the question whether the present appellant had been guilty of an offence under section 3 of the Betting Act, 1853, was wholly distinct from whether he had also exposed himself to a penalty under the Finance Act, 1926. There is, therefore, no room here for a plea of autrefois convict.

But what, I think, is the real point in this case was raised by the appellant's contention that section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926, did not apply to "illegal betting." That phrase, "illegal betting," is so concise as easily to be capable of concealing a fallacy. To say without qualification that some betting is "illegal" might easily convey the impression that the transaction of betting is per se illegal. That is not what is meant by the phrase, which refers to betting which is carried on in such circumstances that the person who is responsible as owner, occupier, or user of the place where the betting goes on renders himself liable to a penalty under the Betting Act, 1853. The argument advanced on behalf of the appellant really involves the proposition that, if a man contrives to carry on his betting in circumstances which expose him to punishment under the Betting Act, 1853, he is to escape the obligations which are imposed by the Finance Act, 1926. That proposition, when it is plainly stated, is doing what was referred to by Lord Haldane in Minister of Finance v. Smith (42 The Times L.R., 734 ; [1927] A.C., 193, at p. 197), when he said, with reference to the enactment under consideration there : "Nor does it seem to their Lordships a natural construction of the Act to read it as permitting persons who come within its terms to defeat taxation by setting up their own wrong." The words of section 17 (1) of the Finance Act, 1926, are quite general and comprehensive. They are "any person" who carries on business as a bookmaker. Section 18 (1) defines bookmaker as "any person" who receives or negotiates bets. In the present case the findings of fact are conclusive that on various dates the appellant acted as a bookmaker without a certificate. It is nothing to the purpose to say that there was a further ingredient in what he did—namely, that he did it in such circumstances as to commit an offence under the Betting Act, 1853. In my opinion, this case comes clearly within the terms of the statute, and to hold otherwise would be to insert in the Finance Act, 1926, a proviso excluding from the operation of the Act persons who happen to bet in such a way and in such a place as to expose themselves to penalties under other statutes. That would be a grotesque conclusion and one not to be arrived at unless the words of the statute clearly compelled it. I think, therefore, that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Avory said :—On the first point—that the appellant's conviction under section 3 of the Betting Act, 1853, was a bar to a conviction under section 17 of the Finance Act, 1926—I entirely agree with the judgment of my Lord and I have nothing to add.

On the second point the contention on behalf of the appellant is that the words "bet" and "bookmaker" in section 18 of the Act of 1926 must be construed to mean a bet which is not contrary to law and a bookmaker who carries on business in a manner which is not contrary to law. The Attorney-General has sufficiently answered the point which is made about the word "bet" when he says that there is no such thing as an illegal bet as distinguished from a legal bet. That is very conspicuously supported by two passages in the judgment of Lord Halsbury in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Company (15 The Times L.R., 266, at p. 267 ; [1899] A.C., 143, at p. 159) when he said that this statute of 1853 "prohibits opening a house, &c., for the purpose of the owner or occupier betting with persons resorting to the house so opened. It does not prohibit betting. It does not affect to deal with the betting of people unconnected with the house betting inter se." Later he said ([1899] A.C., at p. 162) : "But it is obvious that the Legislature has not prohibited betting at all, but prohibited keeping a house for betting."

Dealing with the word "bookmaker" in section 18 I see no ground for limiting it to a bookmaker who carries on his business in a manner which is not in contravention of the law. On the contrary, section 17, subsection 3, appears to me to contemplate that a bookmaker who holds a certificate may yet be convicted under the Betting Act, 1853, because it provides : "Any Court before which a bookmaker is convicted of any offence under this Part of this Act or otherwise in connexion with his business as a bookmaker may order him to be disqualified for holding a bookmaker's certificate. . . ." In other words, a person who infringes the provisions of the Act of 1853 may be ordered to be disqualified from holding a bookmaker's certificate under the Act.

For these reasons I agree that the main point in this case also fails.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree and I have nothing to add on either point.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed with costs.

DONALD CAMPBELL AND CO., LIMITED v. POLLAK.*

Practice—Costs—Trial without a jury—Refusal of Judge to give costs to successful party—Exercise of discretion — Appeal — Whether competent—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict., c. 66), s. 49—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 44), s. 5—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LXV., Rule 1.

Where on a trial without a jury a Judge of the High Court, with the deliberate intention of exercising his discretionary powers as to costs under section 49 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and section 5 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, has refused to give the successful party his costs and in so refusing has acted on facts connected with or leading up to the litigation which have been proved before him or which he has himself observed during the progress of the case, and where the Judge has refused leave to appeal, the Court of Appeal, although it may deem his reasons insufficient and may disagree with his conclusion, is prohibited by those enactments from entertaining an appeal from it.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of the Court of Appeal reversing an order of Mr. Justice Branson as to costs.

The respondent was formerly in the employment of the firm of Donald Campbell and Co., and, on the firm being converted into the appellant company, became a director of the company. The company had since gone into liquidation. Actions were brought against the respondent by the firm and the company and those actions were consolidated. They were tried before a Judge and jury and in each case the plaintiffs obtained a verdict and judgment in their favour. The Court of Appeal ordered a new trial of both actions. The House of Lords allowed the judgment in the action by the firm to stand, but affirmed the order of the Court of Appeal for a new trial of the action by the company.

At the retrial of the second action, without a jury, Mr. Justice Branson gave judgment in favour of the respondent, but without costs, his main reason for depriving the respondent of costs being that he had been guilty of improper conduct in the former action and that that conduct had induced the liquidator to bring the present action.

The respondent appealed, without leave, to the Court of Appeal against so much of the judgment as related to costs. The Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Lord Justice Atkin) allowed the appeal on the ground that the trial Judge, in dealing with the costs, was not entitled to take into account the proceedings in the other action and had, therefore, no materials upon which to exercise his discretion.

The company appealed against this decision of the Court of Appeal. A preliminary objection to the competency of the appeal on the ground that it was an appeal as to costs was disallowed by the House (43 The Times L.R., 495).

Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., Mr. Barrington-Ward, K.C., and Mr. E. F. Spence, K.C., appeared for the appellants; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. Astell Burt for the respondent.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords: The preliminary objection to this appeal having been overruled, your Lordships are now called upon to dispose of the appeal. In expressing my opinion on the preliminary question, I have sufficiently stated the facts; and for the present purpose it is enough to remind your Lordships that Mr. Justice Branson, who tried this action without a jury, gave judgment for the defendant (the present respondent) without costs; and that, on an appeal by the defendant, without the leave of the Judge, against so much of the judgment as related to costs, the Court of Appeal set aside the judgment of the trial Judge and directed that judgment be entered for the defendant with costs. The question to be determined is whether the order of the Court of Appeal was right.

In order that this question may be answered, it is necessary to consider first the nature and extent of the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal to review an order of the first Court as to costs. It is true that no question of jurisdiction was raised in the appellants' case on this appeal; but the jurisdiction of a Court does not depend on the pleadings or admissions of the parties to a suit, and, however such a question may emerge, it is (I think) impossible for this House to pass it by and to give its decision on the basis of the existence of a jurisdiction which may or may not have been conferred. I propose, therefore, first to deal with this question.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal to review an order of the trial Court as to costs depends on statutes and on Rules of Court which have the force of a statute; and the enactments which were in force when the judgment in question was given were section 49 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 (now represented by section 31, subsection 1 (h), of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925), section 5 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, and Order LXV., Rule 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court. The terms of these provisions are as follows:—

Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, section 49.—"No order made by the High Court or any Judge thereof, by the consent of parties, or as to costs only, which by law are left to the discretion of the Court, shall be subject to any appeal except by leave of the Court or Judge making such order."

Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890, section 5.—"Subject to the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts, and the rules of Court made thereunder, and to the express provisions of any statute, whether passed before or after the commencement of this Act, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court, including the administration of estates and trusts, shall be in the discretion of the Court or Judge, and the Court or Judge shall have full power to determine by whom and to what extent such costs are to be paid."

Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LXV., Rule 1.—"Subject to the provisions of the Acts and these rules, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court, including the administration of estates and trusts, shall be in the discretion of the Court or Judge: Provided that nothing herein contained shall deprive an executor, administrator, trustee, or mortgagee who has not unreasonably instituted or carried on or resisted any proceedings, of any right to costs out of a particular estate or fund to which he would be entitled according to the rules hitherto acted upon in the Chancery Division: Provided also that, where any action, cause, matter, or issue is tried with a jury, the costs shall follow the event, unless the Judge by whom such action, cause, matter, or issue is tried, or the Court, shall, for good cause, otherwise order."

My Lords, at first sight these enactments would appear expressly to deprive the Court of Appeal of any jurisdiction to make the order now under appeal. Section 5 of the Act of 1890 provides that, subject to the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts and rules of Court, the costs of all proceedings in the Supreme Court are to be in the discretion of the Court or Judge. Rule 1 of Order LXV. repeats this enactment, but provides that in the case of a trial with a jury the costs shall follow the event unless the Court shall for good cause otherwise order; and the effect of this exception in the case of trial with a jury is to confirm and strengthen the absolute discretion which in an action tried without a jury is conferred upon the Court. It follows that in a non-jury case the costs are "by law left to the discretion of the Court"; and if so, then by the express terms of section 49 of the Act of 1873 an order as to those costs was not subject to any appeal except by leave of the Court making the order. The Legislature had directed that in this matter, as in others with which your Lordships are familiar, the order of the first Court should be final.

But very little time had elapsed after the passing of the Act of 1873 before an inroad was made upon the operation of section 49, and the breach then made in that section has grown to such an extent that it is (I think) necessary now to review the whole position. In making this review I do not propose to deal with those cases (such as Foster v. Great Western Railway Company (8 Q.B.D., 515) and In re Mills' Estate (3 The Times L.R., 61 ; 34 Ch.D., 24), in which a tribunal was held to have awarded costs without any jurisdiction to do so ; or with those other cases such as The City of Manchester (5 P.D., 221) and Bew v. Bew ([1899] 2 Ch., 467) in which a Judge had taken the mistaken view that he had no discretion as to costs : for in such circumstances a Court of Appeal may rightly intervene to decide the question of law. Nor is it necessary to refer to the cases which have arisen as to costs awarded under the County Courts Acts or the Arbitration Act, 1889, to which section 49 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and the corresponding section of the Act of 1925 have no application ; or to the "good cause" cases, which relate to the costs of a trial with a jury. I propose to confine my attention to the reported cases, few in number, in which the Court of Appeal has allowed an appeal from the exercise by a Judge of the Supreme Court of his discretion as to the costs of a trial without a jury, no leave to appeal having been obtained.

The first of these cases is Civil Service Cooperative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company (20 The Times L.R., 10 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 756), in which the trial Judge (Mr. Justice Bigham) had given judgment for the defendants but, because the defendants had refused to refer the dispute to him as arbitrator, had ordered that the parties should bear their own costs. The defendants having appealed against the order as to costs, the Court of Appeal entertained their appeal and reversed the order, Lord Halsbury stating his reasons as follows :—

"No doubt, where a Judge has exercised his discretion upon certain materials which are before him, it may not be, and I think is not, within the power of the Court of Appeal to overrule that exercise of discretion. But the necessary hypothesis of the existence of materials upon which the discretion can be exercised must be satisfied. In the present case, so far as the evidence before me goes, I can see no materials whatsoever upon which the learned Judge could exercise a discretion at all. The defendants were sued, and rightly according to law resisted the suit, and finally succeeded. In the judgment of Mr. Justice Bigham, and in the judgment of this Court, they are right ; and it practically comes to this—that the learned Judge has deprived the persons sued of what, prima facie, is their right to the costs of the litigation which has unsuccessfully been brought against them because they will not submit to the learned Judge himself as arbitrator to say what should be done. That is not exercising a discretion upon materials properly before the Judge ; but it is depriving a litigant of rights of which he is by law possessed, upon grounds which it is not competent for the Judge to treat as grounds for the exercise of his discretion."

Lord Alverstone, the other member of the Court, agreed, saying that "if it appears that a Judge has not exercised his discretion, or has decided upon grounds which were not open to him, this Court can still deal with his decision" ; and he relied on Granville v. Firth (19 The Times L.R., 213), which, being a "good cause" case, was not in point.

In King v. Gillard (21 The Times L.R., 398 ; [1905] 2 Ch., 7), in which the defendants were sued for passing off their goods as the goods of the plaintiffs, Mr. Justice Kekewich had given judgment for the defendants, but had refused to order the plaintiffs to pay the defendants' costs on the ground that the wrappers in which the goods in question were sold contained untrue statements as to certain medals and awards. The Court of Appeal, while dismissing the plaintiffs' appeal on the merits, allowed a cross-appeal by the defendants as to costs on the ground that, even if the untrue statements on the wrappers were calculated to deceive the public, the wrong so done was a collateral matter and was not directly connected with the plaintiffs' case. Lord Justice Stirling added that the case was very near the line, and that, if the learned Judge had exercised his discretion on the ground taken by him combined with other facts of the case, it would have been difficult to interfere.

In Edmund v. Martell (24 The Times L.R., 25), an action by the landlords of a dwelling-house against the tenant for waste by converting part of the premises into a shop, Mr. Justice Sutton gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that the waste committed by her was of the species known as ameliorating waste, but he made no order as to costs because he thought that the defendant should have approached her landlords before making the alterations. The decision of the learned Judge as to costs was reversed by the Court of Appeal, which held that the defendant's failure to approach her landlords was not relevant to the question to be determined between the parties, and that the Judge had "not really exercised his discretion at all in the matter." It is noteworthy that in this case also Lord Alverstone relied on Granville v. Firth (supra), a "good cause" case.

Lastly, in Ritter v. Godfrey (36 The Times L.R., 144 ; [1920] 2 K.B., 47), an action against a medical practitioner for negligence, Mr. Justice McCardie, who tried the action without a jury, found for the defendant, but refused to order the plaintiff to pay the defendant's costs of action on the ground that the defendant, in repudiating the plaintiff's claim, had written some letters of an unsatisfactory and, indeed, of an insulting character. The defendant having appealed as to costs, the Court of Appeal took the view that the correspondence did not afford ground for the exercise of the judicial discretion to refuse to award costs to a successful defendant, and on that view set aside the judgment of the trial Judge and ordered that judgment be entered for the defendant with costs. Lord Sterndale, M.R., who concurred in this decision with much doubt, stated the principle as follows :—

"This was a case tried without a jury before the Judge alone, and therefore in the absence of an order by him neither party is entitled to any costs. It therefore differs from a case tried before a jury, where there is a statutory right to costs if there be no order to the contrary. But there is such a settled practice of the Courts that in the absence of special circumstances a successful litigant should receive his costs, that it is necessary to show some ground for exercising a discretion by refusing an order which would give them to him. The discretion must be judicially exercised, and therefore there must be some grounds for its exercise, for a discretion exercised on no grounds cannot be judicial. If, however, there be any grounds, the question of whether they are sufficient is entirely for the Judge at the trial, and this Court cannot interfere with his discretion.

"On the authorities as they now stand the line between cases tried before a jury and cases tried by a Judge is very fine."

Lord Justice Atkin took a more decided view, saying :—

"In the case of a wholly successful defendant, in my opinion the Judge must give the defendant his costs unless there is evidence that the defendant (1) brought about the litigation, or (2) has done something connected with the institution or the conduct of the suit calculated to occasion unnecessary litigation and expense, or (3) has done some wrongful act in the course of the transaction of which the plaintiff complains. . . . I am aware of the inconvenience of fettering by rules the exercise of what in terms appears to be an unfettered discretion. But it is too late to contend for an arbitrary discretion over costs : some rules undoubtedly there are that control the discretion : and it seems hard to require a Judge to exercise his discretion according to rule, and yet not to be able to state what the rule is. Nor if the rule is to be formulated does it appear helpful to cast it in the negative form of a string of prohibitions leaving the guiding principles to be deduced from them."

Mr. Justice Eve took a similar view, holding that a Judge, however much he might disapprove of the defendant's behaviour, was not entitled to refuse him his costs unless he had material upon which he was prepared to hold judicially that the defendant had thereby created a mistaken belief in the plaintiff's mind, or that his misconduct was the real cause of the action being brought.

My Lords, these authorities appear to me to indicate a progressive tendency on the part of the Court of Appeal to review the exercise by trial Judges of their discretion as to costs, with the result that the Court has travelled far from the categorical terms of section 49 of the Act of 1873. The decision in the Civil Service Cooperative Society's case (supra) may no doubt be supported by the consideration, which obviously weighed with Lord Halsbury, that the trial Judge in that case had taken action, not upon materials which emerged in the trial itself, but upon his personal view that no trial should properly have been insisted upon ; and in such circumstances there may well have been ground for holding that he had not really exercised his discretion. But the fraudulent conduct of the defendants in King v. Gillard (supra) and in Edmund v. Martell (supra) the circumstance that the defendant had altered the character of the plaintiffs' property without consulting them, were surely sufficiently connected with the matters in dispute to entitle a Judge having a wide discretion to take them into account when awarding costs ; and the same may, I think, be said of the conduct of the defendant in Ritter v. Godfrey (supra) towards persons who had suffered a real sorrow while one of them was under his care. Further, the language used in the last-mentioned case by Lord Justice Atkin and Mr. Justice Eve, who expressed the opinion that the trial Judge in a non-jury case "must" give the successful defendant his costs except in certain cases which they defined, is difficult to reconcile with the statutes and rules which give him an absolute and uncontrolled discretion. Indeed, the rules laid down in that case by those learned Judges bear so close a resemblance to those which would guide a Judge in determining whether there was "good cause" for depriving of his costs a successful defendant in an action tried with a jury, that, if they are held to be binding, little or no difference will be left between the power of a Judge over costs in an action tried with a jury and that which the statute gives him in the case of a trial without a jury. A gloss upon the statute which leads to so complete a frustration of its purpose surely calls for very close and critical examination in your Lordships' House ; and, although some of the cases cited have stood unchallenged for a good many years, I do not think that it is too late for this House, which now for the first time has seisin of the matter, to review them. The protest of Mr. Justice North in Walter v. Steinkopff (8 The Times L.R., 633 ; [1892] 3 Ch., 489, at p. 500), and the doubts expressed by Lord Justice Stirling and Lord Sterndale in King v. Gillard (supra), and Ritter v. Godfrey (supra), have kept the question open ; and in any case the matter is one, not of mere procedure, but of statutory right, and no course of decision can override the statute.

My Lords, it appears to me that the true view is substantially that taken by Lord Sterndale in the above quoted passage in his judgment in Ritter v. Godfrey (supra), although I would express it in somewhat different language. A successful defendant in a non-jury case has no doubt, in the absence of special circumstances, a reasonable expectation of obtaining an order for the payment of his costs by the plaintiff ; but he has no right to costs unless and until the Court awards them to him, and the Court has an absolute and unfettered discretion to award or not to award them. This discretion, like any other discretion, must of course be exercised judicially, and the Judge ought not to exercise it against the successful party except for some reason connected with the case. Thus, if—to put a hypothesis which in our Courts would never in fact be realized—a Judge were to refuse to give a party his costs on the ground of some misconduct wholly unconnected with the cause of action or of some prejudice due to his race or religion or (to quote a familiar illustration) to the colour of his hair, then a Court of Appeal might well feel itself compelled to intervene. But when a Judge, deliberately intending to exercise his discretionary powers, has acted on facts connected with or leading up to the litigation which have been proved before him or which he has himself observed during the progress of the case, then it seems to me that a Court of Appeal, although it may deem his reasons insufficient and may disagree with his conclusion, is prohibited by the statute from entertaining an appeal from it.

Judged by these tests I doubt whether the decisions in King v. Gillard (supra), Edmund v. Martell (supra), and Ritter v. Godfrey (supra) can be supported ; and judged by the same tests I am satisfied that the order made by the Court of Appeal in the present case cannot stand. Even if the rules laid down in Ritter v. Godfrey (supra) were to be applied, I should find difficulty in holding that, in the present case, Mr. Justice Branson had no materials for the exercise of his discretion. The verdict on which the learned Judge proceeded was rendered in the consolidated action and was, therefore, part of the proceedings in the present action ; and it was frequently referred to in the evidence given during the new trial of this action. It was, therefore, fully before the learned Judge, and he was entitled to take it into account in considering whether the defendant had brought this litigation upon himself and to decline on that ground to give him the costs of the action. Further, although the verdict formed the main ground for the Judge's decision as to costs, he stated that other points also had weight with him and the influence of those other points on his mind could not be and was not estimated by the Court of Appeal. On the merits therefore, and assuming that the Court of Appeal had power to interfere, I should be disposed to allow this appeal; and if your Lordships should agree with the view which I have expressed on the question of jurisdiction, it is clear that the appeal should succeed.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal should be set aside and the order of Mr. Justice Branson restored. But as the principal question discussed in this judgment was not raised by the present appellants either in the Court of Appeal or in their case for the present appeal, I am content that there should be no costs of the appeals to the Court of Appeal and to this House, except so far as such costs have already been disposed of on the hearing of the preliminary objection. I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords: I think it is well established that, when the decision of such a matter as the right of a successful litigant to recover his costs is left to the discretion of the Judge who tried his case, that discretion is a judicial discretion, and if it be so its exercise must be based on facts; a good deal of the arguments addressed to the House on behalf of the appellants in this case appeared to me to go the length of contending either that the discretion of the Judge was absolute and unfettered, or that, though the exercise of this discretion might have given free scope to whim or prejudice, it must be assumed that, where discretion is given to a Judge, it will always be properly exercised, the Judge not being bound to disclose the facts, if any, upon which he acted. If, however, there be, in fact, some grounds to support the exercise by the trial Judge of the discretion which he purports to exercise, the question of the sufficiency of those grounds for this purpose is entirely a matter for the Judge himself to decide and the Court of Appeal cannot interfere with the exercise of his discretion in this instance. I take this statement of the law, applicable to cases tried without a jury, from the judgment of Lord Sterndale, M.R., in the case of Ritter v. Godfrey (36 The Times L.R., 144; [1920] 2 K.B., 47, at p. 52). He said: "This was a case tried without a jury before the Judge alone, and therefore in the absence of an order by him, neither party is entitled to any costs. It therefore differs from a case tried before a jury, where there is a statutory right to costs if there be no order to the contrary. But there is such a settled practice of the Courts that in the absence of special circumstances a successful litigant should receive his costs, that it is necessary to show some ground for exercising a discretion by refusing an order which would give them to him. The discretion must be judicially exercised, and therefore there must be some grounds for its exercise, for a discretion exercised on no grounds cannot be judicial. If, however, there be any grounds, the question of whether they are sufficient is entirely for the Judge at the trial, and this Court cannot interfere with his discretion. On the authorities as they now stand the line between cases tried before a jury and cases tried by a Judge is very fine. One other consideration applies to these cases. The principle as to the exercise of discretion is the same in the case of plaintiffs and defendants, but it is clear that considerations sufficient to justify a refusal of costs to a plaintiff are not necessarily sufficient in the case of a defendant, for the former initiates the litigation while the latter is brought into it against his will."

My Lords, I think this judgment of Lord Sterndale contains a clear, condensed and accurate statement of the law and of the prevailing practice on the points with which it deals. He then proceeds to state what, in his view, is regarded as sufficient ground for refusing a defendant his costs. He says: "Speaking generally, I think it may be said that, in order to justify an order refusing a defendant his costs, he must be shown to have been guilty of conduct which induced the plaintiff to bring the action, and without which it would probably not have been brought. This is so stated by Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in Bostock v. Ramsey Urban District Council (16 The Times L.R., 520; [1900] 2 K.B., 616)." This last is a very important case, because it follows the decision of the Court of Appeal in Harnett v. Vise (5 Ex. D., 307), and lays down the important principle, that in exercising his discretion under Order LXV., r. 1, in a case heard by a jury, a Judge is not confined to the consideration of the defendant's conduct in the actual litigation.

Lord Justice A. L. Smith, in giving judgment in the Court of Appeal in the former case (p. 622), said: "It seems to me that the Lord Chief Justice was right when on general principles he came to the conclusion that 'the Judge is not confined to the consideration of the defendants' conduct in the actual litigation itself, but may also take into consideration matters which led up to and were the occasion of that litigation.'" The Lord Justice proceeded: "I say on general principles, because his attention does not appear to have been called to the case of Harnett v. Vise (supra), in which it was distinctly held by the Court of Appeal that the Judge is not confined, in considering the question whether there is good cause for depriving the successful party of costs, to the conduct of the parties in the litigation itself, but must consider the whole circumstances of the case and everything which led to the action. I think that in this case there was evidence of conduct on the part of the defendants such as to lead the plaintiff reasonably to think that he had a good cause of action against them, and which the Judge was entitled to take into consideration as constituting good cause for depriving the defendants of costs."

Lords Justices Vaughan Williams and Romer concurred. The last named Lord Justice, in delivering judgment, page 627 of the report, said: "It is clear that the 'good cause' referred to by Order LXV., r. 1, is not confined to cause founded upon conduct of the successful party in the course of the litigation. It might, for example, in the case of a successful defendant, be founded on conduct of the defendant outside the action, if the conduct were such as to have led the plaintiff reasonably to suppose that he had a good cause of action, and thus induced him to bring the action. I limit the proposition so as to show clearly that I do not consider that such conduct on the part of the defendant would constitute good cause within Order LXV., r. 1, if it had no reference to the action, and did not induce the plaintiff reasonably to believe that he had a right of action." In the case of Harnett v. Vise (supra), the action was brought by a doctor, who practised at Barnet, against the defendant and his wife for a letter written by the latter to an old lady named Perkins, who had for some time been confined in a lunatic asylum, but was at the date of the letter convalescent, warning her against having any further communications with the plaintiff and making reflections upon him. The defendant traversed the innuendoes alleged in the statement of claim, pleaded that the letter was a privileged communication and also pleaded a justification. The case was tried before Baron Huddleston, and a special jury. The Judge ruled that the letter was not a privileged communication, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for £10 damages. After the verdict had been returned the counsel for the defendant applied to the Judge to exercise his power under Order LV. (then the proper Order) and deprive the plaintiff of his costs on the ground that he had brought the libel on himself by his incautious conduct. The learned Judge acceded to this application and refused to allow the plaintiff his costs. An application was made by the plaintiff to the Exchequer Division to rescind this order and was refused. The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Appeal. The appeal was heard by Lord Justice James, Lord Justice Brett, as he then was, and Lord Justice Cotton. In delivering judgment, Lord Justice James, after referring to the amount of the damages awarded, said : "Every Judge would take it as a material element in considering whether the jurisdiction given by Order LV. is to be exercised or not. But it is the duty of the Judge who tried the case, and the duty of the Court of Appeal also, to consider the whole circumstances of the case, everything which led to the action, everything which led to the libel, everything in the conduct of the parties which may show that the action was not properly brought in respect of the libel complained of."

Of the many judicial criticisms which have been passed upon Order LXV., r. 1, and its application none is, I think, clearer and more helpful than that of Lord Justice Bowen, as he then was, in the case of Jones v. Curling (13 Q.B.D., 262), an action tried before a Judge and jury. Referring to Order LXV., r. 1, Lord Justice Bowen said : "That rule begins with placing in the discretion of the Court the costs of all proceedings in the Court, but then follows a provision by which in the event of a jury trial the costs are removed from the discretion of the Judge and are to follow the event, except in one case, which is, if the Judge shall for good cause otherwise order. It appears to me that these latter words restore costs to the discretion of the Judge, provided a condition precedent is fulfilled ; that is to say, provided there is good cause. But unless there are facts from which a reasonable man might think the exceptional order was one which was more just than allowing the costs to take the ordinary course, there can be no good cause, and if there is no good cause, then the Judge had no jurisdiction. It seems to me that on the true construction of this rule there is an appeal with respect to the existence of the facts upon which alone the jurisdiction of the Judge depends. When, however, this jurisdiction is established, then I think there is no appeal unless the Judge's discretion is exercised in such a wrong way as to make it no reasonable exercise of discretion at all." These last words are very significant, and mean that if the established facts of the case amount to such good cause as to give the Judge jurisdiction to exercise his discretion, he must exercise that discretion in such a way as to amount to a reasonable exercise of it. An exercise of it based on whim or prejudice would be insufficient. The Court, composed of Sir Balliol Brett, M.R., Lord Justice Bowen, and Lord Justice Fry, held that to be good cause within this rule there must be facts showing that it would be more just not to allow costs to follow the event as, for example, oppression or misconduct of either of the parties by which costs have been unnecessarily increased. In an appeal to this House in the case of Huxley v. West London Extension Railway Company (5 The Times L.R., 355 ; 14 App. Cas., 26, at p. 34) Lord Watson said that he would not attempt to define what good cause was, but that, in his opinion, it embraced everything for which the party is responsible connected with the sustentation and conduct of the suit and calculated to occasion unnecessary litigation or expense. He said : "So long as the Judge or Court deal with considerations of that kind, the sufficiency or insufficiency of these considerations as affording a reason for disallowing costs are matters of which they are constituted sole arbiters ; they are acting within their jurisdiction, and their decisions are final and conclusive." So much for the case under the proviso to this rule. There remains the question what is the nature of the discretion conferred upon the Judge in cases tried by a Judge without a jury. Is it entirely arbitrary, subject to no qualification or restraint ? Must a litigant who has succeeded in a suit and has not been guilty of any misconduct of any kind be, on being deprived of his costs, content with the assurance that a Judge exercised his discretion properly, though he has not mentioned or even suggested what the grounds were upon which he based the exercise of that discretion ?

The decision in the case of Kierson v. Joseph L. Thompson and Sons, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 205 ; [1913] 1 K.B., 587), throws some light upon the question of judicial discretion as to everyday cases. The facts are stated with sufficient fullness in the head note and the judgment of Sir H. H. Cozens Hardy, M.R., concurred in by Lord Justice Buckley and Lord Justice Hamilton : "A workman who was in receipt of a weekly payment of 13s. 5d. from his employers as compensation for an accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, entered into an agreement to accept £100 in satisfaction of the employers' liability. The workman applied to the Registrar to have a memorandum of the agreement recorded. The Registrar, being dissatisfied as to the amount of the commutation, referred the matter to the Judge. Both parties appeared and supported the agreement. The Judge overruled the objection as to quantum, and directed the memorandum to be recorded, ordering the employers to pay the costs. The employers appealed from the order as to costs." The Master of the Rolls in giving judgment said : "Both the employers and the workman were then cited to appear and did appear before the Judge. The objection to the agreement was solely based on quantum and this objection the Judge overruled, and held that the memorandum should be recorded. Assuming, as I do, that the Judge had a discretion as to costs, it must be exercised judicially, and, in my opinion, it was not a judicial exercise of his discretion to order a party who has been completely successful and against whom no misconduct is even alleged to pay costs." (See also Hudsons, Limited v. De Halfort (29 The Times L.R., 257) and Levy v. Johnson (29 The Times L.R., 507).)

In Ritter v. Godfrey (36 The Times L.R., 144 ; [1920] 2 K.B., 47) Lord Justice Atkin criticized with great fullness and force all the cases I have referred to and some others ; he began his judgment thus : "In order to determine this appeal it seems to me necessary to pass in review some of the more recent authorities which have dealt with the provisions of Order LXV., r. 1. Costs are to be in the discretion of the Court or Judge." (The Judge who tried this case had refused to give the successful defendant his costs.) "If this discretion is absolute the appellant must fail ; if the discretion is limited, then the appellant must show that the exercise of the discretion in this case exceeded the proper limits. I think that it will appear from the authorities to be mentioned that the discretion of the Court or a Judge is not an absolute discretion, but must be exercised subject to certain governing principles which in this appeal it seems to me necessary to ascertain."

He then divides the authorities into two groups, the first group comprising trials by a Judge and jury, and the second trials by a Judge alone, and he says : "Where the Courts have held that there is good cause for deprivation of costs after trial by jury, I think it clear that under similar circumstances after trial without a jury the exercise of the discretion in the same way must be justifiable." For the purpose of the present case, I pass over the learned Lord Justice's comments on the cases in which there was a trial by jury, and only refer to his criticisms on those cases in which there was no jury. The first case with which he deals is Civil Service Cooperative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company (20 The Times L.R., 10 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 756). The learned Judge who tried the case had deprived the successful defendants of their costs, apparently because they would not submit to the learned Judge himself, as arbitrator, what in the circumstances should be done. The learned Judge did not state why he had deprived the successful defendants of their costs. If his discretion was absolute there was an end of the matter. It could go no further. The Court of Appeal would not be concerned with the question whether he had grounds for the exercise of his discretion or not. The Court of Appeal took precisely the opposite view. Lord Halsbury, in giving judgment, after referring to what the Judge at the trial did, said : "That is not exercising a discretion upon materials properly before the Judge ; but it is depriving a litigant of rights of which he is by law possessed, upon grounds which it is not competent for the Judge to treat as grounds for the exercise of his discretion."

The next case to which the Lord Justice refers is that of King v. Gillard (21 The Times L.R., 398 ; [1905] 2 Ch., 7). It was a passing off action. The Judge held that there was no passing off, but deprived the defendants of their costs on the ground that there were misleading and untrue statements in the advertisement upon some of the defendants' packages which were calculated to deceive the public though they had no bearing on the question of passing off. It was held by the Court of Appeal that the defendants had not acted dishonestly but that even if they had been guilty of misrepresentation it had no relation to the plaintiffs' case, and was not therefore a ground on which the Judge had a discretion to deprive the defendants of their costs. The learned Lord Justice next refers to the case of Edmund v. Martell (24 The Times L.R., 25) heard in 1907. The Judge at the trial had deprived the defendant of her costs on the ground that before she had done one of the acts which were complained of by the landlords she ought to have consulted them. Lord Alverstone, who was presiding in the Court of Appeal, after referring to Civil Service Cooperative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company (supra), said that the case before them "was an a fortiori case. Mr. Justice Sutton thought that because the defendant did not approach her landlords on the matter of converting the house into a shop she should be deprived of her costs. That had nothing to do with the grounds of the action." Lord Justice Buckley, as he then was, said : "The facts upon which a Judge could exercise his discretion in depriving a successful litigant of costs must be facts relevant to the question to be adjudicated upon as between the plaintiff and the defendant. The Judge had no power to deprive the successful litigant of costs because in some matter not material he might think that that party should have behaved, say, with more courtesy or consideration. These were not matters upon which the Court could act."

To Higgins v. Higgins and Co. ([1916] 1 K.B., 640) Lord Justice Atkin next refers in Ritter v. Godfrey (supra). It was a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. The Judge in such cases is given by the Act the same discretion as to costs as is given by the terms of Order LXV., r. 1. There the Judge had made a declaration of liability, and had ordered the employers, who were considered by the Court of Appeal to have been successful, to pay the costs. Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, at page 643, said : "By par. 7 of Schedule II. of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the costs of and incidental to the arbitration and proceedings connected therewith are in the discretion of the arbitrator, just in the same way as the costs of proceedings in the High Court are in the discretion of the Judge where the case is not tried by a jury under Order LXV., r. 1. In both cases, however, the discretion is fettered by a well-accepted rule which was stated by Lord Halsbury in Civil Service Cooperative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company (supra) in these words : 'No doubt, where a Judge has exercised his discretion upon certain materials which are before him, it may not be, and I think is not, within the power of the Court of Appeal to overrule that exercise of discretion. But the necessary hypothesis of the existence of materials upon which the discretion can be exercised must be satisfied.'" Lower down, at page 60, Lord Justice Atkin proceeds in Ritter v. Godfrey (supra) to lay down three principles by which a Judge may be able to discern whether the materials necessary to support the exercise of his judicial discretion exist in any given case. The principles he shortly stated as follows :— "In the case of a wholly successful defendant, in my opinion the Judge must give the defendant his costs unless there is evidence that the defendant (1) brought about the litigation, or (2) has done something connected with the institution or the conduct of the suit calculated to occasion unnecessary litigation and expense, or (3) has done some wrongful act in the course of the transaction of which the plaintiff complains. These principles require further expansion. By (1) is meant—has so conducted himself as to lead the plaintiff reasonably to believe that he had a good cause of action against the defendant, and so induce him to bring the action. The authority for this is Bostock v. Ramsey Urban District Council (supra). It is wide, for in terms it is not limited to unreasonable or improper conduct, or to conduct other than that which constitutes the alleged cause of action. Inasmuch as the bringing of many actions of contract and most actions of tort is due to the effect upon the plaintiff's mind of defendant's conduct, and the effect is at any rate to induce a belief that the plaintiff has a good cause of action, it would appear to follow that provided the belief was reasonable the Judge in all such cases has grounds for depriving a successful defendant of costs. I presume e converso, there would be grounds for dealing with a successful plaintiff's costs when his conduct has induced the defendant reasonably to believe that he has a good defence. I am inclined to think, therefore, that the propositions in Bostock v. Ramsey Urban District Council (supra) should be read subject to the first, if not also the second of the limitations suggested above—i.e., subject to the conduct being unreasonable or improper, and being conduct other than that which constituted the alleged cause of action." Mr. Justice Eve delivered a clear and able judgment to the same effect.

In my view, it necessarily follows from those authorities that, if a defendant in a case tried before a Judge alone could be charged with fraud and successfully defends himself against that charge, he may yet be deprived of his costs if he has been guilty of misconduct coming within one of the kinds indicated by Lord Justice Atkin. There is no principle or rule of practice that, if a defendant accused of fraud obtains from either a Judge or a jury a decision that he is not guilty of the fraud, he is necessarily entitled to his costs whatever his conduct and cannot be justly deprived of them.

Mr. Justice Branson, at page 62 of the Appendix, when dealing with the two actions which were brought, the one by the firm against Pollak and the other by the liquidator against the same man, explains the relation in which they stood to each other, and points out that it is the company's claim of which he is now endeavouring to dispose. He then, at page 92 of the Appendix, when giving judgment, spoke as follows : "I do not think it is either necessary or desirable that I should go in great detail through all the many facts of this long and troublesome action, which has lasted some nine days before me. I think it is sufficient for me to say this, that in my view the real reason why the action was brought by the liquidator, and the real reason which forced him, in my view, in the proper execution of his duty, and also the creditors of the company, to bring the action, was the fact that Mr. Pollak had, in his dealings with Said, begun with a concealed partnership with Said, of which every trace was kept out of the books, and that, so far as anybody looking at the books is concerned, once it appears that Pollak was a partner with Said in the first of the transactions in which Said took part, there is nothing to show when he ceased to be a partner. I think a man who puts himself into that position has only himself to blame if anybody who is concerned to make him liable on the contracts with Said which follow brings an action against him in respect of them. That is the main ground put forward by the liquidator for the course which he asks me to take in the matter, and it is the main ground upon which I accede to the request that he makes. The real reason why I am doing what I propose to do in this case is, as I have stated, the fact that I believe that if it had not been for Pollak entering into this partnership with Said in the way in which he did, and keeping all the record out of the books which would lead anybody to know it, and keeping the knowledge of it from his subordinates in the department, this action need not have been brought. It was his fault that it was brought, because his conduct, and guilty conduct, in a matter which is outside the immediate cause of action which is being brought against him here, and so satisfies every one of the limitations which are stated by Lord Justice Atkin, is the real cause of the initiation and the prosecution of this litigation. The result is that I think this is one of those cases in which it is clear that the defendant has brought the litigation upon himself, by the way in which he has behaved himself, and consequently is an appropriate case in which, in the exercise of the discretion which in such cases I possess, I should say that I make no order for costs."

The Court of Appeal appear to me to have based their decision on this ground, that Pollak was not estopped by the verdict of the jury against him from denying that he was dealing improperly in speculating with Said, of which no mention was made in the books of the firm, or by the finding of the jury that he did not inform the other members of the firm that he was doing so ; that accordingly it was open to Pollak to deny on oath both the accusation which the jury in the first action found to be true, that he reiterated the statement which he had made at the first trial on these points, and that none of the members of the firm were produced on the second trial as they were upon the first to prove that Pollak never asked for or got the consent of his co-partners to the course of dealing which he pursued. Mr. Justice Branson held that Pollak was not guilty of the fraud charged against him on the second trial, but notwithstanding this he was clearly of opinion that he was shown to be guilty of misconduct, which he indicates and describes, of a character which entitled the Judge to deprive him of costs. That is a wholly different thing—if the learned Judge was entitled to take into consideration the whole circumstances of the case and everything which led up to the action. As the cases of Harnett v. Vise (supra) and Bostock v. Ramsey Urban District Council (supra) decide that he was so entitled, then there were, in my opinion, some grounds to support his order. And if there were, he had jurisdiction to make it, and neither the Court of Appeal nor this House has any jurisdiction to interfere with his order because they are of opinion that the grounds were insufficient. In my view the appeal succeeds.

Lord Carson (read by Viscount Dunedin).—My Lords : I agree with the motion proposed by the noble Viscount on the Woolsack. I am not at all sure that the course of legal decisions has not gradually so circumscribed the discretion given to a Judge as to costs in cases tried by him alone without a jury as to render such discretion almost nugatory. Indeed, Lord Justice Atkin, in the quotation made by the noble Viscount from his judgment in Ritter v. Godfrey (36 The Times L.R., 144 ; [1920] 2 K.B., 47), seems to lay down that such discretion must be exercised under formulated rules which appear to me to leave very little "discretion" to the Judge. It is not surprising, therefore, in this state of the authorities that protracted litigation as to costs only should ensue, involving in some cases a rehearing of the action and a reproduction of the evidence and documents used at the trial in order to enable a full inquiry as to whether the Judge has acted within the rules laid down in the cases already decided. This, I think, is a result quite contrary to what was intended by the provisions of the Judicature Acts and the Rules of the Supreme Court already quoted, which drew a clear line as to costs where issues were tried before a Judge and before a jury respectively. It seems strange that in the course of so many authorities so little attention has been given to the 49th section of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873. The words of the section are clear and explicit and deal not with the exercise of the discretion, but with the question whether the discretion is conferred upon the Judge and, in my opinion, no matter what the practice may have been hitherto, we are bound to give full effect to them. The only question which we have to determine under that section is, was the order of Mr. Justice Branson as to costs made in a case where the costs are by law left to the discretion of the Court ? The very basis of the appeal is that the learned Judge had such a discretion and, indeed, that could not be disputed. In such a case the section says that the order made by the Judge is not subject to appeal, and therefore neither the Court of Appeal nor this House is competent to entertain such an appeal.

Whilst, therefore, it is, of course, true that a Judge ought to exercise his discretion judicially, whether he has done so or not is a question which cannot be raised on appeal as to costs unless the Judge gives leave as provided by the section.

Lord Dunedin and Lord Phillimore concurred in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

Railway and Canal Commission. (Sankey, J., Sir E. Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Sir Lewis Coward, K.C.) 1927. July 27.

IN RE APPLICATION OF TILMANSTONE (KENT) COLLIERIES, LIMITED.*

Mines — Coal-mine—Working facilities—Ancillary right—Carrying away coal—Conveyance over land outside lease—Jurisdiction to sanction—Aerial ropeway—National interest—Grant of sanction—Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 20).

The erection of an aerial ropeway which the Court had originally refused to sanction (43 The Times L.R., 349) was now sanctioned by the Court on the production of fresh plans.

This was an application for the sanction of the erection of an aerial ropeway from Tilmanstone Colliery to Dover Harbour for the purpose of transporting coal to the coast.

Sir Arthur Colefax, K.C., and Mr. P. Gordon Bamber appeared for the applicants ; Mr. H. P. Levy for Sir John Ellerman ; Mr. H. L. Murphy for the Postmaster-General ; Mr. Hubert Hull for the Commissioners of Crown Lands ; Mr. F. J. Wrottesley, K.C., and Mr. Adams for the Channel Steel Company, Limited, and Pearson and Dorman Long, Limited ; Mr. H. M. Giveen for the Secretary of State for War ; Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. W. E. Tyldesley Jones, K.C., and Mr. Bruce Thomas for the Southern Railway Company ; Mr. A. Moon for the East Kent Light Railways Company ; Mr. Robert Fortune for Shell Mex, Limited ; Mr. J. G. Joseph for the Dover Harbour Board ; and Mr. N. C. Armitage for the Rev. E. Thompson.

Mr. Justice Sankey said that judgment would be given on the main issue, but it must be understood that it was subject to certain conditions being complied with. On the last occasion when the application was before the Court (43 The Times L.R., 349) the Commissioners agreed that the proposed ropeway was in the national interest, but a difficulty arose with regard to the facts which were then placed before them. The scheme was incomplete in its inception, and based upon inaccurate and illusory plans, and the Court therefore felt that it would not be doing its duty if it sanctioned that scheme. Now, however, the plans were entirely different.

The ropeway would pass over the land of 23 private persons, Government Departments, companies and corporations. Protective bridges were to be erected, and apparently all the public authorities who had control of the roads were satisfied with regard to the safety of the persons passing beneath the ropeway. It was alleged by the Tilmanstone Company that the proper and efficient working of the minerals and the conduct of their business would be unduly hampered if permission to construct the ropeway were not granted. They further alleged that the rates quoted by the Southern Railway for conveyance of the coal to Dover Harbour, including sums to the East Kent Light Railway, were excessive.

The ropeway, his Lordship said, would provide a much shorter means of transit, and the colliery company submitted that they would be able to convey coal to Dover at an inclusive rate lower than that quoted by the Southern Railway, and further, that they would be able to regularize their output and thereby effect economy in production. It must be remembered that, whereas it was 11 miles by railway to Dover, it would be only seven by the proposed ropeway.

Turning to the question of national interest, his Lordship said that the colliery company maintained that it was of national importance that the ropeway should be erected and that if they were unable to obtain cheap transport for their minerals to the seaboard the colliery would have to close down. They also pointed out that there was no economic alternative to the ropeway as the rate was so low that the Southern Railway could not compete with it. That appeared to be so from the estimates which had been put in. The applicants had stated further that the output of coal before the stoppage due to the coal strike was 1,000 tons a day, that that output would be doubled within three months if the ropeway were sanctioned, and that it would be gradually increased to 4,000 tons a day. It was self-evident that if the output increased so would employment.

A large number of persons had appeared in opposition to the application, but all had been satisfied with the exception of three. The joint opposition of the Channel Steel Company, Limited, and Pearson and Dorman Long, Limited, was prominent. The former owned land over which the ropeway would pass, and the latter were now the owners or leaseholders of a large area of the Kent coalfields. They owned two collieries, one of which had an output of about 4,000 tons a week, and it was hoped that the other would produce about a million tons annually in the course of the next three years. They said that they did not think it right that one colliery company should have the monopoly of the eastern arm at Dover Harbour for the purpose of exporting coal and that if the Tilmanstone Company obtained a monopoly it would sterilize their (Pearson and Dorman Long's) efforts so far as exporting coal from Dover was concerned.

His Lordship referred to the opposition of the Southern Railway and the East Kent Light Railway, which, he said, was similar. The Dover Harbour Board was governed by a number of Acts of Parliament, and they had to obtain the consent of the Southern Railway to any expenditure of a particular kind. Under the scheme the board were to contribute £25,000 towards the cost of the ropeway at the Dover end, for which they were to be remunerated at the rate of 6 per cent. The position taken up by the Southern Railway was that if the scheme were sanctioned some of their responsible officials would recommend the directors not to veto the expenditure by the harbour board.

In addition to that, the railway had raised the question of the Commission's jurisdiction to deal with the application. Arguments had been put forward by Sir John Simon and Mr. Tyldesley Jones on the interpretation of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act of 1923, but he was unable to agree with so narrow a construction of the statute. The whole purport and intention of the legislation should be looked at by a consideration of the various sections, and it was quite impossible to say that the power of this Court was restricted as suggested; otherwise, its jurisdiction would practically cease.

He had come to the conclusion that the proper and efficient working of the minerals of the Tilmanstone Colliery had been unduly hampered by the action of the Southern Railway Company. He did not blame them, and it seemed to him that that railway company could not afford to quote a lower rate. In his view the plea to the jurisdiction failed.

Continuing, his Lordship said that the total cost to be found by the colliery company was £93,000, and an undertaking had been given that that amount would be provided. It was apparent from the evidence that coal would be taken over the ropeway at a shilling a ton less than by the railway. If he had thought that the scheme would create a monopoly for ever he would have liked a longer time to consider his judgment. At any rate, they could provide against a monopoly by inserting in the order a clause giving liberty to apply to the Court. In the circumstances and for the reasons which he had given the scheme would be approved, subject to the conditions which would be stated in the minute of the order.

Sir E. Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Sir Lewis Coward, K.C., concurred.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton and Sargant, L.JJ.)
1927. July 15.

REES ROTURBO DEVELOPMENT SYNDICATE, LIMITED v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

SAME v. DUCKER.*

Revenue — Income-tax—Excess profits duty—Profits of trade—Syndicate for development of patented invention—Agreement with foreign company for grant of licence and option of purchase—Exercise of option of purchase for sum in cash—Whether a profit of trade or the realization of a capital asset—Finding of Special Commissioners reversed—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case I.

A syndicate formed to work and develop a group of English and foreign patents carried on business mainly by granting licences to manufacturers at royalties. Certain foreign manufacturers, however, refused to take licences, unless they were also given an option of purchase exercisable within a given period. The syndicate entered into a contract with an American company to grant them a licence to use and work the syndicate's American patents, with an option of purchase thereof. The company exercised its option of purchase and paid to the syndicate the sum of £15,898 for the purchase of the American patents out and out. The syndicate having been assessed to income-tax and excess profits duty upon this sum, the Special Commissioners found that the profits made on the sale of patents were profits of the company's trading, and Rowlatt, J., affirmed their decision.

Held (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that the Special Commissioners had misdirected themselves in law, and their finding must be reversed. The sale of the American patent rights was not a profit of circulating capital, but the transmutation of a capital asset into money, and was therefore not assessable to income-tax or excess profits duty.

Collins v. Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate (133 L.T., 616) applied.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on December 9, 1924, the Rees Roturbo Development Syndicate, Limited, appealed against assessments to income-tax in the sums of £7,500 for the year ending April 5, 1920, £6,161 for the year ending April 5, 1921, and £5,340 for the year ending April 5, 1922, made upon the syndicate by the Additional Commissioners for the Seisdon Division of Staffordshire.

The syndicate was incorporated under the Companies Acts in 1906 with a share capital of £30,000 and with the following objects (inter alia): to acquire, protect and renew any patents, patent rights, or licences which might be useful to the syndicate, and to use them or grant licences or privileges in respect of the same, and in particular to acquire from the inventor, Edmund S. G. Rees, and from Thomas Parker, Limited, the benefit of certain inventions in relation to centrifugal turbine and similar pumps, and to enter into and carry out a certain agreement, and to improve, manage, develop, exchange, let on lease or otherwise, mortgage, sell, dispose of, turn to account, grant rights and privileges in respect of, or otherwise deal with, all or any part of the property and rights of the syndicate.

The said Edmund Scott Gustave Rees was the managing director of Thomas Parker, Limited, and he formed the syndicate to take over the existing Roturbo patents and to provide additional working capital for development. The company took over all the foreign patents. In 1908 a new company, the Rees Roturbo Manufacturing Company, Limited, was formed, and took over the business of Thomas Parker and Co., Limited, which included the manufacture of the pumps in the United Kingdom.

The main business of the syndicate had always been the development of the patents by the grant of manufacturing licences to foreign companies and licensees upon payment of lump sums and of royalties. Such receipts were always brought by the syndicate into their income account. Some of the foreign licensees, however, refused to enter into agreements for licences, except upon condition that they were to have an option of purchase of the foreign patent, at any rate after a certain sum had been paid in royalties.

By an agreement dated March 15, 1912, the syndicate and Edmund S. G. Rees agreed to grant to the Manistee Iron Works Company, of Manistee, Michigan, U.S.A., an exclusive licence to manufacture and sell Roturbo pumps and other articles under the American and Canadian patents, for all the unexpired residue of the terms of the patents, in consideration of the payment of £10,000 and royalties at the rate of 10 per cent. on the selling price of all articles made, with guaranteed minimum royalties and an option of purchase.

The Manistee company having failed to pay the minimum royalties, in January, 1917, a supplementary agreement was entered into between the parties, providing for payment of the unpaid royalties and for the surrender of the Canadian patent rights to the licensors, and providing that the Manistee company should continue to hold an option to purchase the American patent rights at any time before January 1, 1918, for the sum of £26,500.

The Manistee company paid the royalties accruing during 1917 and exercised its option of purchase over the American patents for £26,000, of which the share of the syndicate was £15,898. This sum was not included in the syndicate's profit and loss account, but was written off the value of the patents in the balance-sheet.

The sole question for the Court was whether this sum of £15,898 so received by the syndicate was a profit of its business on which it was assessable to income-tax.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant syndicate :—

(a) That the patents sold to the Manistee company were capital assets of the appellants.

(b) That the syndicate in selling the patents was realizing part of its capital assets.

(c) That the syndicate had not made a business of buying and selling patents.

(d) That the sum received from the Manistee company was not, as a whole, or in part, a profit of its trade or business in respect of which it was assessable to income-tax and excess profits duty.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown (inter alia), (a) that the sum of £26,000 so paid by the Manistee company was a receipt of the appellant syndicate's business and so was assessable to income-tax ; and (b) that the assessments appealed against were correct and should be confirmed.

The Special Commissioners decided that the profits on the sale of patents arose in the course of the syndicate's business and were assessable to income-tax and excess profits duty.

Upon an appeal by the syndicate Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that he was bound by the Special Commissioners' decision as a finding of fact, and could not disturb it. He followed his own decision in Collins v. Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate (unreported), afterwards reversed by the Court of Appeal (133 L.T., 616).

The syndicate appealed.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. J. H. Bowe appeared for the appellants ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), and Mr. Reginald P. Hills for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments the Court took time for consideration.

The Master of the Rolls.—These two appeals are from judgments of Mr. Justice Rowlatt dated May 20, 1927, whereby he confirmed the decisions of the Special Commissioners that the appellant company was liable to pay income-tax and excess profits duty upon a sum of £15,898. The details of the figures are not in dispute and the full facts are stated in the cases and the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt. For the purpose of this judgment it is enough to say that the company contends that the above sum was not subject to income-tax or to excess profits duty, because it represents the company's share of the sale price of the patent rights in the United States of America of the group of patents relating to centrifugal turbine and similar pumps which it was the purpose of the company to acquire and to turn to account by granting licences or by sale. This is the sole question raised in the case, although the dealings by the company in other directions are stated for the purpose of giving full information upon its activities. To avoid any misconception, I say that in my judgment the group of patents which were acquired by the company may be treated as the one patent which the company was formed originally to acquire. The other patents, which have been added to the original one, relate to devices subsidiary to the main one, and are dependent for their purpose and use upon the central invention, the fundamental basis of which was what is called the Roturbo principle.

It is claimed on behalf of the company that what they have disposed of, receiving in return the £15,898, was a capital asset—that the transaction was a realization of a part of their capital assets, and not a profit of their circulating capital. The Revenue authorities contend that it was a receipt and profit made in the course of carrying on the ordinary business of the company, and so chargeable to the tax and duty. Thus the question, which is the same in both cases, is the difficult one of deciding whether a profit realized belongs to the capital or to the profit and loss account.

The cases were heard in December, 1924, but the Special Commissioners delayed their decision until a judgment was delivered by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in the case of Collins v. Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate (unreported), which involved a similar question. The judgment was delivered by Mr. Justice Rowlatt on March 2, 1925 ; and the Special Commissioners then gave their decision in the present cases on March 18, holding : "That the profits on sale of patents arose in the course of the appellant company's business and were chargeable to income-tax and excess profits duty." They followed the question put and answered affirmatively by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in his judgment in Collins v. Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate (supra)—namely, whether the company benefited by this appreciation in the course of its trade, with the same result as decided by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in the Firth-Brearley case (supra), that the syndicate was liable to the tax. That question so answered in the Firth-Brearley case (supra) was held in this Court (133 L.T., 616) on June 25, 1925, not to have concluded the matter. The finding of the Special Commissioners in the present cases was not that the profit was realized as part of its ordinary trading, although the finding was interpreted to bear that meaning by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in his judgment now under appeal.

In the Firth-Brearley case (supra) in this Court, Lord Justice Atkin pointed out that it was necessary not only to determine that the syndicate carried on a trade, but also what was the scope of the trade : "For that purpose I think in order to examine the facts you must look at what the company purported to do and also at what it did in fact" (133 L.T., at p. 622). Finally, upon an examination of the findings of the General Commissioners, the Court of Appeal held that they had intended to find that upon the sale of the patent there was a transmutation of a capital asset from the form of a patent to a sum of money, and that upon that finding the Firth-Brearley Syndicate was not liable to income-tax.

The present cases therefore come before this Court with a finding by the Special Commissioners which in itself is not sufficient. The scope of the trade, in the course of which the profits on sale of patents arose, is not examined or stated. Mr. Justice Rowlatt regretfully felt that he could not disturb the finding of the Special Commissioners, which he interpreted as meaning that the profits arose out of the syndicate's trading and in the course of their seeking the objects of their ordinary business. It is unfortunate, as the learned Judge observes, that the question decided in the Firth-Brearley case (supra) and presented in the one before us involves such a nice examination of the language used, but it is not possible to do justice to the issues raised, and to the decisions given, without it.

Two points arise for this Court to determine : (1) Is the question raised by the appeal one of fact upon which the decision of the Special Commissioners is final, or one of law ? (2) Have the Special Commissioners rightly directed themselves in applying the law to the facts ? It is not necessary to go over again all the cases in which this problem of fact or law has been discussed. They are referred to in the decision of this Court in Currie v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (37 The Times L.R., 371 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 332), particularly in the judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton, who quotes the observation of Lord Parker in Farmer v. Cotton's Trustees (31 The Times L.R., 478 ; [1915] A.C., 922, at p. 932) : "The views from time to time expressed in this House have been far from unanimous." It is useful, however, to observe that in Currie's case (supra) the question for the Court was whether a man was carrying on a profession. That was held to be a question of fact. On the other hand, in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Korean Syndicate (37 The Times L.R., 735 ; [1921] 3 K.B., 258)—which was decided in this Court and two members of it were those who had decided Currie's case (supra)—it was held that the Special Commissioners had misdirected themselves on a matter of law—namely, the true interpretation of an agreement and the memorandum and articles of association of the company. Thus the Court felt able to reverse the decision of the Special Commissioners, which had been upheld by Mr. Justice Rowlatt. I have come to the conclusion that the later decision applies to the present case. The circumstances in which the decision of the Special Commissioners was given confirm me in this view, for not only had they to consider the memorandum and articles of association of the syndicate and the agreements made with the Manistee company, dated March 15, 1912, and January, 1917, but avowedly they waited for the guidance to be derived from the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in the Firth-Brearley case (supra), a judgment which was afterwards reversed.

Dealing with the case, therefore, as one open to review in this Court, it appears that the asset of the syndicate, which was incorporated in 1906, was this group of Roturbo patents with the rights which accrued to the syndicate in foreign countries under international conventions. The facts as to the syndicate's business for a succession of years are stated in paragraph 11 of the case. When the option to purchase the American rights was exercised by the Manistee company in 1917, the syndicate marked the distinction between the royalties paid to them for the user of the patent during 1917, and the sum received for the sale of the American rights, by bringing the former into their profit and loss account and deducting the latter from the value of the patents in their balance-sheet in 1918. In 1922 the syndicate reduced its paid up capital under section 40 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The syndicate were not trading in buying and selling patents generally. They had secured these particular patents and patent rights, which formed the totality of their assets. It was proved by evidence which the Special Commissioners accepted (see paragraph 12) that the syndicate had never originated offers to sell the foreign patents.

If the Special Commissioners had had an opportunity of considering the judgment of this Court in the Firth-Brearley case (supra), in my opinion they would and ought to have come to the conclusion that the sale of these U.S.A. patent rights was the transmutation of a capital asset into money. It was an out-and-out disposal of a right which, up to the date of the sale, enhanced the capital assets, and upon its transfer to the Manistee company deducted a portion from them. It was a substitution of one form of fixed capital assets for another, not a profit of circulating capital.

In Gloucester Railway Carriage and Wagon Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (41 The Times L.R., 320 ; [1925] A.C., 469) Lord Dunedin held that the selling of the wagons was an incident of buying and selling in the ordinary course of the business of the company, for it was an integral part of the company's business to deal in and sell wagons. The business was of a different nature here.

Holding, as I do, that the decisions of the Special Commissioners are open to review in this Court, I have come to the conclusion which I gather that Mr. Justice Rowlatt would have desired to reach, and these appeals must be allowed and this sum of £15,898 must be treated as a capital asset.

The appeals will be allowed with costs, and the assessments discharged.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—These two appeals by the Rees Roturbo Syndicate, Limited, one in respect of income-tax and one in respect of excess profits duty, raise the same point, whether the syndicate were liable to taxation on the result of certain transactions in respect of their patents. The Special Commissioners held that the results were profits on the sale of patents arising in the course of the syndicate's business, and as such were liable to taxation. Mr. Justice Rowlatt declined to interfere with what he considered to be a finding of fact by the Special Commissioners, and the syndicate appeal.

The case is complicated by the fact that this decision of the Special Commissioners was pronounced after Mr. Justice Rowlatt had reversed a previous decision of theirs in a somewhat similar case, but before the decision of the learned Judge in that previous case had been reversed by the Court of Appeal. Mr. Justice Rowlatt's decision in the present case was, however, given with full knowledge of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the previous case.

I deal with the facts of the present case first. The syndicate had a very large interest in a series of patents relating to centrifugal pumps and condensers both in England and foreign countries. As a company it was formed to acquire these patents, and to "sell, dispose of, turn to account, grant rights and privileges in respect of, or otherwise deal with all or any part of the property and rights of the company." The company desired, if possible, to exploit these patents by granting manufacturing licences in consideration of royalties, and to retain the ownership of the patents. But it was found that some foreign manufacturers would not agree to take a licence on payment of royalties, even an exclusive licence, unless they were also given an option to purchase the patents. In these circumstances, besides a number of royalty licences in various countries, these transactions are mentioned in the case. (1) An exclusive licence to the Manistee company for the United States and Canada in consideration of a cash payment of £10,000 and royalties of 10 per cent. on the selling price, with a guaranteed minimum, coupled with an option exercisable within fixed dates to purchase the United States and Canadian patents for a lump sum. The Manistee company paid the £10,000 but not the minimum royalties, and ultimately another agreement was made by which the Manistee company was excused royalties up to January 1, 1917; and its option was changed into one to purchase the United States patents only for a sum of £26,500. The Manistee company paid royalties for 1917 and then exercised its option, and £15,898 net was received by the syndicate and written by them off the value of the patents. This appears to be the sum in dispute in this case. I find it difficult to understand how part of this complicated transaction was in the course of business, and part not. (2) In 1918 an agreement was made with a Canadian company, by which an exclusive licence was granted to them to manufacture and sell Roturbo pumps within the Dominion of Canada in consideration of a payment of $5,000, a royalty on selling price with a guaranteed minimum, and a provision that, when the royalties came to $90,000, all royalties should cease and the Canadian patents should be transferred to the Canadian company. (3) By an agreement of 1919 an exclusive licence was granted to a French company to manufacture and sell in France in consideration of 130,000 francs paid down, the royalties to be reduced when they reached a certain amount.

In paragraph 21 of the case it is stated that the syndicate, while not admitting liability in respect of cases 2 and 3, did not object to the sums received under them being included in the assessment. The practical difference between an exclusive licence for a district and an assignment of the patent for that district is very small. The licensor cannot, having granted an exclusive licence, make any money out of the patent in the district of the licence except from the licensee under the licence. He does retain to himself the right to sue for infringements, which would pass to the assignee under an assignment of the patent; but in agreements 2 and 3 he binds himself to sue infringers in the licensed districts at his own expense. It does not appear to be disputed that the royalties would be proper subject-matter of taxation, and it follows in the Canadian case that when, the royalties having reached $90,000, the patents were assigned to the licensee, the consideration for the assignment would all have paid tax. The syndicate have not objected to the lump sums in cases 2 and 3 being included in the taxation, and no question is apparently raised about the royalties or first lump sum in the Manistee case. The syndicate have done sufficiently well in exploiting the patents to return 95 per cent. of their capital out of accumulated profits, which must all have been taxed as profits.

The line between receipts which are not taxable as being the result of the sale of capital assets and receipts which, though receipts of sale, are taxable as profits of trade is stated by Lord Dunedin in the Privy Council in Commissioner of Taxes v. Melbourne Trust, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 685; [1914] A.C., 1001, at p. 1010) as follows: "Their Lordships think that the principle is correctly stated in the Scottish case quoted, California Copper Syndicate v. Harris (5 Tax Cas., 159): 'It is quite a well settled principle in dealing with questions of income-tax that where the owner of an ordinary investment chooses to realize it, and obtains a greater price for it than he originally acquired it at, the enhanced price is not profit in the sense of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act of 1842 assessable to income-tax. But it is equally well established that enhanced values obtained from realization or conversion of securities may be so assessable where what is done is not merely a realization or change of investment, but an act done in what is truly the carrying on, or carrying out, of a business.' In the present case the whole object of the company was to hold and nurse the securities it held, and to sell them at a profit when convenient occasion presented itself. Their Lordships therefore come to the conclusion that there is ample evidence here that the company is a trading company and that the surplus realized by it by selling the assets at enhanced prices is a surplus which is taxable as profit." This case was followed by the Privy Council in Rex v. Anderson Logging Company, Limited ([1926] A.C., 140). Illustrations of the two classes of cases as regards sale of land may be found in Stevens v. Hudson's Bay Company (25 The Times L.R., 709) (price of land not taxable) and Thew v. South West Africa Company (9 Tax Cas., 141) (price taxable as proceeds of trade). Cases of taxation on the profits of realization by sale of the one and only asset will be found in Martin v. Lowry (43 The Times L.R., 116; [1927] A.C., 312) and Cape Brandy Syndicate v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (37 The Times L.R., 402; [1921] 2 K.B., 403). This being the question to be decided, the Special Commissioners heard arguments on behalf of the syndicate that the sum in dispute was a realization of capital assets, and on behalf of the Crown that it was a receipt of the company's business, and decided that "the profits on sale of patents arose in the course of the syndicate's business." If this is a finding of fact, it is unappealable if there was evidence on which the finding could be made, even if the Court would not have made such a finding. If it includes a finding of law, it is appealable on the law.

In my view it is impossible to reconcile the various statements of high authorities on the division between fact which is unappealable and law which is appealable. One may compare the view of Lord Parker in Farmer v. Cotton's Trustees (31 The Times L.R., 478; [1915] A.C., 922) and of Lord Wrenbury in Great Western Railway Company v. Bater (38 The Times L.R., 448; [1922] 2 A.C., 1), which I think would make every finding of fact appealable on the ground that it was a question whether the Commissioners had rightly construed the statute or law which used the words in which they described the "fact," with the views of the House of Lords in American Thread Company v. Joyce (29 The Times L.R., 266), affirming the judgment of Mr. Justice Hamilton, and in Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Limited v. Bruce (31 The Times L.R., 104; [1915] A.C., 433, at p. 465), negativing the view of Sir Samuel Evans that the question was one of law. I have myself twice expressed my views on the subject at some length, first in Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales (30 The Times L.R., 588; [1914] 3 K.B., 674), a decision which has several times been cited with approval in this Court and in the House of Lords, and secondly in Currie v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (37 The Times L.R., 371; [1921] 2 K.B., 332). In my view, the point at which sales of assets resulting in a profit are of such a number and nature as to constitute a trade or business, or the point when a sale of an asset is so connected with a trade carried on that profits received from it are profits of a trade, is a question of degree and of fact. How many sales of pictures will make a man a picture dealer is a question of degree. I agree with the view of Lord Justice Atkin in Cooper v. Stubbs (41 The Times L.R., 614; [1925] 2 K.B., 753) that questions of degree are questions of fact, and that whether a trade is being carried on is a question of degree and fact. Looking at this case alone, I think there was evidence on which the Special Commissioners could find that these profits arose in the course of a trade and business. The syndicate were making profits out of their patents largely by granting licences in exchange for royalties. They found difficulties in getting agreements to pay royalties unless they would grant options to purchase, or agreements to assign when royalties reached a certain amount. I find it impossible to say that there was no evidence on which the Special Commissioners could find that these transactions were part of, and incidental to, and arose out of the appellants' trade or business. Indeed, the appellants did not object to cases 2 and 3 and the royalties under case 1 being included in the assessment. So far on the case under appeal. There remains the question how far the present case is affected by the proceedings in the previous case of Collins v. Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate (133 L.T., 616). In that case the company had patents for the manufacture of stainless steel, and granted licences for their use. Three transactions were stated in the case. (1) An agreement by which the United States patent was sold in consideration of 550 shares in the purchasing company. The selling company there exchanged the patent under which they could receive royalties for shares in a company which itself would pay dividends out of the sums made by exercising, or licensing the use of the patent. This certainly looks like the exchange of one capital asset for another. (2) An agreement for the sale of a Japanese patent for a price payable by ten yearly instalments, and for a fixed royalty per year for the life of the patent. (3) An agreement whereby a French patent was assigned in consideration of a royalty per pound of all stainless steel dealt with under the patent. These last two cases are similar to cases 2 and 3 of the present case, on which the present appellants submitted to be taxed. The General Commissioners for one of the Divisions of Yorkshire heard arguments similar to those in the present case and decided that "the amounts realized were an appreciation of capital and not taxable profits." Mr. Justice Rowlatt reversed their decision. He has explained in his judgment in the present case that he did so under the impression that the General Commissioners had only found an appreciation of capital in the course of trade; and that, if he had understood that they intended to find an appreciation of a capital asset not in the course of trade, he would not have reversed their decision. However that may be, the Court of Appeal reversed Mr. Justice Rowlatt's judgment and restored the decision of the General Commissioners. The ground of their opinion appears to be that it was a finding of fact with evidence justifying the decision, though there was evidence on which an opposite finding might be arrived at. Lord Hanworth at the end of his judgment, Lord Justice Warrington and Lord Justice Atkin at the beginning of their judgments, all treat the finding as one of fact, with evidence to support it, with which the Judge had no right to interfere, he not being the judge of fact. I approach the present case in the same way; in my view there is here a finding of fact, with evidence to support it, and no misdirection in law. It would have been possible in each case to come to a decision the other way; this is always so when the question is one of degree judged of by different bodies of Commissioners. The Special Commissioners are at least as competent to decide questions of fact and appreciate the law as the General Commissioners of a Division of Yorkshire; one might perhaps go farther with safety. In my view Mr. Justice Rowlatt's refusal to interfere with the decision of the Special Commissioners given after reading the decision of this Court in the Stainless Steel case (supra) was justified, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant.—In the first case—namely, that as to income-tax—I think that Mr. Latter was right in his contention that the decision of the Special Commissioners must be interpreted in the light of the learned Judge's decision in the analogous case of Collins v. Firth-Brearley Stainless Steel Syndicate (unreported). The appeal in that case had been decided by the learned Judge on March 2, 1925, while the decision in the present case was given by the Special Commissioners on March 18, 1925, having been held over by them since the argument before them on December 9, 1924. It is fairly clear, therefore, from these dates, and is confirmed by the internal evidence of the decision itself in the present case, that the Special Commissioners have taken for their guide the observations of the learned Judge in his judgment in the Firth-Brearley case (supra).

Now in that case the General Commissioners had decided that the sums received by the company on the sale of their patents in Japan and the United States of America were an appreciation of capital and not assessable profits. But the learned Judge reversed their decision because (as he says in the present case) he misunderstood their finding, and thought that they did not mean that there had been an appreciation of a capital asset, but that they meant that the appreciation had occurred in the course of "trade which it was the object of the trade to secure." Unfortunately, however, for the decision of the present case, the learned Judge, in the language of his decision in the Firth-Brearley case (supra), did not make it clear that his judgment was based upon the supposition that the appreciation was in the course of "trade which it was the object of the trade to secure," but used language which was much more general—namely, that any appreciation in the course of the company's trade would have been sufficient to involve liability to income-tax.

With that judgment before them the Special Commissioners here, while stating correctly the contention on behalf of the company that the sale of the patents in the U.S.A. was a sale of part of their capital assets—i.e., of assets representing fixed capital and not circulating capital—state the contention of the Crown in terms which fall short of being the contrary of that contention, but satisfy the less definite language of the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in the Firth-Brearley case (supra)—namely, that the sum received on the sale was "a receipt of the appellant company's business and so assessable to income-tax." And in the same way the decision of the Special Commissioners is worded in language equally wanting in the necessary precision—namely, that "the profits on sale of patents arose in the course of the appellants' business and were chargeable to income-tax and excess profits duty."

In this state of things, the first question that arises is: What is the right interpretation to be put upon the finding of the Special Commissioners in the present case? The learned Judge has held that it amounted to a direct negativing of the contention of the company and to an assertion that the profit arose "in the course of the appellants' business, not because they were getting rid of a capital asset and putting an end to it, but because it was in the course of their business to sell the patents." With all respect to him, I cannot take that view. In my opinion the Special Commissioners carefully abstained from directly negativing the company's contention, and found in favour of the Crown enough, and no more than enough, to involve liability to income-tax on the basis of the incomplete test stated by the learned Judge in his decision in the Firth-Brearley case (supra).

I arrive at this conclusion on the language used by the Special Commissioners in stating the contention of the Crown and their own finding. But the conclusion is immensely strengthened by a consideration of the specific facts found by the Special Commissioners in the previous paragraphs of the case, and particularly in paragraphs 10, 11, and 12. It appears that the appellant company, so far from making it their business or part of their business to attempt to sell their foreign patents or any of them, always endeavoured to avoid any such sale, and that the sale now in question is the only sale which the company have ever in fact made. The specific facts found point unmistakably to the company's patents having constituted fixed assets or capital, as distinguished from assets or capital circulating in the course of the company's business and so resulting in a profit or loss attributable to income. And it is, in my judgment, inadmissible to attribute to the somewhat ambiguous and indefinite words of the general conclusion in paragraph 24 of the case a meaning which would be directly in the teeth of the facts specifically found in the preceding paragraphs. Indeed, if the conclusion in paragraph 24 has the meaning attributed to it by the learned Judge, there was not, in my judgment, any evidence on which the Special Commissioners were entitled to come to this conclusion.

Further, I do not consider that the decision of the Special Commissioners in paragraph 24 (for that is what they call it) was or was intended by them to be a finding of fact. I think it was a decision as to the law resulting from the facts previously found by them and stated in detail in the preceding paragraphs of the case. In my judgment that decision as to the law was wrong, and should on the specific facts found by the Special Commissioners have been the other way ; and the facts so specifically found and stated are, in my opinion, sufficient to entitle this Court to deal with and answer the question raised by the twenty-first paragraph of the case.

On these facts, which are practically on all fours with those in the Firth-Brearley case (supra), or so far as they differ are more strongly in favour of the taxpayer, this question should be answered in the negative, since the assets sold were obviously part of the fixed capital of the company and not part of its circulating capital. And I think, therefore, that the decision of the learned Judge to the contrary should be reversed.

I may add that this decision does not, in my view, prejudice such claim, if any, as the Crown may have to income-tax in respect of the years in which the company earned the royalties to the extent of £13,500, which were ultimately included in the purchase price of £26,500. The reversal of the decision as to income-tax, of course, involves a reversal of the corresponding decision as to excess profits duty. It has throughout been agreed that the two claims by the Crown rest on the same foundation.

LUSCAR COLLIERIES, LIMITED v. McDONALD AND OTHERS (ATTORNEYS-GENERAL FOR CANADA AND ALBERTA INTERVENANTS).*

Canada — Railway Act, 1919 — Jurisdiction of Railway Commissioners.

In proceedings brought by the appellants it was submitted that, as their line was a provincial railway, the Dominion Railway Acts had no application and the Board of Railway Commissioners no jurisdiction.

Held, affirming the decision of the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, that as the appellants' railway was, under the circumstances, a railway connecting the Province of Alberta with other Provinces, the railway was one within the legislative authority of the Dominion Parliament under s. 92 (10) (a) of the British North America Act, 1867, and the Board of Railway Commissioners had jurisdiction.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada supporting a decision of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. A. M. MacRobert, K.C., and Mr. S. B. Woods, K.C. (both of the Canadian Bar), appeared for the appellants ; the Hon. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., for the Attorney-General for Alberta ; Mr. O. M. Biggar, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), for the Attorney-General for Canada.

Lord Warrington of Clyffe, delivering their Lordships' judgment, said :—The appellants, the Luscar Collieries, Limited, are the owners of a short branch line of railway in the Province of Alberta, constructed by them but operated by the Canadian National Railway Company under certain agreements to be mentioned presently. The question in this appeal is whether the appellants' railway is a railway "within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada," and therefore a railway to which the Railway Act, 1919, of Canada applies (Railway Act, 1919, section 5).

The facts giving rise to these questions are as follows :—

In the year 1911 the Grand Trunk Pacific Branch Lines Company, under the authority of an Act of 1909 of the Parliament of Canada, constructed a Coal Branch in the Province from a station on the main line of the Grand Trunk Railway to a point at or near Coalspur. This Branch line is now part of the Canadian National Railways.

In the year 1911, by an Act of that year, the Branch Lines Company were authorized by the Parliament of Canada to construct another branch from the branch last mentioned to the Mountain Park Coal Company's collieries.

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

In the year 1912 the Mountain Park Coal Company, Limited, obtained authority from the Parliament of Alberta to construct, maintain, and operate a railway which is either identical with or takes the place of the branch described in the Canadian Act of 1911, and by the same Act of the Parliament of Alberta an agreement set forth in the Schedule to the Act between the Branch Lines Company, the Grand Trunk Company, and the Coal Company was ratified and confirmed, and it was provided that the railway thereby authorized should be operated pursuant to the agreement.

By the said agreement, which is dated January 23, 1912, it was provided in effect that the last-mentioned railway should be constructed by and at the expense of the Coal Company, who were to be reimbursed by certain rebates on freight, and that so soon as they had been so reimbursed the Branch Lines Company were to be the absolute owners of the railway. Provision was also made for the operation of the railway by the Grand Trunk Company.

In the year 1921 the appellant company, by an Act of the Parliament of Alberta, were authorized to construct the railway in question to connect with the Mountain Park Company's railway and to enter into an agreement for the operation of the railway by the Canadian National Railways which then comprised both the Branch Lines Company and the Grand Trunk Company, and for the ultimate transfer to or acquisition by the Canadian National Railways of the railway.

By an agreement dated May 10, 1921, made between the Branch Lines Company and the Grand Trunk Company, and the Mountain Park Coal Company, supplemental to the agreement of January 23, 1912, provision was made for the application of the agreement to the railway in question, therein referred to as the Luscar Branch Line, with certain modifications as to the terms of reimbursement, and it was thereby provided that on failure of the Coal Company to ship over the Luscar Branch Line when constructed the annual quantity of coal therein mentioned, neither the Branch Lines Company nor the Grand Trunk Company should be under any obligation to the Coal Company to continue the operation of such branch line.

Ultimately, by an agreement dated April 2, 1923, and made between the Mountain Park Company of the first part, the appellant company of the second part, the Branch Lines Company of the third part, and the Grand Trunk Company of the fourth part, the appellant company agreed to submit the Luscar Branch to the operation of the agreements of January 23, 1912, and May 10, 1921, and agreed that the Branch Lines Company and the Grand Trunk Company should have as regards the Luscar Branch all the rights given to them by the Mountain Park Company under the said agreements with regard to the Mountain Park Branch.

Since the construction of the Luscar Branch Line it has been operated under the agreements aforesaid by the Canadian National Railways, and traffic over it can pass without interruption to such parts of the Dominion as are served by the Canadian National Railways.

Under these circumstances the respondent, N. S. McDonald, the owner of a coal lease in the vicinity of the appellants' colliery, made an application to the Board of Railway Commissioners constituted under the Railway Act of 1919 for an order granting him running rights over the Luscar Branch, and for an order requiring the Canadian National Railway Company to grant him permission to construct a short track to serve his coal lease.

The appellant company objected to this application on the ground that the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada had no jurisdiction, asserting that their line was a provincial railway, to which the Dominion Railway Acts had no application.

The Board of Railway Commissioners overruled the appellants' objection, and on August 14, 1924, made a formal order declaring that in pursuance of the powers conferred by section 6 (c) of the Railway Act, 1919, the Board had power to make the order applied for.

In view of the then pending appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Board made no operative order, leaving this to be dealt with after the question of jurisdiction should have been settled.

The Attorney-General for Canada intervened in the appeal to support the jurisdiction of the Board, and by an order dated May 18, 1925, the Supreme Court affirmed the order of the Board and dismissed the appeal.

The appellant company thereupon obtained special leave to appeal to his Majesty in Council. The Attorney-General for Canada and the Attorney-General for Alberta intervened to oppose and support the appeal respectively. The respondent McDonald does not appear.

The material statutory provisions are the following :—

By section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, it was provided that the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to (amongst other subjects thereby enumerated) such classes of subjects as are expressly excepted in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by the Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

Section 92, so far as it is material, is as follows :—

"In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say :—

"10. Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes :—

"(a) Lines of steam or other ships railways canals telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces or extending beyond the limits of the Province.

"(c) Such works as although wholly situate within the Province are before or after their execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the Provinces."

The Railway Act, 1919 (Canada), contains the following material provisions :—

"Section 2 (4). 'Company' . . . where not otherwise stated or implied means 'railway company' unless immediately preceded by 'any' 'every' or 'all' in which case it means every kind of company which the context will permit of.

"Section 5. This Act shall, subject as herein provided, apply to all . . . railways . . . within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada. . . .

"Section 6. The provisions of this Act shall without limiting the effect of the last preceding section extend and apply to :—

"(c) Every railway or portion thereof, whether constructed under the authority of the Parliament of Canada or not, now or hereafter owned controlled leased or operated by a company wholly or partly within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada . . . whether such ownership control or . . . operation is acquired or exercised by lease agreement or other means whatsoever and whether acquired or exercised under authority of the Parliament of Canada or of the Legislature of any Province or otherwise howsoever; and every railway or portion thereof now or hereafter so owned controlled leased or operated shall be deemed and is hereby declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada."

On this section it is clear that having regard to the definition in section 2 (4), the word "company" means railway company, and does not include a bank or financial company controlling a railway.

The Attorney-General for Canada, in support of the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, relies on two alternative grounds:—

(1) That the appellants' railway is, under the circumstances, a railway connecting the Province of Alberta with other Provinces (section 92 (10) (a) of the British North America Act, 1867).

(2) That, if this ground fails, then it is a 'work' within section 92 (10) (c) of the Act of 1867 by virtue of section 6 (c) of the Railway Act, 1919, and the declaration therein contained.

Of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada three—namely, the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Duff and Mr. Justice Rinfret—decided in favour of the jurisdiction on the first ground, but in reference to the second were of opinion that such a general declaration as that contained in section 6 (c) was not a declaration within section 92 (10) (c) of the British North America Act, 1867; two—namely, Mr. Justice Mignault and Mr. Justice Newcombe—accepted the second ground and expressed no opinion on the first. Mr. Justice Idington was for allowing the appeal.

Their Lordships agree with the opinion of Mr. Justice Duff that the Mountain Park Railway and the Luscar Branch are, under the circumstances hereinbefore set forth, a part of a continuous system of railways operated together by the Canadian National Railway Company, and connecting the Province of Alberta with other Provinces of the Dominion. It is, in their view, impossible to hold as to any section of that system which does not reach the boundary of a Province that it does not connect that Province with another. If it connects with a line which itself connects with one in another Province, then it would be a link in the chain of connexion, and would properly be said to connect the Province in which it is situated with other Provinces.

In the present case, having regard to the way in which the railway is operated, their Lordships are of opinion that it is in fact a railway connecting the Province of Alberta with other Provinces, and therefore falls within section 92 (10) (a) of the Act of 1867. There is a continuous connexion by railway between the point of the Luscar Branch farthest from its junction with the Mountain Park Branch and parts of Canada outside the Province of Alberta. If under the agreements hereinbefore mentioned the Canadian National Railway Company should cease to operate the Luscar Branch, the question whether under such altered circumstances the railway ceases to be within section 92 (10) (a) may have to be determined, but that question does not now arise.

Their Lordships having thus come to a conclusion against the appeal on the first of the two grounds mentioned above, it is unnecessary for them to express any opinion on the second, and in accordance with their usual practice they think it not desirable to do so. But they wish it distinctly to be understood that so far as they are concerned the question as to the validity of section 6 (c) of the Act of 1919 is to be treated as absolutely open.

Counsel for the appellant company raised a question as to the power of the Board of Railway Commissioners to grant the application in the form in which it was framed. This is not a matter going to the jurisdiction of the Board—a Dominion authority as distinct from a Provincial one—and is one which can and ought to be considered by the Board when—its general jurisdiction having been established—it is asked to exercise it in the particular case.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the appeal fails and must be dismissed, but without costs. The respondent McDonald does not appear to ask for costs, and the interveners are not entitled to them. Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

FAREY v. COOPER AND OTHERS.*

Assignment—Assignment to trustee for benefit of creditors — Business and goodwill — Covenant by assignors to assist trustee in realizing the estate and in distribution of assets—Whether broken by solicitation of customers by assignors on behalf of rival business.

By a deed of assignment, the debtors, who were three brothers who had been carrying on a bakery business in partnership, assigned the business and goodwill thereof to the plaintiff as trustee. The debtors covenanted, inter alia, that they would "do all such acts and things in relation to the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors as may be reasonably required by the trustee, and will aid to the utmost of their power the realization of the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors." In an action by the plaintiff as trustee under the deed of assignment claiming an injunction to restrain the debtors from soliciting the customers of the business for orders for and on behalf of themselves and the defendant Cooper, who carried on business as a baker, and to restrain the defendant Cooper from instigating the debtors so to do,

Held, that the action would not lie against the defendant Cooper, as the acts which it was alleged that he instigated were not wrongful. As the debtors themselves were justified in law in soliciting the customers of the business, and were not precluded from so doing by their covenant, the defendant Cooper could not be restrained from instigating them so to do.

* Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Green v. Morris (30 The Times L.R., 301 ; [1914] 1 Ch., 562) approved and applied.

This was an appeal by the defendant Cooper from a decision of Mr. Justice Finlay in an action tried with a jury.

The plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants, the brothers Hill, from soliciting the customers of a bakery business which they had assigned to the plaintiff as trustee for the benefit of creditors. The plaintiff also claimed an injunction against the defendant Cooper to restrain him from instigating the other defendants to solicit the customers of the business.

The plaintiff was trustee under a deed of assignment dated November 11, 1925, executed by three of the defendants, the brothers Hill (the debtors), who had carried on business as bakers at Harrow, under the name of Hill Brothers. By the deed the debtors assigned the business and the goodwill thereof to the plaintiff, with power to carry on the business so far as might be necessary to wind up the estate. The debtors covenanted, for the purpose of assisting the trustee in realizing the property to the best advantage, inter alia, that they would attend at any time as the trustee required, and generally do all such acts and things in relation to the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors as might be reasonably required by the trustee, and would aid to the utmost of their power the realization of the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant, Mr. Wright Cooper, who carried on business at Harrow as a baker, had instigated and allowed one of his co-defendants, Mr. Charles Thomas Hill, to solicit customers of the business formerly carried on by the three assignors (the debtors) as bakers in Harrow, and the plaintiff claimed an injunction to restrain the debtors from soliciting the customers for orders and to restrain the defendant Cooper from instigating the debtors so to do.

The jury found that two of the debtors, Messrs. G. A. Hill and Mr. C. T. Hill, had solicited old and new customers of the business ; and that the defendant Cooper had instigated C. T. Hill to solicit the customers of the business. The jury awarded damages against the defendants, and Mr. Justice Finlay directed judgment to be entered for the damages awarded and granted injunctions against the debtors, G. A. Hill and C. T. Hill, and against the defendant Cooper.

The defendant Cooper appealed.

Serjeant Sullivan, K.C., and Mr. A. W. Elkin appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. A. W. Roskill (Mr. Comyns Carr, K.C., with them) for the respondent.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is an appeal from the verdict and judgment in an action tried before Mr. Justice Finlay, and a number of points have been raised in support of the appeal. The action was brought by the trustee under a deed of assignment against the three assignors, and the present appellant, Mr. Wright Cooper. Mr. Wright Cooper is the only appellant, and the case made against him was that, being a baker at Harrow, he had instigated and allowed one of his co-defendants, Mr. Charles Thomas Hill, to commit a wrong ; whether it is described as a breach of his duty, or a derogation from his grant or breach of contract, does not very much matter. The wrong consisted in soliciting customers of the business formerly carried on by the three assignors as bakers and confectioners in Harrow. The action was tried by Mr. Justice Finlay and a common jury, and among other questions the learned Judge asked the jury whether the appellant, Wright Cooper, did instigate or conspire with the other defendants, or any and which of them, to canvass and obtain either (a) the old customers or (b) other customers of the trustee, and the jury answered that question in the affirmative. Upon that, after discussion, the learned Judge entered judgment for the plaintiff and granted an injunction to restrain the appellant, Cooper from instigating or allowing Charles Thomas Hill, his servants or agents, to endeavour to induce the customers of Hill Brothers, bakers and confectioners, to deal with the appellant, Cooper. From that judgment and verdict this appeal is brought, and a number of grounds have been urged, grounds of law and grounds of fact.

With regard to the law, it was said that there is no evidence to support the jury's finding. We have heard Serjeant Sullivan upon that, and I do not propose to express any opinion upon that point, as we have not heard the other side, except to say that there is certainly something to be said in support of the argument. Then it was said that, even if there was some evidence to go to the jury, the verdict and judgment ought to be set aside on the ground of misdirection and non-direction, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. There is obviously a good deal to be said in support of that contention, but we have not heard the other side, and I express no opinion about that. The other question of law was one which at first I did not consider substantial, but on further consideration I think it is conclusive. The point is this : That this action will not lie against the appellant, for the simple reason that the acts which he is said to have instigated or allowed were not wrongful acts at all, but they were acts which the particular brother, Charles Thomas Hill, was, in the circumstances, perfectly justified in doing ; and, if he was perfectly justified in doing them, it cannot be complained of the appellant that he instigated or assisted him. I quite understand that the appellant emphatically denies that he had anything to do with it, but that question remains undecided, because I propose to deal with this appeal on the underlying principle of law. There are authorities which have been referred to in order to show what the state of the law was at the time when this deed of assignment was made. The deed of assignment was made on November 11, 1925, and it is in common form to a large extent. Among other things, it contains in the form of a covenant what really are extracts from the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, relating to bankruptcy, and the particular clause in the covenant which is relied upon, and the one upon which the learned Judge seems to have decided the matter, is in a covenant imposing a number of obligations upon the debtors for the purpose of assisting the trustee in realizing their property to the best advantage, and among other provisions there is this, that they will attend at any time as the trustee may require, and generally do all such acts and things in relation to the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors as may be reasonably required by the trustee, and will aid to the utmost of their power the realization of the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors. On the face of it, that is an affirmative covenant : it defines what the debtors are to do by way of assisting the trustee in the realization of their property. But it is said that upon the true construction of this covenant there is implied a negative covenant, an obligation not to do anything which will depreciate the value of the property, and it is said that one of the negative acts which must be implied is the refraining from soliciting the old customers of the former business of the brothers, which has been assigned to the trustee. The learned Judge decided this case, as I understand, upon the view that there was such a negative covenant implied.

I wish to say in the first instance that I think that this covenant must be construed having regard to what was at the time of the covenant the existing law in reference to this particular matter, and for two reasons: one is for the purpose of seeing whether the brother was, or was not, doing something that he was entitled to do, and, secondly, for the purpose of seeing whether the knowledge that the brothers Hill had assigned all their property, including the goodwill of their business, to the trustee—whether a mere knowledge of that fact, without any knowledge that the deed contained this particular covenant, upon which everything apparently turns, was sufficient to create a cause of action against the appellant himself. I think that is a very material consideration. With regard to the law, I wish to refer to three or four cases quite shortly which have been mentioned in order of date, the date when they were, in fact, decided, and the ground upon which, in my opinion, they appear to have been decided.

The first is Walker v. Mottram (19 Ch.D., 355), which was decided in 1881 by a Court of Appeal. That case has stood as an authority ever since, and is now completely established as a binding authority. The question which was raised in that case was whether, in a case of bankruptcy, a bankrupt whose property and goodwill of the business had passed to a trustee in bankruptcy was under any obligation, as against a purchaser from the trustee, not to solicit the customers of the old business, and it was held that he was not. The ground, as I understand it, upon which it was held that he was not was that the passing of the property by the act of bankruptcy from the bankrupt to the trustee created no obligation as between the bankrupt and the trustee not to derogate from the grant within the meaning of the rule, and that there was no contract and no privity of contract between the bankrupt and the trustee from which any such obligation as not to solicit the customers of the old business could arise; and it was for that reason that the Court decided, as they did, that in such a case as that, where the property and goodwill of a man's business had passed under the bankruptcy laws from him to a trustee, the bankrupt was under no obligation to refrain from soliciting the customers of the old business. I will read one or two lines from the head note: "The rule of Labouchere v. Dawson (L.R. 13 Eq. 322), by which, in the case of a voluntary sale, the vendor of the goodwill of a business is precluded from afterwards soliciting the former customers of that business, cannot be extended to the case of a compulsory alienation," and then the reason is: "The obligation enforced by the rule is purely personal, and not a mere incident to the transfer of property. Therefore the purchaser of the goodwill of a business from a trustee in bankruptcy or liquidation has no right to restrain the bankrupt or liquidating debtor from setting up bona fide a fresh business and soliciting the customers of his former business, and it is immaterial whether the bankrupt has or has not joined in the conveyance of the goodwill to the purchaser."

I should like to refer to a case which was decided in 1882, and which was cited. It is only interesting as an instance in which the then Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, applied this doctrine of Walker v. Mottram (supra) and for the way in which he expressed himself with reference to that decision. It was a case of partners where one partner had been expelled and his interest had been purchased by his former partners. The expelled partner then set about soliciting the customers of the former partnership, and an application was made to restrain him, and the Master of the Rolls refused to make any order, and he said this (Dawson v. Beeson, 22 Ch.D., at p. 509): "The plaintiffs say that they had a right under the articles to expel their partner. Well, they did exercise that right and expelled the defendant, and then they bought the defendant's interest in the property from the sheriff. That is not equivalent to a voluntary alienation by a vendor; it is like the case of the alienation of a debtor's property by bankruptcy. The defendant loses the right to the business, but he does so involuntarily. He is turned out against his will, and is only entitled to receive the value of his share as if dead. He is not in the same position as a partner resigning voluntarily. Looking at Walker v. Mottram (supra), I think that he ought not to be restrained from carrying on the business in his own name and soliciting customers." Then in 1895 came the case of Trego v. Hunt (12 The Times L.R.,80; [1896] A.C., 7), in which the House of Lords established the principle that where a person voluntarily disposes of the goodwill of his business he cannot afterwards canvass the customers of the old firm; there is one passage to which I should like to refer in the judgment of Lord Herschell in which he describes the principle. Lord Herschell says this at page 21: "It is not material to consider whether, on the sale of a goodwill, the obligation on the part of the vendor to refrain from canvassing the customers is to be regarded as based on the principle that he is not entitled to depreciate that which he has sold, or as arising from an implied contract to abstain from any act intended to deprive the purchaser of that which has been sold to him and to restore it to the vendor. I am satisfied that the obligation exists, and ought to be enforced by a court of equity." That was the position when Green v. Morris (30 The Times L.R., 301; [1914] 1 Ch., 562) was decided. But I want to go back for a moment to Walker v. Mottram (supra) to pick up another point which I think is important in reference to this particular case which is now being discussed. It is said by the appellant here that in considering the construction of the particular words in question in this deed of assignment it must be borne in mind that they are a reproduction only of provisions in the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and provisions in the Bankruptcy Act which were in force at the time when Walker v. Mottram (supra) was decided, and that if there was any foundation for the respondent's contention as to the true construction of the words in question, Walker v. Mottram (supra) must have been decided the other way, because there were the identical words in the Bankruptcy Act staring the Court of Appeal in the face, and, in spite of that, they decided that there was no such obligation arising from these statutory words as is now contended exists from the contractual words in question in this assignment. It is quite true that the point was not put in exactly the same way in which it has been put to-day, but, in my opinion, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the Court had in mind the provision, and the identical provision, of the Bankruptcy Act when they came to the decision at which they arrived. The way in which this particular part of the case in Walker v. Mottram (supra) was put was this: It was said that under the present bankruptcy laws goodwill is expressly mentioned, and is specially mentioned, as a thing which passes to the trustee, and that there is a special provision in the statute which protects the value of the goodwill in the hands of the trustee. That provision in the statute is the one which is reproduced in this assignment in the form of an obligation on the debtors to do everything that is reasonably required, and to the utmost of their power aid in the realization of the debtors' property. I find that point put more than once in the argument of Mr. Higgins and Mr. Cooper Willis, and I find the Lord Justice referring in terms to the Bankruptcy Act. In these circumstances it seems to me that this case must be treated as a decision that the Court of Appeal did not consider that the soliciting of the old customers was a breach of the statutory obligation that the bankrupt owed to the trustee to aid to the utmost of his power in the realization of his property. I think that that is a very important consideration when we come to consider the case of Green v. Morris (supra) and the construction that ought to be put upon this deed. Green v. Morris (supra), as I read the decision, is an express decision that for all practical purposes an assignment under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, although in one sense it may be said to be voluntary, yet in the eye of the law, and for this particular purpose, must be treated as involuntary and in the same position exactly as a transfer which takes place by operation of the bankruptcy law from the bankrupt to the trustee. I think that is necessarily so when you follow the argument that was addressed to the learned Judge, Mr. Justice Warrington, and his decision. Mr. Simonds, who argued the case for the defendant there, said: "It is submitted that there is no obligation on the former owner of a business not to solicit where the goodwill is not sold by him but by his trustee under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors. A bankrupt although he files his own petition will not be restrained from soliciting: Walker v. Mottram (supra). In that case it was held that a bankrupt whose business had been sold by his trustee in liquidation could not be restrained from soliciting his former customers, and that it was immaterial whether he had or had not joined in the conveyance to the purchaser. That decision proceeded on the principle that a debtor ought not to be prevented after the liquidation of his affairs from gaining his livelihood. The same principle, it is submitted, applies in the case where a debtor has assigned all his property for the benefit of his creditors." Then he goes on: "There is no privity of contract between the assignor and the ultimate purchaser of the business. In such a case there is no implied contract by the assignor that he will not solicit the customers of his old business." What is meant by saying "There is no privity of contract between the assignor and the ultimate purchaser of the business"? Putting the two sentences together, it must mean that there is no contractual obligation as between the assignor and the trustee, and, there being no such obligation as between the assignor and the trustee, there is nothing which the trustee can pass on to the ultimate purchaser of the business. That must be what is meant when counsel is contending that there is no privity of contract between the assignor and the assignee. There is, in other words, nothing which the trustee can pass on. Then he goes on to say: "The assignment in this case, although for the benefit of creditors, is a voluntary one, and therefore differs from the case of a bankruptcy where the property vests by operation of law. The trustee in this case is in the position of an attorney of the debtor to sell the property." Then the learned Judge, referring to Walker v. Mottram (supra), says this at page 567: "The liquidating debtor is a person who is compelled by circumstances to take certain steps in order that his property may be distributed among his creditors in exactly the same way as a bankrupt who presents a petition under the present Bankruptcy Act. I can see no rational distinction between Walker v. Mottram (supra) and the present case. In one sense what the debtor does is voluntary, in another sense it is not voluntary at all, as he may have taken the steps he did take in order to avoid other proceedings being taken by the creditors. A man by divesting himself of his property under such circumstances as those in this case does not thereby constitute the relation of vendor and purchaser between himself and the ultimate purchaser of the property." I think in using that language he is referring to the argument addressed to him. Now I quite agree that it is a contentious point whether a man who executes an assignment such as this is for all purposes in the same position as a man who quite involuntarily comes within the provisions of the bankruptcy law. But I am quite satisfied that that is what the learned Judge decided as long ago as 1914 and has been quite recently approved by Mr. Justice Tomlin (Boorne v. Wicker, [1927] 1 Ch. 667, at p. 674). I certainly am not prepared to dissent from it. I think myself that it is the right view, and it seems to me impossible to decide this case in the way Mr. Pritt asked us to do without overruling Green v. Morris (supra), and I am not prepared to do that. I think that when this deed was in fact executed the law was that a person who executed such a deed as this was under no obligation to refrain from soliciting the customers of the old business, and that from and after the decision of Green v. Morris (supra) it was no longer sufficient to draft a deed of assignment in this form, but if it was desired to go farther, and to obtain a greater protection than the law as it existed afforded, some clear and precise words must be inserted in the covenant placing the assignor under whatever obligation was desired so long as it did not infringe any other provision of the law.

In the absence of any such express covenant, in my opinion, in this case two consequences follow. First of all, it cannot be said that the brother, Hill, was doing anything other than what he was entitled to do, in which case it cannot possibly be said that he committed any wrong which entitled the trustee to bring an action against him; and I also think that the trustee would fail, even assuming that a different view were taken of Mr. Justice Warrington's decision. It seems to me that this appellant was entitled to act under the belief that Mr. Justice Warrington's decision was the law, and all that he knew was that there had been an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and he had no reason to know, or to suppose, that there was in that deed anything which took the case out of that rule. Therefore it seems to me that whether you treat the covenant as one which does not contain a precise negative obligation, which is now contended for, or whether you accept it as containing such an obligation, but at the same time accept Mr. Justice Warrington's decision, the appellant in this case could say in the one case: "I have done no wrong, and it is impossible to suggest that I have," and in the other case he could say: "Well, whether I did or not, I did not know it, and you must bring home to me knowledge before you can bring an action against me for instigating a man to do something which I knew was wrong."

For these reasons I think this appeal succeeds, and must be allowed with costs, and the judgment against the appellant set aside and entered for him with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE ATKIN.—I agree. This is a case of a deed of assignment by certain debtors who were carrying on a baker's business in Harrow, and the plaintiff is the trustee of the deed of assignment. The defendant Cooper has been carrying on an old-established business in Harrow for a great number of years. The case that is made against the defendant Cooper, who is the appellant, is for damages for procuring the breach of certain obligations, by covenant express or implied, not to solicit customers of the business, and not to solicit these customers whether they were customers of the business at the time of the assignment by the debtors, or whether they are new customers acquired by the trustee in the course of his conduct of the business under the deed of assignment. Now in order to establish a case of procuring a breach of covenant it is, of course, necessary to establish that there was such a covenant, and that the person procuring was, in fact, under an obligation to refrain from procuring a breach of it. That has given rise to a very interesting question of law. As far as appears from the summing-up, the learned Judge adopted a simple method of solving the question whether or not there was such an obligation by leaving it to the jury, and one must assume that the jury found that such an obligation existed. But we are told that although he in terms left it to the jury, he had, in fact, ruled upon it before and indicated his view that there was an obligation subsisting. We have now to address ourselves to the proposition. The suggestion is that the debtors, who had assigned all their property to the trustee, had included in that property the goodwill of the business, and that by that assignment by express covenant, or by implied covenant, they were under an obligation to abstain from soliciting the customers of that business, whether they were customers at the date of the assignment or whether they had since been acquired by the trustee.

I think a simple way of approaching this case is by inquiring in the first place what would have been the position if, instead of its being a deed of assignment, there had been a bankruptcy petition upon which the debtors had been adjudicated, and the plaintiff was trustee in bankruptcy, and the property of the debtors, including the goodwill of the business, was vested in the trustee. It appears to me that in such a case the bankrupt is not under an obligation to the trustee to abstain from soliciting the old customers of the business, and, a fortiori, from soliciting the new customers of the business acquired after his connexion with the business had come to an end. That seems to explain the decision in Walker v. Mottram (19 Ch.D., 355). It is unnecessary, I think, to consider the grounds for it. No doubt it is founded upon the fact that in a case of bankruptcy there is no voluntary disposition by the debtor of his business, and therefore no opportunity of implying a contract between the bankrupt and the trustee. I think what also influenced the Court to come to their conclusion was the view that, whereas in the case of a voluntary disposition a man is doing something that might be said to be a breach of faith in diminishing that which he has sold (a derogation from his grant it has been called) by soliciting the old customers, in a case of bankruptcy not only does that consideration not apply, but there is a contrary view indicated—namely, that the policy of the Bankruptcy Act enables a bankrupt to resume his position in the world as much as possible, and to carry on his business—there is nothing to restrain him from carrying on his business; and inasmuch as he, being then a bankrupt, would have very few persons to deal with except those whom he had known beforehand, there is nothing to prevent him from asking for the assistance of his former customers in order to enable him to rehabilitate himself in the commercial world. I think that entered into consideration. Therefore, if it were a bankruptcy pure and simple, it seems to me plain that the debtors would be under no obligation to abstain from soliciting the customers of the old business. But it is said that this is a case of a deed of assignment, and therefore the position is the same, first of all, as in an ordinary case of a sale to a trustee, and one answer that has been made to that, and indeed it is admitted by Mr. Pritt to be a forcible answer, is that that is not enough to carry him home and to justify the verdict which has been obtained and the injunction which has been granted, because it is quite plain that an implied obligation in a purchase and sale of a goodwill with nothing more is merely an obligation—enforced in the House of Lords in Trego v. Hunt (12 The Times L.R. 80; [1896] A.C. 7)—to abstain from soliciting those who were customers of the business at the time of the sale, and would not apply to new customers who were obtained after the sale. Inasmuch as the damages here have been assessed on the footing of soliciting new customers, and inasmuch as the injunction is also addressed to restrain the defendant Cooper from procuring the solicitation of the new customers, the verdict would have to be set aside and the injunction discharged and a new trial would have to be ordered on that ground alone. Therefore Mr. Pritt put the case on a wider footing, and contended that in this case there was an express covenant which the trustee was entitled to enforce as against the debtors, and that a breach of it had been procured by the appellant. The covenant is a covenant that is to be found in the printed deed of assignment, "That the debtors will aid to the utmost of their power the realization of the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors," and it is said that that obligation imported a negative obligation not to solicit the customers of the business, either new or old. One has to consider that covenant as a whole in conjunction with the other covenants and the other stipulations, and it is to my mind very relevant to bear in mind, as was pointed out to us by Serjeant Sullivan, that that covenant is nothing but a repetition in the deed of the words of the Bankruptcy Act—the present Act and the former Bankruptcy Act—governing the duties of a bankrupt towards a trustee in bankruptcy. The words are to be found in section 22, sub-section (3), of the Act of 1914, and they appear, as was pointed out to us, in section 19 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. Not only do these words appear, but the previous covenant in the same deed that the debtors will give such further inventory of the property and particulars of their creditors and debtors, and attend examinations, and attend meetings, and do all such acts as may be reasonably required by the trustees, is expressed in words which are almost verbatim taken from the provisions of section 22, sub-section (2), of the Act of 1914, and is in itself merely a restatement by way of contract of the obligations imposed by the statute. To my mind it follows that in considering such a contract in a matter in pari materia with the Bankruptcy Act it would be right to give to the words in the contract the same construction as had been given to the words in the statute, and I think it is made more obvious that that would be the right construction when one remembers that by one of the clauses of this deed it is expressly agreed and declared that in the administration of the joint and separate estates of the debtors so far as circumstances admit the rules which govern or prevail in the administration in bankruptcy of the joint and separate estates of joint debtors shall apply.

Therefore I think there is no doubt that one ought to put upon these words in the contract the construction that is put upon the same words in the Bankruptcy Act. It is quite plain to my mind from Walker v. Mottram (supra) that these words in the Bankruptcy Act would not be construed to impose an obligation upon a bankrupt restraining him from soliciting the customers of the business, whether new or old, because if they ought to be so construed in bankruptcy it appears to me impossible that the case of Walker v. Mottram (supra) would have been decided as it was. I think, therefore, these words do not bear the meaning contended for. I should also come to the conclusion that, inasmuch as the duties of the debtors to the trustee in respect of the business are carefully defined in this express covenant, that covenant would probably exclude the existence of an implied covenant different from the express covenant, though dealing with the same subject-matter. Therefore, if it rested on contract alone, I think the position would be as I have stated, apart from other decisions, but it was decided by Mr. Justice Warrington, as he then was, in Green v. Morris (30 The Times L.R., 301; [1914] 1 Ch. 562) that the same position exists in respect to an obligation not to solicit in the case of an assignment for the benefit of creditors as exists in bankruptcy, and that the principle of Walker v. Mottram (supra) ought to be applied to a sale under a deed of assignment such as is applied, and was applied, in the case of a sale by a trustee in bankruptcy. The reason adduced by the learned Judge was that for practical purposes the position must be treated as the same and the assignment must be treated as being more or less involuntary. I think it sufficient to say that I am not prepared to dissent from the statement of the law which has existed for a considerable time and has been dealt with over and over again under deeds of assignment on the footing that that is the law. I am not prepared to dissent from it. Therefore I think that we are left in this position, that the principles of bankruptcy apply in this case.

It was said by Mr. Pritt that he could distinguish both Walker v. Mottram (supra) and Green v. Morris (supra) on the ground that in both these cases what was in question was a sale by the trustee, and that the purchaser from the trustee had not the same rights against the debtor as the trustee himself would have. To my mind that is quite an impossible contention. I apprehend that the decision in Walker v. Mottram (supra) is based upon the consideration that a trustee in bankruptcy himself had not got a right as against a debtor to restrain the debtor from soliciting the old customers of the business, because if he had such a right it seems to me conceivable that he would be capable of passing it on. It does not matter whether his right would be derived from contract, or from an obligation under the statute, or would be derived from the vesting of the property and the obligation imposed by section 22. It is obvious to my mind that if the trustee had such a right he would have been able to use it for the benefit of the estate, and to pass it on to a purchaser, thereby getting the greatest value for the estate that he could; and I think that the reasoning in Walker v. Mottram (supra) is upon the footing that there was no such obligation as between the debtor and the trustee, and therefore it could not be passed on to a purchaser from the trustee. I think that is the view taken by Mr. Justice Warrington in Green v. Morris (supra).

The result of that seems to me to be this: That inasmuch as the debtors were under no obligation to the trustee to refrain from doing the acts complained of, this defendant, Mr. Wright Cooper, could not possibly be made liable either for damages or to an injunction to restrain him from procuring acts which themselves were lawful in the debtors. The result of that seems to me to be that it follows that the verdict and judgment given against the defendant Cooper, who alone is the appellant, must be set aside and the verdict and judgment entered for the defendant Cooper. That in itself would carry costs, and this appeal must be allowed with costs. It also follows, I think, from what I have said, that the verdict and judgment against the other defendants were irregularly obtained, but they are not appellants in this case, and nothing more need be said about them.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree. The case made against the defendant Cooper is that he instigated the defendant C. T. Hill to commit a breach of contract. The breach alleged to have been instigated is the breach of an implied covenant on the part of the defendants, the brothers Hill, with the plaintiff not to canvass either the old customers or the new customers of the brothers Hill.

The first and vital question which arises is whether there was, in fact, any such implied covenant. As regards new customers—that is to say, customers who became customers after the execution of the deed of assignment—the rule in Trego v. Hunt (12 The Times L.R. 80; [1896] A.C. 7) does not apply, but it is said that a covenant not to canvass these customers would be implied by reason of the covenant, contained in the assignment, to aid in the realization of the assignors' property. That is a question with which I shall deal in a moment. As regards the old customers, the rule in Trego v. Hunt (supra) prima facie applies. But there is a decision to which we have been referred in Green v. Morris (30 The Times L.R. 301; [1914] 1 Ch. 562) which determines that that rule is not to be imported in a case of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and the question arises whether that decision was rightly arrived at. The same argument as regards the old customers is adduced—namely, that there is an implied covenant by reason of the covenant to aid in the realization. The first question that ought to be dealt with, in my judgment, is whether Green v. Morris (supra) was rightly decided, and, if so, whether it covers the present case. I agree with a remark made by my Lord as regards Green v. Morris (supra) being good law, as it has stood for so long undisturbed and has never been doubted or questioned, and I adopt what my colleagues have said as to the inadvisability of overruling that case at the present time. Mr. Pritt has contended that even if Green v. Morris (supra) stands it is distinguishable on two grounds: first, that it was a case not between the trustee and the debtor, but between a purchaser from the trustee and the debtor. In my judgment that is not a sound distinction. The foundation of the cases of Walker v. Mottram (19 Ch.D. 355) and Green v. Morris (supra) is that there is no implied contract by a debtor with a trustee the benefit of which the trustee can pass on to a purchaser. It is upon that foundation that the whole of both these judgments rests, and therefore they involve this, that according to Walker v. Mottram (supra) in the case of bankruptcy, and according to Green v. Morris (supra) in the case of an assignment for the benefit of creditors, the bankrupt himself can solicit the old customers and the new customers. The second ground upon which Mr. Pritt sought to distinguish Green v. Morris (supra) was that in that case there was no such covenant as we have here that the debtors will aid the trustee in the realization of the property. That brings me to the final point as to whether a covenant ought to be implied on the part of the debtors in the present case not to canvass either old or new customers from the fact of there being a covenant by them to aid the trustee in the realization of the property. I fully concur in the remarks made by my Lord on the point that that covenant is a mere repetition of the statutory obligation imposed by the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, upon debtors, and I think it is obvious in construing that covenant that the same rule must be applied to the meaning of such a covenant in this deed as was applied in the case of Walker v. Mottram (supra) as regards the statutory equivalent—namely, section 19 of the Act of 1869. But, quite apart from that, what is the property in the present case which the debtors have covenanted to help the trustee to realize? The assignment includes the goodwill of the business which they were carrying on, but having regard to the decision that goodwill consists only of the probability of the old customers resorting to the old place of business—in other words, the property assigned does not include the benefit of a covenant not to solicit either the old or the new customers—such a covenant as this cannot, in my opinion, enlarge the parcels of the deed, or enhance the value of the property which is thereby assigned, nor can it in my judgment imply a negative covenant not to do something which the law allows the assignors to do—namely, to solicit old and new customers.

For these reasons I think the appeal ought to be allowed with costs.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Atkin, and Lawrence, L.JJ.) 1927. July 15.

MARBÉ v. GEORGE EDWARDES (DALY'S THEATRE), LIMITED.*

Contract — Theatrical engagement—Agreement to advertise the performer—Refusal by employers to allow performer to play the part—Payment of full salary—Action for breach—Obligation to allow performer to act—Damages for loss of reputation.

The plaintiff, an actress, was engaged by the defendants to play a certain part in a play for the period of rehearsal and for the run of the play, and there was a collateral agreement that the defendants would advertise her in a prominent position. The defendants refused to allow the plaintiff to play the part, but they paid her the whole of her salary down to the end of the run of the play. In an action for breach of contract the jury awarded to the plaintiff, over and above her salary already paid, damages for loss of reputation through her not being employed to play the part. The defendants contended that under the written contract they were under no obligation to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for loss of reputation.

Held, that there was an obligation to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting, and the plaintiff was entitled, in addition to her salary already paid, to the damages awarded by the jury for loss of reputation.

Decision of Horridge, J. (43 The Times L.R., 460), affirmed.

This was an application by the defendants for judgment or a new trial in an action tried before Mr. Justice Horridge and a special jury (43 The Times L.R., 460).

In the action Miss Fay Marbé, the plaintiff, an American actress, claimed against George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, £5,000 damages for loss of publicity and injury to reputation, and loss of salary at £100 per week during the run of Yvonne at Daly's Theatre, in which play she was engaged to play the part of Lolotte. Her case was that she had never been given an opportunity to play the part. She also claimed damages for alleged libel contained in a letter written on behalf of the defendant company on July 29, 1926.

The special jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, awarding her £3,000 damages for loss of reputation and £100 damages for libel over and above the £3,257 already paid by the defendants in respect of salary at £100 per week.

In the course of the trial the late Mr. James White, who was managing director of the company, and who had been joined as a defendant, had been dismissed from the suit.

Mr. Neilson, K.C., and Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., appeared for the appellants; Sir Patrick Hastings, K.C., and Mr. Richard O'Sullivan for the respondents.

Mr. NEILSON, in opening the application, said that there were two causes of action—namely (1) breach of contract; and (2) libel. As to the first, Miss Marbé had entered into a contract with the defendants under which they retained her to play the part of Lolotte in Yvonne when they thought proper, and to pay her £100 a week. What happened was that, in the view of the authorities of Daly's Theatre, after the dress rehearsal, Miss Marbé was found not to be suitable for that particular part. But it was agreed that she should be paid for the run of the play at the contract price, and, in the result, £3,257 was paid to her for the run of 32 weeks. Not satisfied with that, the plaintiff claimed damages for loss of publicity. The appeal was based on the grounds:—(1) That in law there could be no claim for damages beyond the actual remuneration agreed to between the parties; and (2) that the damages awarded were excessive.

Miss Marbé, who was an actress of some position in America, wanted a part in a play in this country, and for that purpose obtained an introduction to the management of Daly's Theatre, where the play Yvonne was running. The play was not very successful, and, with a view to reshaping it and making it more successful, the management gave the plaintiff an audition, but she declined to rehearse unless she had a contract signed.

As to the second cause of action—namely, the alleged libel, the matter stood thus. After the plaintiff had signed the contract she proceeded to rehearse, and after the rehearsal she was told by the defendants that they were not going to play her, but that they would pay her. They intimated to her that she ought to look out for something else in order to reduce their liability to pay. Several letters were written to that effect, the defendants' view being that the plaintiff was not taking any very active steps to find other work. Finally, before the letter complained of was written, Miss Marbé wrote asking permission to play in certain charity performances, by means of which, although she would not receive any pay, she hoped that she would ultimately get something to do.

The letter complained of was sent to the plaintiff by Mr. Paget, the defendants' general manager, having been handed to his typist to be copied. It contained certain phrases which the Judge below had found to be capable of a defamatory meaning, but he held that it was a privileged document. The question whether there was malice was left to the jury, who, in the result, awarded damages to the plaintiff. Upon the question of libel, he (counsel) submitted that there was no evidence of publication, except to the typist who had copied the letter complained of, and, further, that there was no evidence of malice fit to be left to the jury.

On the question as to the alleged loss of publicity, the jury had found that there was an oral collateral agreement that Miss Marbé should be advertised in a prominent position. He submitted that there had been a misdirection on that point. There was in the written contract nothing which imported an obligation on the part of the defendants to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting. There was nothing more than an obligation on their part to pay the £100 a week. The added term, namely, to "bill" her in a prominent position when she played, made no difference.

As to the damages awarded for the injury to the plaintiff's reputation, he submitted that they were punitive in their nature. The only damages to which she was entitled were for the loss which she had sustained by not being advertised.

In conclusion, on the question of breach of contract, he desired to sum up his points by saying:—(1) That there was no express obligation upon the defendants to permit the plaintiff to play; (2) that there was no room for implying such an obligation, and that in the absence of such an obligation there could be no right to recover damages for loss of publicity, and (3) that the alleged collateral agreement added nothing to the written contract by way of imposing any obligation upon the defendants, because it was consistent with that contract that it was only when the plaintiff played that they were to advertise her in a prominent position.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is an appeal from a verdict and judgment in an action tried by Mr. Justice Horridge and a special jury. The action was brought by the plaintiff claiming damages under two heads; one was for libel, and the other was for breach of a contract of employment; and the jury were asked certain questions. They found in the lady's favour on all points, and they awarded her £100 damages in respect of her claim for libel, and £3,000 as damages for the breach of the engagement of which she complained.

A number of points have been taken in this appeal. It is said, first of all, in reference to the claim for damages for libel, that there was no evidence of publication; secondly, that the learned Judge was wrong in refusing to rule at the close of the plaintiff's case that there was no evidence of malice. With regard to the breach of the engagement, it was said that the learned Judge was wrong in law in the construction which he put on the contract, that there was no evidence of the alleged collateral agreement; that there was misdirection on the part of the learned Judge on several points; and that the damages were excessive. I think that that exhausts the points that have been taken.

I must deal with each of those points separately, but it is necessary to introduce what I have to say by referring quite shortly to what the lady's case was. Her case was that she was a lady with an established reputation in America, and that in order to increase her reputation she was anxious to come over to Europe and, if possible, obtain an engagement in one of the leading London theatres, because if an American actor or actress can do that and play a part with success, it has a great influence on his or her success in America. She came over therefore with the object of obtaining an engagement for that purpose, and her case was that she was introduced to those who were responsible for the management of Daly's Theatre, which was a theatre specially suitable to her intentions and desires, and that she did obtain a definite engagement at that theatre to play a definite part in a specified play, and that she had made two stipulations before she would enter into that agreement. The salary offered her was £100 a week, a very substantial salary, but less than she had been obtaining in America. She made two stipulations according to her case; one was that the agreement with her must be completed and signed before there was any rehearsal—that she must have a definite engagement before there was even any attempt at a rehearsal; and the second was that she would secure for herself the certainty of the fullest possible publicity in connexion with her engagement by making a special arrangement in reference to the advertising of her name in connexion with the part; and her case was that she made both those stipulations quite definitely as a condition of being willing to enter into this engagement. That was her case as put to the jury. She went on to say that those matters had been agreed to. The formal agreement was signed, and the collateral agreement in reference to the advertisement was carried out to this extent, that there was a preliminary advertisement of the play advertising her name. The rehearsals commenced, she rehearsed, and she gave full satisfaction, and nothing untoward happened until the day of the dress rehearsal, and on the day of the dress rehearsal she was told that she would not be allowed to play the part, and it was suggested that if she was allowed to carry out her engagement and take the part she would be overshadowing the position of another lady and the other lady was not going to allow it. This reason was definitely given to the lady, and regret was expressed by Mr. Paget, who had to convey that message to her. That was the lady's case as presented to the jury. She was not allowed to act.

Then letters were written by her and by the solicitors representing the defendants. It was suggested, first of all, that in the circumstances, the lady was under some duty to the defendants to try to find an engagement elsewhere. That was a misconception. Then when she did not find an engagement elsewhere the defendants said that she was not endeavouring to find any engagement, that she was amusing herself, and not trying to find an engagement. Then the next thing was what gave rise to the claim for libel. When she wrote to say that it was quite a mistake, and that she was doing her best to get an engagement, an answer came, in substance saying: "Well, the reason of your not getting an engagement is because you have not got the reputation that you profess to have and under which you obtained the engagement from us." In substance, that was a letter which conveyed the imputation that the lady had obtained her engagement by misrepresentation. That letter was the foundation of the claim for libel.

The matter went on, and the lady did not obtain an engagement. The run of the play commenced in June, 1926, and she commenced her action in August. In the defence to that action the defendants contended that on the construction of the agreement they were not bound to give her any actual employment in the sense that they were not bound to allow her to play this part or any part, and they suggested that the reason why she was not allowed to play the part was that she was not qualified for it, and they defended the action up to quite a late stage on all these grounds. At a late stage they paid into Court the whole of the amount of the lady's salary at the rate agreed for the full run of the play, so that when the action came to be tried the matter stood in this way, that the defendants were not contending that they were not bound to pay the lady's salary for the full run of the play, but they were contending that there had been no libel, and that she was not entitled to any damages for libel, and that she was not entitled to any damages for what is called, putting it shortly, loss of reputation, or, more properly expressed, and more fully expressed, the loss which followed from not obtaining the publicity that she would have obtained if she had been allowed to act.

I think that is a full summary of the lady's case. Of course the defendants' case on the other side was that so far as the promise which was alleged to be a collateral agreement was concerned, the promise had never been made, and that there was nothing in the nature of a contract.

Then the matter came on for trial. I will deal first of all with the question of this libel. It was said in regard to the libel that there was no publication. I need not go into that because on the authorities, I think Mr. Neilson agreed that, at any rate so far as this Court is concerned, this Court would be bound to hold that there was sufficient publication of the libel to found an action for damages for a libel. But he made a strong point that there was no evidence of malice, which was a necessary part of the plaintiff's case, the occasion being privileged. It was said that at the end of the plaintiff's case, the issue of malice being on the plaintiff, there was no evidence of malice. The learned Judge was at that stage asked to rule upon that point, and the defendants say that he ought to have ruled, and that if he had ruled at that stage of the case the plaintiff would have failed on that part of the case, and there would have been an end of it. That particular matter has been before the Court on several occasions, and it has been contended on several occasions that the Judge, when he is asked at the end of the plaintiff's case to rule that there is no evidence in support of that case, is bound to rule at that stage. The answer has been, and I desire to repeat it now, that under the present practice, the Judge has a discretion in the matter; he may rule at that stage or he may not do so. What is often done now is that he says: "I shall not rule until the whole of the evidence has been called." The defendant then has to elect whether he will refrain from calling evidence and stand on his point that there is no sufficient case proved by the plaintiff, or call evidence, and if he does the latter he runs a risk of supplementing the plaintiff's evidence, and giving some evidence which the jury may accept.

Now, Mr. Neilson has truly said that in this case that particular course placed the defendants in a great difficulty as there were two causes of action before the Court, one for libel and the other for breach of contract, because although, if the case were merely confined to the libel, he would have elected to call no evidence, he was obliged to call evidence in order to meet the alleged case of breach of contract. That may be a matter for the Judge to take into consideration when he exercises his discretion, but, in my opinion, it is no ground on which we can say that, in what the learned Judge has done, he has done something that he had no right to do. I think, however, that there was on the plaintiff's own evidence sufficient evidence for a jury to find that in this particular case the letter was written maliciously, and for this reason. The letter suggests that the lady obtained this engagement by misrepresentation, and according to the lady's evidence, Mr. Paget, who signed the letter, told her when she was informed that she could not perform the part that he was extremely sorry that she could not be engaged, and he gave her a reason which was perfectly inconsistent with the suggestion that she had misrepresented what her reputation was. On that ground, therefore, I think on the plaintiff's own evidence, if it were necessary to decide the case on that footing, the case was one which the learned Judge ought to have left to the jury, even if he had ruled at the stage at which he was asked to rule. That disposes of the case in regard to libel.

Now with regard to the other part of the case, so much has been said about these theatrical contracts and implied terms, and the circumstances under which the Court will imply certain terms, that I should like to emphasize what seems to me to be a very clear distinction between two classes of employment. Whether you use the word "engage," or whether you use the word "employ," seems to me to be quite immaterial. There is one class of case in which you may engage or employ a person in a certain well known capacity, if I may use that expression, and in that class of case there may be no implication that although you engage or employ a person in that capacity you will actually give him work to do. Take the ordinary case of domestic service. It is ridiculous to suggest that if you employ a domestic servant, a butler, a cook, or a housemaid, or anybody else, there is an implication that you will give him or her work to do, and what some of the jury may consider sufficient work, and that the domestic may have a cause of action against his or her employer because the employer does not provide enough work to do. That seems ridiculous on the face of it. In the same way with regard to a doctor or a solicitor, you may engage them not for a particular illness, or a particular piece of work, but you may engage or employ them for a certain period. Again it is ridiculous to suggest that if you engage a doctor for a year you are bound to be ill, or that if you are ill you are bound to remain ill in order to give him something to do. The thing is absurd on the face of it, and you can multiply instances of that class of engagement or employment. It is the engagement or employment of a person in a particular capacity. One may give another instance which is conveniently referred to under the well-known expression "retainer." You may retain a person, that is to say, you may have a call on his services, which does not necessarily mean that you will call upon them, but it gives you a right to his services if you desire to utilize them. That is one class of case, and you may multiply instances innumerable in which there can be no implication that you will provide employment for the person.

But there is quite a different class of case altogether, and that is the class of case where there is an implication. You employ a person to do a particular thing—it may be manual work. During the argument I gave the instance of employing a man to clean windows. In my opinion, if I employ a man to clean windows for good consideration and when he comes to my house I say "I will not allow you to do it," I may commit a breach of my contract with him, but the measure of damages in such a case is confined merely to the amount which I should have had to pay him if he had done the work. That particular set of circumstances gives rise to the question what is the proper measure of damages. A definite engagement to do a particular piece of work applies just as much to the engagement of an actor or actress to play a particular part as it does to an engagement or employment of a man to do a particular piece of work. It seems to me that no question of implication arises on the face of the employment. It is expressly to do a particular thing, and if you choose to allow the person to do the particular thing you are not committing a breach of your agreement.

Now, in this case, this lady was in this position The manager engaged her as an artiste to play the part of Lolotte in the play called Yvonne from the date June 1, 1926. Nothing can be more express, and nothing can be more definite, and, in my opinion, in the absence of some custom which could be read into this agreement as explaining the language used, the Court has nothing to do except to put the obvious meaning upon very plain language. There is no question of implication that arises; the matter, in my opinion, begins and ends there, and in the events which have happened there was a breach of that agreement. It is said that the lady was told that she was not to play because she was not suited to the part. That may have raised a question which does not arise here, because on the verdict of the jury we must assume that they accepted her statement of the reason why she was not allowed to play, and that it had nothing at all to do with her capacity. Then it is said that the engagement was an engagement to play at such times and at such theatres in the West-End of London as the manager from time to time should direct. It is quite true that the management had a discretion in that matter, and that it was open to them to say what the theatre should be, or what the time should be, but that is not what happened. What happened was that they said to her: "You are not to play at any theatre, or at any time," and there was, therefore, a distinct refusal to carry out the obvious and plain terms of the arrangement to rehearse and play this particular part in this particular play.

The question arises, What would be the measure of damages for the breach of that contract? With that we have not to deal in this particular case. It may be that if there were nothing else in the case but the express terms of this written contract, it may be—I express no opinion about it as it is not necessary—that the measure of damages would be the amount of the salary which she would have earned if she had been allowed to play. But the lady's case is: "You must not only consider the written agreement, but you must consider the circumstances under which it was made," and you must consider what was the collateral agreement which is of importance in reference to this question. On that I should just like to refer to a case to which our attention has not been called, but which is referred to in Mr. Justice McCardie's judgment in Turpin v. Victoria Palace, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 548; [1918] 2 K.B., 539), in which there was a question not only of collateral agreement, but of theatrical usage, and the possibility of the introduction of custom or usage in the construction of a contract. That is the case of Newman v. A. and S. Gatti (24 The Times L.R., 18). That was a case where there was an engagement of a lady to play the part of an understudy to a particular named actress, and during the run of the piece the principal lady was unable to play and the understudy then claimed the right under her engagement to play the part. The management refused to allow it. In that case the head-note is: "By a written contract the defendants, who were the managers of a theatre, engaged the plaintiff, who was an actress, for the run of a certain play at the theatre to understudy the principal actress at a certain salary, and the plaintiff agreed not to appear at any place of public entertainment elsewhere during her engagement without the defendants' consent. During the run of the piece the principal actress left the theatre, and the plaintiff claimed the right to play the part, which the defendants refused. In an action to recover damages for breach of the contract, evidence was given on behalf of the defendants that an understudy was not entitled as of right to play the principal's part if the latter was absent. Held, upon this evidence and upon the true construction of the contract, that no right was conferred on the plaintiff to play the part, the contract merely imposing on the plaintiff the obligation of playing the part if called upon by the managers to do so."

In that case there was evidence of the theatrical usage or custom in the matter. In giving judgment, Lord Justice Vaughan Williams said (24 The Times L.R., at p. 20) that "in his opinion judgment must be entered for the defendants. It was said that there was a collateral contract, and that the question whether there was or was not such a contract was a question for the jury." The collateral contract was that they had promised the lady that she should play the part if the principal lady was not able to do so. "He entirely agreed that that would be so, if there was any evidence of such a contract. In his opinion there was no evidence of any such contract. Sometimes one had a collateral contract, the consideration for which was the entering into the principal contract, as, for instance, when one party said that he would not enter into the contract unless the other party made a collateral contract with him. Another case was where, after the contract had been drawn up, it was seen by one of the parties that the contract did not deal with a particular case which might arise, and the parties agreed to provide for that event. No principle of law would prevent the parties from making such a collateral contract, unless the written contract as drawn up was intended to bind the parties to a complete contract embracing all the terms agreed upon. One had first to see if the contract as entered into was intended to be a complete record of the bargain between the parties. Sometimes, indeed, a statute required a contract to be in writing, and in such a case the whole contract must be in writing. In the case of Lindley v. Lacey (17 C.B.N.S., 578), Chief Justice Erle dealt with the first of the instances which he (the Lord Justice) had given above, and Mr. Justice Byles dealt with the second. In the present case, in his opinion, there was no evidence whatever of any collateral contract either of the first or of the second kind. That being so, they had to construe the written contract. They had to see what the word 'understudy' meant. Upon the face of it it was a term which was used in the theatrical profession, and required explanation. Explanation was given in the evidence at the trial, and all the evidence was one way. It was a word which in the ordinary usage of the stage did not cover the right of the understudy to play the part of the principal actor or actress, his or her obligation and right being simply to be ready to do so if called upon by the management, and there was no right conferred upon the understudy to play the part of the principal in cases where the latter happened to be absent. The plaintiff was under the obligation to play the part if called upon, but she had no right to do so. It was the duty of the learned Judge to construe the contract. It was said that the contract, when properly construed, meant that the plaintiff had a right as understudy to play the part in the absence of Miss May, and in the event of Miss May's going away and it being necessary for another actress to play the part. He (the Lord Justice) did not agree. In his opinion the contract meant that the plaintiff should understudy the part which Miss May was to play. The only reason why he was inclined to think the parties used the words they did, and did not specify the particular part, was because the part which Miss May was going to play was not definitely known. That being so, he did not think that the learned Judge ought to have put to the jury either the question as to the construction of the contract—namely, whether the engagement gave the plaintiff the right to claim the part—or the question whether the defendants undertook that it should." Then he says: "Once the meaning of the word 'understudy' was made clear the construction of the contract was for the Court; and when they construed it it became plain that the right which the plaintiff claimed in the action—namely, to play the part if Miss May was absent, was in no way referred to or contained in the contract. He felt sorry for the plaintiff in this sense that probably she anticipated that, during the run of the piece, she would be allowed to play the part when Miss May was away. Such a clause as that was not introduced into the contract, and the plaintiff could only have succeeded here if she had been able to establish a collateral contract." So upon the evidence, and in view of the language of the contract in that case, it was said that the lady had not the right which she claimed.

Now in this case the lady made it quite plain to the jury, and they accepted her evidence, that she only entered into this contract on the condition that the defendants would comply with her request with regard to publicity, and the jury were asked the question: "Did the defendants agree, in consideration of the plaintiff entering into this agreement, to advertise her in a prominent position?" The answer was "Yes."

So it must be taken that the jury found in the lady's favour that there was this collateral contract, and in my opinion it was the kind of contract which, if established, was admissible in evidence upon the ground upon which collateral and parol contracts are admissible in evidence where the principal contract is admissible. Then with regard to this contract, it is said first of all that it was not an agreement, and the point was made that the learned Judge misdirected the jury on the question whether it was something short of an agreement. As I have pointed out, I do not think that that was an argument which sounded very well on the part of the defendants, but, be that as it may, I am quite satisfied that there was no misdirection on this point by the learned Judge. I do not think there was any misdirection by the learned Judge at all, and I think on several points he put the case more favourably for the defendants than certainly I should feel inclined to do.

But now, to come back to this collateral contract, how far does that affect the question of damages? In my opinion, having regard to the authorities—I do not propose to go through them—it is now, at any rate, sufficiently established that in a case of an employment such as this, of an actor or actress, whose reputation depends on the successful exhibition of their art to the public, where, at any rate, the engagement is accompanied by loss, as is here proved, of publicity, the measure of damages, in such circumstances, includes a right to such damages as the jury may award for what has been called the loss of publicity, or the loss of reputation. I do not propose to go through the authorities, as they have been referred to at length. I think they do establish the proposition that in this class of employment where there is proved, in addition to the mere engagement to play a particular part, some contract which would insure a widespread publicity, and a full opportunity of obtaining the advantages which would follow from a successful performance, the law does recognize as the proper measure of damages whatever a jury may award for this loss of publicity.

That brings me to consider the only point about which I have been troubled, and that is the amount which the lady was awarded—namely, £3,000. It is a very large sum, and, in substance, it is doubling her salary. As I say, it is a very large sum, and what has troubled me principally is to satisfy myself that these damages do not represent, from the jury's point of view, punitive damages, damages which they awarded to punish the defendants because they thought the defendants had not behaved well to the lady. Now, of course, if I were satisfied of that, it would be my duty to say that this verdict could not stand because it is part of the duty of this Court, not to interfere with the jury's function in reference to the amount of damages, but to interfere if the Court thinks that the jury, in fixing the amount, have taken into consideration matters which were not proper matters for their consideration, having regard to the issue which they had to deal with. It is quite plain in this case that, although the jury might have awarded punitive damages in respect of the libel, which they did not do, they had no right to award punitive damages in respect to this loss of reputation, or loss of publicity, which is a mere question of assessing the amount of damages, the money loss which the jury might properly think this lady had sustained by reason of this loss of publicity. The question resolves itself into this: Was there before the jury material on which they could properly arrive at so large a sum based merely on this ground of loss of money by reason of the loss of publicity? What is said is this: that eliminating all other matters, eliminating all matters of prejudice, all matters on which the jury may have felt incensed by the conduct of the defendants, what is left is this, that this lady with an established reputation behind her had been, up to the date of the trial, which was in March of this year, that is to say, for, at any rate, three months after the expiration of her contract, and for the whole time of the run of the play, unable to find any suitable engagement in this country. That, according to her evidence, was the test, and that is also an admission by those representing the defendants that the events which happened would undoubtedly prejudice the lady seriously in obtaining suitable engagements. If one is once satisfied that those were materials properly before the jury it is impossible to say that they were not entitled to estimate for themselves the length of time for which this disability in their view might last, and this disability might be total, or it might be partial, in the sense that although she might obtain an engagement it would not be at the same salary. Having regard to the large salary which the lady commanded, although the figures are undoubtedly large, it does not seem to me possible to say that they are so large that the jury must necessarily have taken into account matters which were not proper for their consideration on this particular issue.

On these grounds—and I have to deal with the matter fully, as the case has been so fully argued before us, and no doubt it is a matter of importance—I think that this appeal fails, and that no objection at all can be raised to the summing up of the learned Judge. The only point on which I need comment is that in dealing with the contract he might have put the case higher, and dealt with it, not as a case where any implication was necessary, but as a case in which the contract spoke for itself as an express contract.

I think on all grounds the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin.—I agree. On the question of the libel, as to the objection raised by the defendants, that there was no evidence of malice, the manager of the theatre who wrote the letter said this. I am reading a passage from the evidence merely to point out what the witness said. It is quite clear that the letter means that the representations which the plaintiff had made were not true. He says: "(Q.) You told me: 'Quite sure plaintiff had made no false representations'?—(A.) As far as I know: 'I had no means of proving it': I had no means at all of proving it. (Q.) You had no reason for supposing that she had?—(A.) No. (Q.) If, as you have told me, that letter means that she had made representations which were not true, then the statement was not true, was it, that she had made them?—(A.) No. (Mr. Justice Horridge).—'The statement that she had made representations would, so far as I know, be untrue.'"

It appears to me that there was ample evidence to go to the jury that the defendants' servant who published the letter in fact published the letter, though on a privileged occasion, without an honest belief that the statements made in it were true, and if that is so that appears to me to afford ample evidence of malice, and in this respect I am inclined to think the learned Judge's direction on the question of malice was not sufficiently favourable to the plaintiff. There being ample evidence of malice, and there being no misdirection of which the defendants can complain in that respect the verdict as to libel plainly stands.

The other question is a question which is, no doubt, of great importance to persons who enter into contracts in the theatrical profession, and it is the question whether or not an artiste who is employed to play a part in a particular play is entitled to recover damages beyond the mere loss of the salary to which he or she is entitled under the contract. That has been the subject of discussion now for a period of a good many years, and it appears to me that it is quite plain that there is a distinction to be drawn between different contracts of employment. In the case of Turner v. Sawdon and Co. (17 The Times L.R., 645; [1901] 2 K.B., 653) the contract was a contract by which certain employers engaged and employed the plaintiff as a representative salesman in their business, and he complained that he had suffered damage because he was not allowed to act as representative salesman, and he claimed damages beyond the salary to which he was entitled, having been wrongfully dismissed. The Court held in that case that in such a contract as that there was no promise by the employer to give the servant the particular class of work mentioned in the contract, or any work, and that all that the employer did was to engage the person to join his staff as a servant, without any obligation to give him work. Such a case was analogous to the ordinary case where a domestic servant is employed, in which case it obviously would be contrary to the intention of the parties that a master should be deemed to be under a promise that the servant should continually be kept on that class of work to which the engagement relates. That is a well-defined class of contract of employment. In that case Lord Justice Stirling pointed out quite plainly that there was another class of contract of employment under which a person might properly give a servant a particular class of work and for breach of which damages beyond the salary might, in the proper circumstances, be recovered. Now there is a series of cases dealing with theatrical engagements, and I think, for myself, that time will not be wasted in going through the cases by way of indicating that the position has, to my mind, been made quite clear that, if you can find a promise to give work in the theatrical profession, then damages may be recovered beyond the ordinary measure of damages. The first case is Fechter v. Montgomery (33 Beav., 22), a well known case which did, in fact, raise the question of damages. In that case, the plaintiff, the manager of a London theatre, engaged the defendant, a provincial actor desirous of appearing on the London stage, for two years. Though there was nothing expressed on the subject, the Court inferred an engagement on the part of the plaintiff to employ the defendant not to perform elsewhere. The plaintiff having (in the circumstances) delayed the defendant's appearance for five months, the defendant broke his engagement, and went to another theatre. It was held that he had a right so to do, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to an interlocutory injunction to prevent his performing there. In that case, the defendant having expressed a wish that the engagement should be in writing, Mr. Barnett, the plaintiff's stage-manager, wrote to the defendant as follows: "July 28, 1862. Dear Montgomery,—I am directed by Mr. Fechter to offer you an engagement at the Lyceum Theatre for two years, commencing January 1, 1863, at a salary of £7 per week for the first and £10 per week for the second year; it being thoroughly understood that no advantage will be taken of the confidence you have reposed in Mr. Fechter." The learned Judge held that, by reason of the correspondence and conversation that had taken place before the contract was entered into, the contract went further than the written contract itself, and he said that in his opinion it was an agreement entered into by Mr. Fechter to employ Mr. Montgomery during a reasonable time to act at the theatre, and that there was an agreement on the other side that Mr. Montgomery should not perform elsewhere. What happened in that case was that some months went by, Mr. Montgomery was not given a part, and he thereupon engaged himself to play at another theatre. Mr. Fechter, the plaintiff in the case, sought an injunction (against Mr. Montgomery) to restrain him from playing at the other theatre. The defence was: No, you have broken your contract in a material respect, and, therefore, you cannot get an injunction. Sir John Romilly held that that was so, and that there was a breach of contract to give Mr. Montgomery a part, and that, therefore, as there was that breach he was entitled to withdraw from the contract in regard to acting elsewhere.

The next case in this respect is Grimston v. Cuningham (10 The Times L.R., 81; [1894] 1 Q.B., 125). That is a case which appears to me to be of some value in this connexion. It is a case in which the late Mr. Kendal Grimston (professionally known as Kendal) was proceeding on an American tour, and made an arrangement with the defendant, Mr. Cuningham, the actor. The terms of the agreement were: "I hereby agree to engage with Mr. W. H. Kendal to act as a member of his company on tour in the provinces of Great Britain and Ireland for a period of two weeks, or longer if required, prior to American tour commencing on or about September 4, 1893, at a weekly salary of £6, and to receive full salary for all matinées and usual railway fares. A fortnight's rehearsal to be given prior to commencement of tour. And furthermore, I agree to engage with Mr. W. H. Kendal to act and to understudy as a member of his company, on tour in the United States of America and Canada, for a period of twenty-five weeks, or longer if required, but not to exceed forty weeks, commencing on or about October 9, 1893, at a weekly salary of £10."

The parties proceeded to America, and Mr. Kendal proceeded to produce the play The Second Mrs. Tanqueray. The defendant, Mr. Cuningham, was not given a part in it—he was only understudying one of the parts, and he made up his mind that he was not going to get any part at all, and thereupon he threw up his engagement, returned to London, and engaged himself at some other theatre. Mr. Kendal Grimston sought an injunction against him, and obtained it, and the reason why he obtained it was not that there was no obligation to give Mr. Cuningham a part, but that it was within the discretion of the managers to give him a part within a reasonable time, and that a reasonable time had not elapsed. Mr. Justice Wills, in giving the judgment of the Court, said this (at page 131): "In that case (Fechter v. Montgomery, supra) the plaintiff was bound to give the defendant a reasonable opportunity of acting, and failed to do so. But a manager cannot be expected to give every actor whom he engages a part in every play which may be produced, and generally to attempt to do so would not be for the benefit of the actor. All that the defendant can be entitled to is to have a reasonable opportunity of acting and understudying, having regard to all the circumstances of the case."

I should like to point out that those are two cases where there had been a general engagement of an actor to appear at a theatre without giving him any particular part, and where the Court held that, nevertheless, there was an obligation on the part of the management to give the actor a reasonable opportunity of acting, though it was not a general engagement, the time and circumstances being at the manager's reasonable discretion.

The next case to which I wish to refer is Bunning v. Lyric Theatre, Limited (10 The Times L.R., 583). That was a case where the terms of the contract were very general. It was an agreement between the Lyric Theatre of the one part, and Herbert Bunning, musical director, of the other part, by which it was agreed: "The said Herbert Bunning agrees to act as musical director of the orchestra for London, Brighton, or Crystal Palace, in consideration of the management paying him a weekly salary of £8 commencing on October 1, 1892, this salary to be increased by the management to £10 per week on and after April 1, 1893, and to £12 per week on and after October 1, 1894, and to be continued at that rate until October 1, 1895, thus making the total engagement for three years. . . . The above payments are to be on the usual playhouse rules—namely, that salary is paid only for performances which have actually taken place, and that no salary shall be paid for any part of the time of this agreement during which the theatre is closed, the management having the right to close the theatre at any time they think fit. . . . The said Herbert Bunning undertakes faithfully to perform all duties which fall to the lot of the musical director, such as adapting music, composing small additions, &c., all of which duties are included in the above salary. The said Herbert Bunning having had no experience in conducting a theatre orchestra in England, it is agreed that he shall give his services up to October 1 free of charge in order to enable the management to judge as to his capabilities as a musical director. . . . Name to be announced in Standard and Telegraph, and on bills and programmes."

There had been a complaint because Bunning was not employed as musical director, though his salary had been paid. In giving judgment Mr. Justice Stirling said (10 The Times L.R., at p. 584): "It was expressly stipulated that the plaintiff's name should appear as musical director, and what was intended was that such a state of things should exist that the defendants should be in the position truly to make such an announcement, or, in other words, that they should employ him in that capacity." In that case, as they had not employed him in that capacity, the learned Judge granted an injunction, though the salary was in fact paid. In those circumstances it appears to me plain that there is a current of legal authority to the effect that, where the management has, in fact, engaged themselves that a person shall play a part, that is a substantial part of the contract and a term which has to be fulfilled. Lastly, it has been decided that for breach of such engagement you may recover damages in addition to the salary.

Now the only interruption in the general authority, so far as I see, on this point, is the judgment of Mr. Justice McCardie in the case of Turpin v. Victoria Palace, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 548; [1918] 2 K.B., 539). There the lady, Mrs. Turpin, had entered into a contract in the form of the standard contract at the time, which I think has since been altered, but in what respects I do not know. It is somewhat unfortunate that the report of the case, both in the Law Reports and in The Times Law Reports does not set out the material words of the engagement, but it would appear that the plaintiff was engaged to perform at the Victoria Palace at two performances every evening for the period stated in the agreement, and there was in the contract a provision by which the plaintiff was required to send to the defendants particulars of all matters for programmes, billing, and advertisements, and the words of all songs to be used during the engagement, and that there was power given to the management to prohibit any part of the performance which they considered unsuitable or displeasing to the audience, and to require a copy of songs to be forwarded for approval two weeks before being sung. The learned Judge, in a long judgment in which he considered that case, says (at p. 547): "It is essential to inquire whether the present contract imposes on the defendants any obligation to allow the plaintiff to appear at their music-hall on the dates fixed by the agreement"; and he came to the conclusion that it did not, and I am bound to say that unless there is some special provision in the contract which does not appear in the report, as at present advised, I should not be disposed to agree with that decision, because I should have thought that if a person is engaged to appear in a company at a theatre, without naming any part, or any particular time, he is entitled to have a reasonable opportunity to perform, and I should have thought that it was an a fortiori case where he was a person who was engaged to perform at a music-hall for a definite fortnight, and at no other time. My own view would be that such a contract would have no meaning to the artiste unless that artiste had the right to perform subject to the performance being in other respects in conformity with the contract.

My Lord has referred to the interesting case of Newman v. A. and S. Gatti (24 The Times L.R., 18), where the engagement was of a lady to act as understudy to a named lady in a new play. In that case there was no doubt that the contract had been performed by allowing the lady to understudy. She had understudied the named lady, and the only question was as to the meaning of the contract—whether an engagement to understudy gave the understudy the right to play the part when the principal was not present at the theatre—that was held to be a matter for explanation by theatrical usage, and the Court came to the conclusion that upon the evidence, which they said was all one way, there was no such right in the understudy.

Therefore, the only question that we have to determine here seems to me to be whether this case comes within the class of cases with which I have just been dealing, where the management had, in fact, agreed that the artiste should play a part. It appears to me, on the wording of the agreement, that nothing could be plainer than the express words that the management in this case promised to the artiste that she should play the named part at a particular time, subject to the management fixing the time for rehearsals. I will refer to the words once more. It is "an agreement made between George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited (hereinafter called the manager), of the one part and Miss Fay Marbé, of the Savoy Hotel, Strand, W.C.2 (hereinafter called the artiste), of the other part, whereby it is agreed as follows: (1) The manager engages the artiste to rehearse and play the part of Lolotte in the play called Yvonne from the date of the first rehearsal hereinafter stated at such times and at such theatres in the West End of London as the manager shall from time to time direct, and the artiste accepts the said engagement upon the terms and conditions herein appearing. (2) The said engagement shall be (a) for the period of rehearsal hereinafter mentioned and the run of the play. Then it provides: "The period of rehearsal shall commence on June 2, 1926, or not later than one week thereafter and shall end on a date to be determined by the manager." Then it further provides that the engagement shall commence on June 12, 1926. There is a slight inaccuracy in that. What is meant is that the salary will commence then, because the artiste is engaged to rehearse on the terms of the standard contract, which are that artistes who receive a salary of more than a certain amount have to rehearse without any reward, whereas artistes who are remunerated at a lower rate are paid for rehearsals. That appears to me to be a quite definite promise on the part of the management that the artiste named shall play that part. They have no right to offer her any other part, and the artiste could have refused to play any other part. On the other hand, if the artiste had been unwilling or unable to play that particular part, then the management would have been—if she had been unwilling—certainly not bound by the contract, and possibly so if she were actually incompetent. As to that I do not decide. The result seems to me to be that on the contract as it stands, quite apart from any collateral matter, there was a plain obligation on the part of the defendants in this case to allow the plaintiff to play the part of Lolette, and that engagement, if it existed, is admitted to have been broken, and if it was broken it appears to me also to follow that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover damages—namely, such damages as would flow, in addition to the salary, from the fact that she was not allowed to play the part. One has the authority of Lord Justice Stirling—Mr. Justice Stirling as he then was—that the result of that would be that she would be entitled to substantial damages. I think there can be no question but that every artiste certainly would consider that he had suffered damage, and probably every management would have to admit it. But in this case the circumstances are similar to those raised in Bunning v. Lyric Theatre, Limited (supra). In this case by a collateral contract it was plainly proved that there was, in fact, an express promise to bill the lady and put her in the programme, and, adopting Mr. Justice Stirling's reasoning, that means that the fact must exist which they promised to advertise—namely, that the lady should play the part, and that she should be advertised to play that part. That again makes it quite plain that there was an obligation that she should play the part.

Now the only other question which arises is that in regard to damages. That was a matter for the jury. I am bound to say that for a time I had some doubt about the damages, and it appears to me that they were very substantial, but, on the other hand, the circumstances in this case seem to indicate that the plaintiff has, in fact, suffered very substantial damage from the breach of this contract. It also is to be remembered that she is an American artiste with a high reputation coming to this country desiring to obtain and maintain a substantial English reputation, and she lost that opportunity. She had an engagement at Daly's Theatre, and the management refused to allow her to play. They admitted that the result of that was disastrous, and I think one is entitled to take into account not merely the loss of the reputation, or an enhanced reputation, that she would have had if the contract had been performed, but the injury caused to her existing reputation by the circumstances of the actual breach, and I think this damage must have been well within the contemplation of the parties, because it was contemplated that she should be advertised up to the time of the play. She was advertised up to the time when the play was produced, and then suddenly and unexpectedly she was not played at all. I think that that factor is one to be taken into account as arising immediately out of the circumstances of the breach.

For those reasons it appears to me that there is no need to say that the damages given by the jury are unreasonable and such as no reasonable man could give, and I see no reason for supposing that the jury, in giving them, took into consideration matters that they ought to have disregarded, or omitted matters that they ought to have considered.

The result is that I think this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree. The solution of the main question on this appeal depends, in my opinion, chiefly, if not entirely, upon the true meaning of the contract between the parties in this case. Many authorities have been cited in which the Court has dealt with the rights of parties under contracts which differ, both in form and in substance, from the contract that we have to consider in the present case. In those circumstances, speaking for myself, I do not find much assistance in construing the contract here.

Now I think it is plain that contracts of employment, speaking broadly, fall under two distinct categories, the first being those contracts in which an employer enters into no greater obligation towards the employee than the payment of his remuneration, and does not engage himself to give the employee active occupation or work. This class of contracts is, perhaps, the more usual. On the other hand, there is the other class of contracts in which the employer engages not only to pay the salary of the person whom he employs, but also to give him the opportunity of actually doing the work for which he engages him. Whether a particular contract falls within the first or the second of these categories depends, in my opinion, entirely upon the express words of the contract, or may depend upon the nature of the employment, or the nature of the remuneration which the employer agrees to give to the person whom he employs.

With these preliminary remarks I turn to the contract in the present case. It is a contract made between the manager of a theatre and an actress to rehearse and play a particular part in a given play. The period of the employment is stated in the contract, and also the commencement of that period. Now it is clear that the contract here is one which provides for an engagement for a period of rehearsal, and for a period of actually acting in the play when produced. The actress accepts that employment, and the manager agrees to pay her a salary of £100 a week from the commencement of the run of the play. In addition to that agreement there is also proved to have been an agreement entered into at the time of the signing of that contract—namely, that the defendants agreed, in consideration of the plaintiff's entering into that agreement, to advertise her in a prominent position. Dealing with the wording of that contract, the first matter to be considered is: What does the word "engage" mean? That is a flexible term, and I think it is not disputed that it is equivalent to the expression "agrees to employ." That may mean simply that the manager agrees to retain the services of the artiste, or it may mean that he agrees to give actual work to be done by the artiste, in other words, afford the artiste an opportunity of acting in accordance with the terms of the agreement. Bearing in mind that this is a contract made with an actress to play a particular part, and bearing in mind that in such a contract the nature of the employment has this element, that it is of importance to the person engaged in his or her profession that such employment should be real, and that he, or she, should be kept in that employment in order to keep herself, or himself, before the public, and bearing further in mind the definite nature of the employment stipulated for between the parties, I have come to the conclusion that the true meaning of the contract is that the defendants agree that the plaintiff shall, if the play is produced, have an opportunity of acting the part of Lolotte in the particular play called Yvonne during the run of the play, and that they shall not be entitled only to call upon the actress to act, or not, according to their will and pleasure. It was strenuously contended, both by Mr. Neilson and by Mr. Croom-Johnson, that the words in the first paragraph of the contract, namely, "at such times and at such theatres in the West End of London as the manager shall from time to time direct" operated to give an option to the manager to say whether he would employ her to act in that part or not, in spite of the play being produced, and the run having commenced, at Daly's Theatre. In my opinion that contention is ill founded. Read in conjunction with the rest of the contract, those words, in my judgment, only mean this, that the manager is to have the direction or control of the times at which, and the theatre at which, the rehearsals are to take place, or the play is to be produced, in accordance with the engagement which he has made to employ her. It involves that he may, in so far as is necessary, direct rehearsals at different theatres. It also may mean that if the production of the play takes place first at one theatre, and then at another, he may direct the theatre at which the actress is to act, and also fix the time of the commencement of the performance. It seems to me that it does not mean that he is at liberty to give a direction that she shall not act at all at any time, or at any place. Such a construction would, in my judgment, be inconsistent with the primary obligation contracted for by the parties that the manager was to employ the actress to rehearse and play the particular part. Now it seems to me that if that is the true construction, then the question is not one of enforcing any implied term in a contract, but of enforcing the express terms of the contract between the parties, and it follows from what I have said that there are two distinct obligations entered into by the manager, the one is to pay the salary, and the other is to afford an opportunity to the actress to play her part. It further follows, in my judgment, that there has been a breach of the one term which is material for the purpose of this appeal, that is, the term to employ the actress in acting the part. There has been no breach of the agreement to pay the salary. There has been, as my Lord has said, an additional breach of the collateral agreement. But whether the breach has been of the primary agreement, or of the collateral agreement, there has been a substantial breach of that term. It follows also from what I have said that the jury were entitled to give damages for that breach.

Now as regards the amount of the damages, I agree that they are very large, but after giving full consideration to all the facts, and after reading and considering the summing-up of the learned Judge in the Court below, I find myself unable to say that they are so large as to justify the Court in coming to the conclusion that the jury arrived at that amount on a wrong basis, or that they are so excessive as to show that the jury were in some way misled by the speeches of counsel.

For those reasons I agree that on the question of the breach of contract this appeal must fail, and be dismissed with costs.

The only remaining point is that of the libel, and on that I agree with what has been said by my Lords. It seems to me that in the circumstances of this case the learned Judge exercised a wise discretion in declining to rule at the close of the plaintiff's case that there was no case to go to the jury. It was a matter of discretion for him, and he decided to hear the evidence on the other side. That evidence having been given, I am clearly of opinion that there was evidence to go to the jury that there was malice in this case, and that the Judge was right in leaving the question of malice to the jury.

In the result the appeal fails on both grounds, and will be dismissed with costs.

K.B. Div. (McCardie, J.) } 1927. July 29.

MESSAGER v. BRITISH BROADCASTING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Copyright — Broadcasting — Opera — Music — Performance in public—"Broadcasting" by wireless telephony—Grant by composer of right to perform—Assignment or licence—Whether grant determinable on death—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), s. 1.

By an agreement dated March 23, 1905, the plaintiff granted to G. E. "the sole and exclusive right of representing or performing" in certain areas a play, of the music of which the plaintiff was the composer.

G. E. died in 1915, and in 1920 his executors assigned to a limited company the benefits of copyrights and other rights previously held by G. E.

In October, 1926, the limited company agreed to permit the defendants to "broadcast" by wireless telephony a performance of the opera. The defendants "broadcast" the opera from their studio, to which the public was not admitted.

Held, that the defendants, in doing so, gave a public performance of the opera within section 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and that, as the agreement of March 23, 1905, was not an assignment by the plaintiff to G. E. of all his performing rights, but was a licence confined to ordinary performances at a theatre, and of such a personal character as to be determinable on the death of G. E., the defendants had acquired no lawful licence to perform the opera in public and were, therefore, liable in damages to the plaintiff for breach of copyright.

This was an action in which M. André Messager, the musical composer, of 103, Rue Jouffroy, Paris, claimed an injunction to restrain the British Broadcasting Company, Limited, from infringing his copyright in the music of the play, The Little Michus, of which he was the composer, and damages for alleged infringement of his copyright.

The defendants denied that M. Messager was the owner of any exclusive right in relation to the performance of the play in public. They admitted broadcasting the play on November 10, 1926, but said that they had the right to do so under a licence which they had acquired.

The Little Michus was produced at Daly's Theatre in 1905 under the following contract between M. Messager, the authors of the play, and the late Mr. George Edwardes :—

Memorandum of Agreement, made this 23rd day of March, One thousand nine hundred and five, between André Messager, Albert Vanloo, and Georges Duval, all of Paris (hereinafter called the "licensors"), of the one part, and George Edwardes, of Daly's Theatre, London (hereinafter called the "licensee"), of the other part. Whereas the said André Messager is composer and the said Albert Vanloo and Georges Duval are the authors of the comic opera in three acts entitled Les Petites Michus (hereinafter called "the play"), which expression shall comprise both words and music), and Whereas the licensors have delivered the play to the licensee together with the full score of the music thereof with a view to its being produced by the licensee at Daly's Theatre and elsewhere on the terms hereinafter mentioned, Now it is hereby agreed as follows :—

1. The licensors hereby grant the licensee the sole and exclusive right of representing or performing the play in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, America, and the British Colonies and Dominions.

2. The copyright in the music of the play shall remain the property of the said André Messager, and he shall be at liberty to use the English lyrics for sale with the music.

3. The play shall be adapted for the English stage at the expense of the licensee.

4. The licensee shall in consideration of the rights hereby granted pay to the licensors the following royalties or fees :—(a) Four per cent. of the gross receipts up to £800 and 6 per cent. of the gross receipts over that amount for London and New York, and half of these amounts for all other towns, with the exception of No. 3, or fit-up, towns, the fees of which are to be one-fourth of London and New York, such fees, in the case of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, to be paid weekly, and, in respect of America and the British Colonies and Dominions, monthly.

5. If the play be not produced in London by the said George Edwardes within three months from this date all rights of representation as aforesaid shall revert to and become again the absolute property of the licensors.

6. The licensee agrees not to interpolate into the score any piece or number not composed by the said André Messager without the said André Messager's permission, but the said André Messager agrees to furnish and compose such alterations and additional numbers required for the English version as the said George Edwardes may reasonably require.

7. The said André Messager shall assist at such rehearsals as may be agreed and shall conduct the orchestra on the occasion of the first production of the play at Daly's Theatre aforesaid.

8. Proper books showing the gross receipts of the theatre or theatres at which the said play shall be represented shall be kept by the licensee, and the licensors or their agent duly authorized in writing shall be entitled at all reasonable times to inspect the said books and all vouchers, accounts, and other documents relating to the said receipts so as to enable the licensors to verify the amount of percentage payable to them as aforesaid.

The defendants pleaded that, by this agreement, M. Messager granted to Mr. Edwardes the sole and exclusive right of performing the play in the United Kingdom, America, and the British Empire, and that in October, 1926, George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, in whom Mr. Edwardes's rights in the play had become vested after his death in 1915 under an agreement between his executors and the company in May, 1920, had licensed them to perform the play.

M. Messager denied that Mr. Edwardes acquired the broadcasting rights by the agreement of March 23, 1905.

The Hon. S. O. Henn Collins, Mr. A. J. Duhamel, and Mr. K. E. Shelley appeared for the plaintiff; Sir Duncan Kerly, K.C., and Mr. Trevor Watson for the defendants.

Mr. Henn Collins submitted that the damages suffered by M. Messager were substantial. The play was written for the stage; it was conceived as a whole to be seen on the stage; its music required most careful rehearsal, and it was inconceivable that the defendants could produce it in any way as Mr. Edwardes did. The agreement of March 23, 1905, was only a licence. The personal element in it was so great as to render the rights under it not assignable. Mr. Edwardes was supreme in producing that class of play. M. Messager was intimately concerned in how The Little Michus was produced, and he chose Mr. Edwardes to produce it because he trusted him to do his best with it. Such agreements, in which personal qualifications were relied on, had been held not to be assignable. Both M. Messager and Mr. Edwardes were jointly interested in the financial success of the play. The agreement was similar to publishing agreements in the sense that the parties were trusting each other personally. He referred to Stevens v. Benning (1 K. and J., 168) and Hole v. Bradbury (12 Ch.D., 886).

Other parts of the agreement obviously referred to stage productions of the play alone. If it were an assignment it was limited to rights to produce the play on the stage.

M. Messager, in evidence, said that The Little Michus was first produced in 1899 in Paris. He did not give any licence to the British Broadcasting Company, Limited, to broadcast the play on November 10, 1926.

He relied on Mr. Edwardes's reputation and skill when he entered into the contract of March 23, 1905. He thought that Daly's Theatre was the best theatre in London for his play.

Mr. William Boosey, managing director of Messrs. Chappell and Co., said that he heard on his own "wireless" receiving set the broadcast performance of The Little Michus on November 10, 1926. The performance lasted from one-and-a-half to two hours, and the play was announced in the programme as being M. Messager's work.

Mr. Shelley.—What effect would that broadcasting have on the value of M. Messager's copyright in the work?—I think that it would have a very damaging effect on his performing rights. The conditions of the performance were such that you could not possibly get a proper idea of the musical value of the work.

The play, explained Mr. Boosey, had obviously been inadequately rehearsed and the performers were not first class.

Sir Duncan Kerly, opening the defence, submitted that M. Messager had parted with the performing rights in his play. When the Copyright Act, 1911, came into operation it created a copyright which extended to cinematograph performances and other mechanical reproductions which probably now included broadcasting or such a performance as was the direct result of broadcasting. In the case of works existing at the time when the Act came into operation copyright was conferred, by section 24 of the Act and the first schedule to it, on the owner of the performing rights in all cases where the performing rights had been separated from the remainder of the copyright. Copyright was, therefore, conferred in the the present case on Mr. George Edwardes and his successors. M. Messager's assignment to Mr. Edwardes of the performing rights in the play was an absolute and out-and-out assignment for all time.

He referred to British Actors Film Company, Limited v. Glover (34 The Times L.R., 162; [1918] 1 K.B., 299); Stevens v. Benning (supra); Taylor v. Neville (38 L.T., 50); Barstow v. Terry ([1924] 2 Ch., 316); and Falcon v. Famous Players Film Company (42 The Times L.R., 666; [1926] 2 K.B., 474).

The agreement between M. Messager and Mr. Edwardes was not personal. The only reason for suggesting that it was—which would have been a great surprise to both parties—was the fact of the decisions on publishers' contracts.

Mr. Justice McCardie.—It would be a serious thing in the theatrical world if contracts of this sort were held to be personal. So far, they have not been treated as personal and incapable of assignment in the absence of particular provision on that point. The evidence given in Taylor v. Neville (supra) showed what the practice had been, and it tallies with my experience at the Bar. In these days, when large sums are spent on productions, a man might spend £15,000 or £20,000 on a play and then die, and, if his rights were not assignable, his executors would be unable to continue the performance of the play.

Mr. Cecil Paget, general manager of George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, said that, if contracts between authors and managers transferring performing rights were not assignable, no theatrical manager would be able to do business.

Mr. Justice McCardie.—What is your view about the effect of broadcasting theatrical productions?—We have had plays broadcast from Daly's Theatre and it has been very successful. Part of Yvonne was broadcast, and so was half-an-hour of The Blue Mazurka. We had crowds of people who heard the broadcasting coming to see the original.

But you selected the most attractive parts to be broadcast?—The most amusing parts.

Would you have cared to broadcast the whole of The Blue Mazurka?—After we had finished with it we should not have minded doing so.

That means that while a play is running you would not care to broadcast the whole of it?—No, I do not think that I should.

It might satisfy curiosity unduly?—It might.

Mr. Henn Collins, in reply, referred to In re Jude's Musical Compositions; Jude v. Reid Brothers, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 461; [1907] 1 Ch., 651). After he had replied on the construction of the contract of March 23, 1905, and the authorities relied on by counsel for the defendants, he pointed out that under the contract M. Messager granted Mr. Edwardes the "sole and exclusive right of representing or performing the play in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, America, and the British Colonies and Dominions." Even if the defendants acquired that right from George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, it must be inferred that their broadcasting was heard outside the area mentioned in the contract—for instance, in France and Germany. Whatever other rights they might have, the defendants were clearly not entitled to perform the play in these countries.

Mr. Trevor Watson said that no evidence had been given that anyone outside the United Kingdom had heard the broadcasting. In any case the place of the performance was in London—and therefore the play was produced in the United Kingdom—and not where a listener heard it. The sole interest and the intention of the defendants were to broadcast the play to their subscribers in this country. Reception abroad was outside their power of control, owing to the limitations of science, and had nothing whatever to do with them.

MR. JUSTICE MCCARDIE.—New inventions may call for the application of new principles of law or the new application of old principles.

SIR DUNCAN KERLY said that it had never been held, and he thought that it never would be held, that the pilot of an aeroplane could be successfully sued for trespass because he flew over a person's field.

MR. JUSTICE MCCARDIE.—That is a moot point, isn't it? It might be a question of degree.

MR. JUSTICE MCCARDIE read the following considered judgment:—This case raises points of novelty and importance on the intricate subject of copyright law. The plaintiff, M. Messager, is a French subject and a distinguished musician. He is the composer of the well-known comic opera called The Little Michus, which was successfully produced at Daly's Theatre in London in the year 1905. He alleges that the defendants, the British Broadcasting Company, infringed his musical copyright in that opera by a wireless performance given by them in November, 1926. Hence his claim for damages. I desire to state at once that the points involved in this action carry no reflection whatever on the good faith or honour of the defendant corporation.

The history of the matter lies within a narrow compass of facts. By a written agreement dated March 23, 1905, the plaintiff and others granted certain rights in the opera The Little Michus to Mr. George Edwardes, the well-known theatrical producer and director. Several vital points in the case turn on the wording of that agreement. I, therefore, set it out in full, for it is not of great length.

[HIS LORDSHIP read the agreement as set out above and continued:—] Such was the agreement under which Mr. Edwardes produced the opera in 1905. I assume that clause 2 refers only to the rights of printing and publishing the music for sale. Mr. Edwardes died in 1915, leaving a will. In May, 1920, his executors assigned in writing to a limited company called George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, "so far as they lawfully could," the benefit of the contracts referred to in the schedules to the deed and the benefit of "all other copyrights, rights of representation, licences, and the rights (if any) to which the vendors were entitled in connexion with the business of the deceased." In the schedule appeared the following: "No. 13, The Little Michus," and other details which I need not now read. In October, 1926, the defendants negotiated with George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, for the right to give a broadcast performance of The Little Michus and, by letters passing between that company and the defendants, George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, agreed to permit a wireless performance by the defendants for £60. The defendants paid the £60 to that company. No step was taken to inform the plaintiff of the intended performance. His assent was never obtained. Pursuant to the permission of George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, the defendants gave a broadcast performance of substantially the whole opera on November 10, 1926. This is the alleged infringement.

I will now take in order the points of law which arise, and with respect to each I will state any further facts which may call for mention. The first question is raised by paragraph 4 of the defence, which reads as follows: "The defendants admit that on November 10, 1926, they caused to be performed at their studio at Savoy-hill the music of the comic opera entitled Les Petites Michus, and that the said performance was transmitted by wireless telephony. Such performance was not public within the meaning of the Copyright Act, 1911." This contention raises a question of complete novelty which rests upon the words of the Copyright Act, 1911. The material words of section 1 are these: "(2) For the purposes of this Act, 'copyright' means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any substantial part thereof in any material form whatsoever, to perform, or in the case of a lecture to deliver, the work or any substantial part thereof in public." If, therefore, the defendants did not on November 10, 1926, give a performance in public, this action fails at once. Now, whether a performance is in public or not must, in my view, depend on the particular circumstances of each case. A purely domestic or private performance will not, as a rule, amount to an infringement of copyright. (See Duck v. Bates (13 Q.B.D., 843).) On the other hand, a performance given in a dancing or social club may upon the facts be "public" within the Copyright Act, 1911, although no charge for admission be made. It must be remembered that members together with their guests may constitute a body of persons who would otherwise pay to hear a performance of the piece at a theatre, concert hall, or the like place of entertainment. (See Harms (Incorporated), Limited v. Martans Club, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 729; [1926] Ch., 870; 43 The Times L.R., 21; [1927] 1 Ch., 526).) To hold otherwise would deprive an author or composer of the protection that he may justly claim. Now so far as I am aware no decision has yet been given within the United Kingdom as to broadcasting by wireless telephony. By section 35 of the Copyright Act, 1911, "performance" is defined as meaning "any acoustic representation of a work and any visual representation of any dramatic action in a work, including such a representation made by means of any mechanical instrument." Although wireless telephony may not be wholly "mechanical" in the narrow sense of that word, yet I think that the Copyright Act, 1911, extends to that which, though perhaps not definitely in the contemplation of those who framed the Act, yet falls substantially within the wide and embracing words employed in the defining clauses. The principle indicated in Gambart v. Ball (14 C.B., N.S., 306) is of assistance. I need not set out the facts in the case, which turn upon the words of early statutes for the protection of artists and engravers. In the course of his judgment (at p. 317) Chief Justice Erle said: "I see no reason why these very wide and general words should not be construed according to their plain and ordinary meaning, and be held to apply to any mode of copying known at that time and to such other modes of multiplying copies as the ingenuity of man may from time to time discover." It is, I think, reasonably clear that a person who gives to a public audience a performance made audible and effective to them by means of a receiving instrument in the place where that public is assembled together may be liable for infringement of copyright. In the case now before me, however, the actual performance of The Little Michus was given in the defendants' private studio at Savoy-hill, London, by the orchestra and performers engaged by the defendants. The public were not admitted to the studio. Officials and a few friends only were present apart from those who rendered the opera. It was by means of electrical instruments that the defendants, by modulating the waves in the ether, were able to affect as they intended to affect a vast number of electrical instruments possessed by members of the public and thereby to render audible to that public the performance given within the walls of the defendants' studio. In my view, however, the defendants, in doing what they did, clearly gave a public performance. Instead of gathering the public into a vast assembly room, they set in motion certain ether waves knowing that millions of receiving instruments in houses and flats were tuned to the waves sent forth, and knowing and intending also that acoustic representation of the opera would thereby be given to an enormous number of listeners. If I did not hold this to be a public performance by the defendants I should fail to recognize the substance and reality of the matter and also the object and intent of the Copyright Act. I have no doubt that the defendants gave a public performance within the principle of Harms (Incorporated), Limited v. Martans Club, Limited (supra). In Australia, I find, it has been expressly held that broadcasting constituted an infringement of copyright. (See Chappell and Co., Limited v. Associated Radio Company of Australia, Limited ([1925] Victoria Law Reports, 350).) The same view has been taken in the United States of America, where the Court, in dealing with the matter, justly said: "Radio broadcasting is intended to, and in fact does, reach a very much larger number of the public at the moment of rendition than any other medium of performance." (See Remick and Co. v. American Automobile Accessories Company (5 Fed. Rep. (2nd series), 411).) I am satisfied that the correct view of the matter has been presented by the learned author of the 6th Edition of Copinger on Copyright at pages 153 to 155. I agree with his lucid observations.

Holding then as I do that the defendants gave a public performance on November 10, 1926, I am, therefore, obliged to consider the second group of questions raised in this action. I need not formulate at length the respective contentions of the parties or analyse in detail the able arguments of counsel on both sides. I can summarize the points at issue in a few words. Briefly put, the defendants contended in substance that the plaintiff, by the agreement of March, 1905, had completely assigned all his performing rights in The Little Michus to Mr. George Edwardes with respect to the areas mentioned, that this assignment was free of all limitation, that it left Mr. Edwardes at liberty to assign or licence as he wished, and that the plaintiff was, therefore, unable to sue in this action for the alleged infringement of copyright by the defendants. Exactly the opposite contentions were raised by Mr. Collins for the plaintiff. In substance he submitted that Mr. Edwardes had only obtained a licence of a limited and not assignable character.

Before I deal with the contentions it is necessary to mention three points. First, no question arises here upon the fact that the plaintiff is a French subject. The points dealt with in Falcon v. Famous Players Film Company, Limited (42 The Times L.R., 666; [1926] 2 K.B., 474) were not again argued. (See also section 29 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and the Orders in Council made thereunder.) Secondly, the agreement between the parties was made six years before the Copyright Act, 1911, was passed. The rights possessed by the plaintiff before that enactment were conferred by the provisions of the Acts of 1833 and 1842. (See Copinger (5th Ed.), pages 12 and 14, and (6th Ed.), page 17.) By the operative effect of section 24 of the Copyright Act, 1911, the plaintiff got the rights substituted by the First Schedule to that Act for such rights as he may have possessed immediately before the passing of the Act. So far as the plaintiff had not parted with them he still had the performing rights in The Little Michus. Thirdly, only the owner of copyright can sue for damages. (See Copinger, 6th Ed., p. 166.) But under subsection 3 of section 5 of the Act of 1911 an assignee under a partial assignment of copyright can sue.

Now, three main questions arise upon the agreement of 1905. The first is this: Was it an assignment or a licence? Such a question often gives rise to difficulty, and at the present time it is made none the less easy of solution by the singular breadth of subsection 2 of section 5 of the Copyright Act, 1911. It is important to remember once more, however, that the agreement now in question was made before and not after the passing of this Act. This should be borne in mind when consideration is given to the somewhat debatable decision of Mr. Justice Lush in British Actors Film Company, Limited v. Glover (34 The Times L.R., 162; [1918] 1 K.B., 299), where the agreement in question was made in 1917. Some of the tests which indicate the distinction between an assignment and a licence are mentioned in Copinger on Copyright (6th Ed.), at pages 113, 114, 167, and 307. The breadth of the agreement in Falcon v. Famous Players Film Company (supra) and Barstow v. Terry ([1924] 2 Ch., 316) should be observed and should be contrasted with the terms of the document before me. Intention must be the ultimate test for deciding whether an agreement is an assignment or a licence, and intention is to be gathered from the document itself and the surrounding circumstances. In my view, the document before me is not an assignment but a licence. If made as an assignment nothing could have been easier than to say so. Throughout the document the words "licensors" and "licensee" are expressly used. There is no mention of the executors or the assigns of Mr. George Edwardes. Express duties are cast upon the licensee; express obligations of a continuing nature are thrown upon him as to royalties and fees. There is no payment of a gross sum and there is no indication of a sale of rights. (See per Mr. Justice Fry in Hole v. Bradbury, 12 Ch.D., 886.) The whole wording of the agreement is framed on the lines of a licence in particular terms and not on the lines of an assignment. If the document in Taylor v. Neville (38 L.T., 50) did not amount to an assignment, as was held by the Court of Appeal, still less is the document before me an assignment. I hold that the document before me is a licence only.

The second question is this: To what extent did the licence to Mr. George Edwardes go? In my opinion, it was a strictly limited licence. It was confined to theatrical representations of the ordinary character at theatres and no other places. It gave no other rights to Mr. George Edwardes. Just as the agreement in In re Jude's Musical Compositions (23 The Times L.R., 461; [1907] 1 Ch., 651) was held by the Court of Appeal to give only "the sole and exclusive right of printing and publishing the compositions in question in a particular form" (see per Lord Alverstone at p. 659, citing Lucas v. Cooke, 13 Ch.D., 872), so here the agreement only gave to Mr. George Edwardes the right of performing The Little Michus at particular places, namely, theatres. Practically every clause of the agreement points to performances at a theatre and a theatre only. Clauses 4 and 8 point in the clearest manner to performances to be given at a theatre at which proper books are kept so as to enable the plaintiff to secure his just percentage of the box-office receipts. If, as the defendants contended, the document granted to Mr. Edwardes the right within the specified areas to perform The Little Michus as he wished and when he wished, and wholly or in part as he wished, then it would follow that he could perform any part of the opera in a public park, a seaside shelter, or any village concert hall, or even, if he pleased, by means of a street band or a negro troupe. This cannot be so, and I think that it is reasonably clear that all that was granted to Mr. Edwardes was the right to perform the opera as a play and at theatres under normal conditions and so as to fulfil the requirements in particular of clauses 4 and 8. It follows, therefore, that apart from the next point, Mr. George Edwardes, if living in November, 1926, would have had no right to authorize or licence a wireless performance by the defendants.

Thirdly, there is, however, a third and still more serious question, namely, whether or not the agreement of March 23, 1905, ended with the death of Mr. George Edwardes in 1915. That the licence was irrevocable during the life of that gentleman, provided that he observed the terms of the agreement, is, of course, clear. (See Hurst v. Picture Theatres, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 642 ; [1915] 1 K.B., 1).) The point in this last cited case is, of course, wholly distinct from the point now before me, namely, whether the agreement was personal to Mr. Edwardes or whether his rights under it were assignable. It is, of course, obvious that a contract by an artist to paint a picture, or by an author to write a book, is terminated by death. (See the cases cited on such points in Leake on Contracts, 7th Ed., pp. 874-5.) Contracts which import direct consideration of personal skill and confidence are not assignable, but end with death. This rule has been applied by the Courts in several directions. It has, for example, been held that an agreement by a publisher to publish a book is personal to him and cannot in the absence of express provision be assigned. Striking illustrations of this are to be found in Stevens v. Benning (1 K. and J., 168) and Hole v. Bradbury (supra) per Mr. Justice Fry. Still more striking is the decision of Mr. Justice Stirling in Griffith v. Tower Publishing Company, Limited (13 The Times L.R., 9 ; [1897] 1 Ch., 21), where he held that the principle of Stevens v. Benning (supra) and Hole v. Bradbury (supra), which established that a publishing agreement between author and publisher is personal to the individuals entering into it, and that the benefit of such an agreement is not assignable without the author's consent, applies equally to the case of a similar agreement between an author and a limited company of publishers. Mr. Justice Stirling there says (13 The Times L.R., at p. 10 ; [1897] 1 Ch., at p. 24) : "An author may have confidence in a limited company as well as in an individual publisher. A limited company may have a reputation for producing books in good style and attractive form." Such being the decisions, can I draw any sound distinction between the case of a publisher and the case of a theatrical producer ? In my view no distinction exists. The work of the latter is even more personal than that of the former. It requires an even larger measure of personal experience and instinct, knowledge and skill. Personal qualifications and particular technical experience are essential for successful theatrical production. Mr. George Edwardes was a man of unusual gifts. He held a high and almost unique position in the world of theatrical production. His reputation was world-wide. I have no doubt that M. Messager relied, as he stated in his evidence, on the personal reputation, skill, and ability of Mr. George Edwardes when making his agreement with that gentleman in 1905. The wording of the agreement itself points clearly to the personal character of the respective obligations. There is, as I have already pointed out, no reference whatever to the executors or assigns of Mr. George Edwardes. The first production was to be by Mr. Edwardes alone. (See Clause 5.) Under clause 6 the plaintiff was to furnish such additional numbers as Mr. Edwardes himself might require. The whole agreement is, I think, personal on both sides. That the agreement required the personal first production by Mr. Edwardes is, as I have said, clear, and I think that Mr. Collins is right in his submission that the agreement must be regarded as one and indivisible. I must, therefore, hold that this agreement, resting as it did upon obvious personal considerations, ended with the death of Mr. George Edwardes, and that the benefits of that agreement could not be assigned by the executors of that gentleman. It follows, therefore, that the purported transfer of the benefits of the agreement from the executors to George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, in May, 1920, was of no effect, and that the executors were well advised in their cautious wording of the deed. It also follows, therefore, that George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre), Limited, had no power to grant a licence to the defendants in November, 1926, for a wireless performance of The Little Michus.

In reaching the above conclusion I do not overlook the evidence of Mr. Paget for the defendants—namely, that licences such as that now in question have been generally regarded by the theatrical world as assignable. Nor do I overlook the passage on page 131 of the recent and excellent treatise by Mr. Sidney Isaacs on "The Law of Theatres, Music Halls, and Cinemas." The distinction, however, must never be forgotten between licences which are independent of personal consideration and those which, as in the present case, directly involve such consideration. The case of Taylor v. Neville (supra), so far as it touches the present point, must be deemed to turn on special facts and particular evidence and must, moreover, always be weighed in the light of later decisions.

The result of what I have said is that the defendants gave their wireless performance in November, 1926, without lawful licence, and thereby infringed the performing rights in The Little Michus which were vested in the plaintiff. I need not, therefore, consider the most interesting further point submitted by Mr. Collins for the plaintiff—namely, that the defendants in any event committed an infringement by giving a public performance abroad by means of their wireless apparatus here acting in unison with the receiving instruments of persons on the Continent and thus outside the regions specified in the agreement of March, 1905.

There remains the question of damages. In such a case as the present the amount of damages is at large. The defendants, as I have said, acted in perfect good faith. Good faith, however, does not relieve them of liability to compensate the plaintiff. The injury done to a composer by a wireless performance will vary with the circumstances. If the whole of a current and popular opera be given by "wireless," much hurt may be inflicted, inasmuch as the curiosity and interest of many thousands of persons may be thereby diminished or satisfied. If a part only of a current and popular opera be given, then the wireless performance, if good, may awaken or stimulate the desire to see and hear the whole of the piece at the theatre where it is running. In the present case the presentation of The Little Michus at Daly's Theatre ceased more than 20 years ago, although it has from time to time been played at minor theatres in the suburbs or provinces. It is true that substantially the whole opera was given by the defendants and that it was heard by several million people, but I doubt, however, whether, apart from the point to which I next refer, the mere performance inflicted any real injury to the value of the plaintiff's performing rights. It was stated, however, by Mr. Boosey, a man of wide experience, in his evidence for the plaintiff, that the performance in November, 1926, by the defendants was not a good one. Substantially, he said that the defendants' performance had a damaging effect on the plaintiff's rights because the conditions of the performance were such that the full musical value and quality of the plaintiff's work could not be presented to those who listened to the performance. He added that not only was the performance not good, but that the rehearsal had obviously been inadequate. In his view, moreover, the wireless performance by the defendants was the worst possible advertisement that a musical play could have. No evidence was led by the defendants in contradiction to that given by Mr. Boosey. I cannot, however, help feeling that Mr. Boosey does not favour wireless performances of music at all. I am bound to state for my own part that I regard broadcasting, taken as a whole, as an enormous and indeed incalculable advantage to the nation. I must weigh the evidence for myself, and I must not forget that those who heard The Little Michus in November, 1926, were aware of the disadvantages which may surround a wireless performance, and were also aware of the cast by which and the conditions under which the performance was given. Taking all the relevant considerations into mind, I have come to the conclusion that I should award the sum of £150 as damages to the plaintiff. There must be judgment in the plaintiff's favour for £150 damages, with costs.

Divorce—Restitution of conjugal rights—Order against husband—Non-compliance—Application by wife for order to secure periodical payments—Reversionary interests of husband—Immediate order to secure—Whether competent—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 187.

Where a husband refuses to comply with an order for the restitution of conjugal rights, and the wife applies for an order on the husband to secure periodical payments to her for their joint lives, the Court has no power to order the husband to secure a part of his reversionary interests, unless and until it comes into possession or he sells them.

This was an appeal by a husband from a Registrar's order. The Registrar directed the husband, who had refused to comply with an order for the restitution of conjugal rights, to secure to his wife for their joint lives £120 per annum plus one-third of the income to be received by him from his reversionary interests under a will.

Mr. Noel Middleton and Mr. Harold R. Barker appeared for the wife, the petitioner; Mr. H. B. Durley Grazebrook for the husband.

Mr. Justice Hill, in his considered judgment, said that the wife obtained a decree of restitution of conjugal rights on January 24, 1927. She petitioned the Court for an order on the husband to secure during the joint lives of her husband and herself such periodical payments for the maintenance of herself and her children and for the education of the children as seemed just.

The Registrar ordered that the husband should secure to the wife during the joint lives £120 per annum, less tax, payable monthly, plus one-third of the income to be received by him from his reversionary interests under the will of his late father.

Both parties were dissatisfied with the order as to the amount, but the husband further contended (1) that, having regard to a settlement made on May 21, 1924, the petitioner was precluded from asking for any sum for maintenance beyond the income agreed under the settlement; (2) that the Registrar had no power to direct the husband to secure to the petitioner during the joint lives one-third of the income from the reversionary interests.

Those two contentions raised points of principle. As to the first, the settlement, which was made in contemplation of a resumption of cohabitation, provided that the income of the trust fund should be paid to the wife during her life,

"such income to be expended by the wife so long as she and the settlor shall continue to reside together in or towards the joint upkeep of their establishment, and for pin money and dress allowance of the wife but should the settlor and the wife hereafter live apart, the wife shall be entitled to receive and use such income in or towards the maintenance of herself and her child or children, as the case may be."

Then followed provisions about what was to be done after the death of the wife. He could not read into the settlement an agreement by the wife to limit her claim to maintenance to the income of the trust fund. He rejected the husband's contention on that point.

The second contention raised a more difficult question—namely, whether, in proceedings in respect of disobedience to a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, there was power to order an immediate dealing with the reversionary interests of the husband by making him secure to the wife a part of that reversionary interest. Section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, empowered the Court to make an order for alimony on a decree of restitution of conjugal rights. Section 187, the relevant section, empowered the Court to order the husband to secure to the wife periodical payments, and section 196 gave power to vary those payments. But the periodical payment must first be fixed before an order could be made to secure it. That was inconsistent with a power to order the immediate securing of prospective periodical payments which were uncertain in amount and which might hereafter be ordered.

His Lordship cited a passage from the judgment of Sir Samuel Evans in Tangye v. Tangye (30 The Times L.R., 649; [1914] P., 201), which was decided on section 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, now section 187 of the Act of 1925, and said that he thought that Sir Samuel Evans meant that the order for securing payment could not be made until the reversionary interest came into possession or was sold, and that it could then be made in conjunction with an increase in the periodical payments. That accorded in principle with the difference which the Court had always considered to exist between decrees putting an end to the marriage and decrees which did not put an end to the marriage. A decree for restitution of conjugal rights must always be made on the assumption that it would some day be obeyed, and the arrangements made were properly tentative and alterable from time to time; whereas, when a marriage was finally declared null or was dissolved, it was more natural that some permanent arrangement should be made.

The result was in the present case that the order for periodical payments was properly made, but the direction that the husband should now secure any proportion of his reversionary interests must be omitted.

His Lordship referred back to the Registrar the questions of the annual payment to be made to the wife and of the provision for the children. The question of costs would be reserved.

On the application of Mr. Grazebrook, leave was given to appeal.

SALISBURY AND FORDINGBRIDGE DISTRICT DRAINAGE BOARD v. SOUTHERN TANNING COMPANY (1920), LIMITED.*

Land Drainage—Statutory body—Power to remove obstruction—No finding of justices—Trespass—Prescription—Right of action—Land Drainage Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict., c. 133), ss. 16 to 20, 33.

The plaintiffs were a statutory body of drainage commissioners, and the defendants were the owners of a mill with a tumbling bay or weir adjoining it. The defendants, as the plaintiffs alleged (and as the jury found to a lesser extent) raised the weir to a greater height than they were entitled to, with the result that adjoining meadows were flooded. The plaintiffs pulled down the alleged enhancement, and the defendants replaced it. In an action by the plaintiffs for an injunction to restrain the defendants from enhancing the weir, the defendants counterclaimed for trespass.

Held, (1) that the plaintiffs not having obtained a finding of two justices as required by s. 18 of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, were not entitled to remove the alleged enhancement and the defendants were entitled to succeed on the counterclaim; (2) that the plaintiffs had no proprietary rights entitling them to sue; (3) that in the absence of any valid order made by them under s. 33 of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, the plaintiffs had no right of action in respect of obstruction of their statutory duties. Quære, if they had made an order under s. 33 whether they would still have had to comply with the procedure laid down by ss. 16 to 20 of the same Act.

This was the further consideration of an action tried before Mr. Justice Salter and a special jury at Winchester Assizes.

The facts appear from the judgment.

Mr. Holman Gregory, K.C., and Mr. A. H. Armstrong appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. E. H. C. Wethered for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Salter.—This action raises a question of some importance with regard to the right of drainage boards and commissioners of sewers to bring actions in respect of alleged obstructions to the drainage within their districts. The action was heard before me, with a Special Jury, at the last Winchester Assizes. The defence, among other things, alleged that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action by the plaintiffs against the defendants. It was agreed that the wiser plan would be to reserve that question, to assume for the moment that there was a cause of action, and to try with the aid of a jury the issues of fact which were raised by the pleadings. The complaint made was, in substance, that the defendants, who are the owners and occupiers of a water mill on the River Avon at Downton, in order to obtain the maximum of power for their wheels, kept their mill-pond at a greater depth than that at which they were entitled to keep it, and they thereby caused the irrigation meadows, the water meadows immediately above the mill-pond, to become to some extent, and in the lower parts, waterlogged, because the irrigation of these meadows was rendered less efficient by reason of the height at which the water was kept in the mill-pond; and it was said that the defendants had caused this improper height of the water in the mill-pond by maintaining the weir, which, together with the hatches, regulated the height of the water in the mill-pond, at too great a height. There was opposite this weir, upon an old brick wall on the other side of the river, an old mark, obviously an old water-mark, and there was at the mill another mark—namely, a peg driven into the wall near the point at which the water entered the mill to turn the wheels. The contention of the plaintiffs was that the defendants were not entitled to keep the water above the old water-mark—that is, of course, so far as the flow of water was under their control; that they were not entitled by means of the height of their weir, or by manipulation of their hatches, to keep the water at a greater height than that mark. The defendants, on the other hand, said that the mark by which they were entitled to regulate the height of the water in the mill-pond was the peg to which I have referred, and there was a great difference between the heights of the old mark and of the peg. In the result the jury found that the defendants had acquired by prescription by constant user for 20 years a right to have the water in their mill-pond at a height which was greater than that shown by the mark, but less than that indicated by the peg: that is to say, they found that the defendants had exceeded their rights, but that their rights were greater than the plaintiffs claimed that they were. The questions which were put to the jury and answered by them, questions which were shown to counsel and approved by them before I summed up, were four in number. "(1). Was the present depth of water (i.e., up to the peg, 118ft. 8 2/5th inches above ordnance datum) actually enjoyed by the defendants and their predecessors as of right without interruption from 1905 to 1925 ? "—those were the 20 years before action brought. Answer : "No." "(2) Was any depth of water greater than is shown by the bench mark "—that is the old mark to which I have referred —" (118ft. and a quarter of an inch above ordnance datum) actually enjoyed by the defendants and their predecessors as of right without interruption from 1905 to 1925 ? " Answer : "Yes." "If Yes, what depth ? " Answer : "118ft. 2¼in. ; 4in. above the masonry crest." Those are two ways of answering the question and of indicating the height of water to which, in the opinion of the jury, the defendants had a prescriptive right to dam the river. Then : "(3) Is the present depth of water injurious to the drainage of the meadows above the weir ? " Answer : "Yes." "(4) Did the defendants at some time between 1922 and 1924 increase the height of the weir ? " Answer: "Yes." That question, I think, was put because of a conflict of evidence upon that point, but for the present purposes I think that the first three questions and answers are material. The result is that whereas the defendants claimed that they were entitled to a depth up to 118ft. 8 2/5in. above ordnance datum, the plaintiffs alleged that all that they were entitled to was 118ft. ¼in. above ordnance datum ; the jury found that they were entitled to a height of 118ft. 2¼in.—that is to say, 2¼in. more than the plaintiffs said, and some 6in. or thereabouts lower than the defendants claimed. That was the verdict of the jury on the issues of fact raised on the pleadings.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question now arises whether the plaintiffs have, or whether they proved in this case, a right to bring this action against the defendants, whether they showed as against the defendants a cause of action for any part of the relief claimed. The plaintiffs are a Drainage Board, a corporate body constituted by the Salisbury and Fordingbridge Drainage Order of 1923, under the Land Drainage Acts, 1861 and 1918, and this mill, the mill-pond and the river at this point, are within the plaintiffs' drainage district. The defendants, as I have said, are the owners and occupiers of the mill ; they are not using it for its ancient purposes of a corn mill, but they are using it to provide electric light for their tannery and other industrial purposes.

Now the statement of claim alleges in paragraph 3 : "In or about or shortly prior to the month of February, 1923, or alternatively at some date unknown to the plaintiffs but between that month and the month of April, 1925, the defendants without just cause or excuse unlawfully raised or enhanced the crest or head of the said tumbling bay or weir 5/16 inches by adding or fixing thereto on the top thereof cement and concrete and/or a plank and posts (hereinafter called the enhancement) and thereby increased the said tumbling bay or weir and unlawfully obstructed the said river and created a nuisance therein." Then the statement of claim goes on to say that by a certain letter and by a subsequent written notice the plaintiffs had called upon the defendants to remove or pull down the enhancement, that the defendants did not do so, and thereupon the plaintiffs entered upon the land of the defendants and themselves removed the enhancement, that the defendants restored it, that the plaintiffs again removed it, and that the defendants again restored it. Then it is alleged in paragraph 7 : "The enhancement holds back the water in the said river and causes and will cause the same to percolate through the banks thereof and to flood the water meadows adjacent thereto and causes and/or will cause 'washouts' or 'blowouts' in the banks and overtopping of the banks by water from the said river and will interfere with the duty of the plaintiffs effectively to drain and will prevent them from draining their said district and will put them to additional expense therein and will reduce the rateable value of their said district whereby the plaintiffs have suffered and will suffer loss and damage." The relief claimed was: "An injunction to restrain the defendants their servants or agents from erecting or re-erecting any planks posts timbers enhancement or obstruction upon or of or on the crest or head of the said tumbling bay or weir on the north side of land adjoining Wild Weir Hatches situate on the west side of the River Avon near Downton Mill in the county of Wilts within the jurisdiction of the plaintiffs." Secondly : "An injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering by their agent or agents with the due performance and carrying out by the plaintiffs of their duties as such Drainage Board at the said tumbling bay or weir." Then thirdly : "A mandatory injunction upon the defendants to remove or pull down the enhancement of the said weir so as to reduce the same to a level of 117.86ft. above ordnance datum," and damages.

Now to that statement of claim the defendants pleaded (but it is not necessary to go into the defence in detail) that there was no cause of action shown, and that the plaintiffs had no legal right to bring this action against them ; they said that no Order under section 33 of the Land Drainage Act of 1861 had been made, or was alleged to have been made, and that without such Order the plaintiffs could not sue ; they further relied upon sections 17 to 21 of the Land Drainage Act of 1861, and said that the effect of reducing the weir would be to impair the water power of the mill, and that the plaintiffs had no right to bring this action, at any rate, until it had been determined by a jury that what they had done was an injury to the drainage of the district. Then they pleaded : "The said tumbling bay or weir had existed from time immemorial or alternatively for 40 years or alternatively for 20 years at the same height, at which height it had been maintained by the defendants and their predecessors in title for keeping up the level of the water for the purposes of their said mill, and the defendants have a right at common law and/or under the Prescription Act, 1832, to the maintenance of the said tumbling bay or weir at such height or in the alternative they have the right to do so until the plaintiffs have obtained a decision under and taken the steps mentioned in sections 17, 18, 19, and 20 of the Land Drainage Act, 1861." They further contended that they were entitled to a judicial determination by the plaintiffs, and that no judicial determination had ever taken place, relying on section 63 of the Act of 1861, and they counterclaimed that the plaintiffs had entered upon their property and had interfered with this weir by pulling away the upper part of it. The reply admitted that no order had been made under section 33 of the Act, and paragraph 3 of the reply is in these terms : "The plaintiffs admit that the said tumbling bay or weir (whereby the level of the water is raised for milling and other purposes of profit as alleged) has existed for 40 years at the least but not at the same height and they further admit for the purposes of this action only that if the same has been maintained at the same height as alleged in paragraph 5 of the amended defence (which is denied) the defendants have the rights claimed by them in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the amended defence and that there was no such judicial determination.

Paragraphs 2 and 3 of the amended claim are repeated," that is to say, that if this height had been maintained from time immemorial or for 40 years or for 20 years, the defendants had the rights claimed by them in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the amended defence. That I understand to be the right to a judicial decision. Now those are the pleadings.

The Land Drainage Act of 1861 under which the plaintiff board exists and is empowered, provides for two methods by which the Board may deal with and cause the removal of that which is in fact an obstruction to the drainage of its district. The first of those powers is by way of actual physical removal, the second is by way of judicial decision and order. The first method, actual removal, as regards mills and matters of that kind, is regulated by sections 16 to 20 of the Act, and those sections give the authority power to remove obstructions to the drainage of their district, but such right is subject to the restrictions which immediately follow section 16, and which form sections 17, 18, 19, and 20. Those sections provide that there is to be no interference with mills or with the damming up of water for milling purposes and profit unless upon the verdict of two justices at petty sessions, and that the authorities must obtain the verdict of two justices first (I am not quoting the exact words of the Act because it is not necessary), that the removal of the alleged obstruction is necessary for the efficient drainage of the district, and next that any damage or injury caused to the millowner by such a removal is of a kind which can be fully compensated in money. Unless a finding can be obtained from the justices upon both those grounds, there is no right to remove the obstruction, and if a finding on both those points can be obtained from the justices, then compensation has to be assessed. When those findings have been obtained, then the amount of compensation must be determined, and then upon payment of that compensation, the authority have a right to remove the obstruction. That is the method provided for its removal. The other method is under section 33. The Commissioners of Sewers have acted for the most part with a jury, but on some matters they were entitled to act without a jury. Section 33 of the Act of 1861 provided : "Commissioners of Sewers, acting within their jurisdiction, may, without the presentment of a jury, make any order in respect of the execution of any work, the levying of any rate, or doing any act which they might but for this section have made with such presentment ; subject to this proviso, that any person aggrieved by any such order made by the Commissioners without the presentment of a jury may appeal therefrom in manner hereinafter mentioned." Whether the Commissioners of Sewers could enforce the removal of an obstruction when the obstruction was a new weir, by making an order under section 33, and whether, if either the miller did not appeal to quarter sessions or quarter sessions upheld the order, they would then be entitled to remove the weir without the proceedings contemplated in sections 17 to 20 as to compensation, it is not necessary to determine ; but this is the second method provided by the Act to enable the Commissioners to carry out their duties and to remove obstructions. Now the plaintiffs in this case intended to proceed under section 33, they intended to make an order under that section, and when they brought this action they were under the impression they had made an order under that section and they so pleaded. Paragraph 5 as it originally stood was as follows : "By an order dated the 12th August, 1925, and duly served on the defendants upon the same day the plaintiffs in exercise of their statutory powers under section 33 of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, in that behalf ordered and directed the defendants within 14 days from the date thereof to remove or pull down the enhancement of the said tumbling bay or weir so as to reduce the same to a level of 117.86ft. above ordnance datum." The action was brought to enforce, as was thought, obedience to an order. Whether if they had made an order an action would have been a proper way of enforcing obedience to it, or the proper way, need not now be considered. In fact they had made no order. The defendants were so advised and applied for a writ of certiorari on two grounds as I remember, because I was a member of the Divisional Court which considered the matter. The grounds were that this was not an order in matter or form, and that in any case it was invalid as an order in that one of the Commissioners who had taken part in making it had an interest in the matter. It is unnecessary to deal further with that matter, because when the matter came before the Divisional Court, it was admitted on behalf of the plaintiffs that this was not an order, and it was agreed that the pleadings should be amended so as to contain an express admission that no order had been made under section 33 or at all, and upon that the Court made no order on the motion for the rule except as to costs, and the pleadings were amended accordingly.

Now upon the pleadings as they stand, I have to consider and I think it will be convenient to consider first the question which is much the shortest and simplest, whether it was a trespass, as alleged in the counterclaim, for the plaintiffs to go, as they did upon more than one occasion, on the lands of the defendants and forcibly to remove a portion of this weir. If the plaintiffs had a right to remove the weir, then of course it was no trespass ; if they had no right it was a trespass, and therefore the question is whether they had a right to remove the weir.

Now that brings me to section 16 of the Act of 1861 : "The powers of Commissioners of Sewers acting within their jurisdiction shall extend to the following acts." Then the section gives them power to cleanse, repair and maintain existing things, to deepen, widen, straighten, or otherwise improve existing things, and, thirdly, to make new things for the purpose of maintaining and improving the drainage of their district. Then there are four provisos, the last of which is : "That the exercise of the foregoing powers shall be subject to the restrictions hereinafter mentioned," those are restrictions (I have already referred to them) which gave to the millowner certain rights because they are restrictions which relate to any "mill-dam, weir, or other like obstruction whereby the level of the water is raised for any milling or other purpose of profit" ; the thing is an obstruction, but it is an obstruction of that particular kind ; they are not entitled to remove or otherwise interfere with any "weir or other like obstruction whereby the level of the water is raised for any milling or other purpose of profit"—that is this case—"so as to injuriously affect the supply of water"—that is this case—"otherwise than with the consent of the owner of such mill-dam, weir, or other like obstruction"—no such consent was obtained—"until the following things have been done," that is to say, the miller has the protection of the finding of the justices.

Now in my opinion the meaning of those sections 16 to 20 is quite clear, when you are dealing with a mill-dam, or weir of this kind, and they give to the authority no power in any way to interfere with any such weir as this except after the intervention and decision of justices as there provided. In my opinion the Act of 1861 gave no power to the plaintiffs to do what they did, that is to say, without conducting any judicial inquiry or obtaining the sanction of any justices to come upon the lands of the defendants and interfere with their property.

Section 60 of the Act provides that the powers given by this Act are "in addition to and not in derogation of any other powers conferred on Commissioners of Sewers by Act of Parliament, law, or custom," and "Commissioners of Sewers may exercise such other powers in the same manner as if this Act had not passed." Therefore, if the plaintiffs who are, and have the powers of, Commissioners of Sewers, could, before the Act of 1861, lawfully have done what they did in this case, it was no trespass for them to do what was done. With regard to that I can only say that I have not found any power under earlier statutes, nor any authority for saying that they had at common law any right to go upon the lands of the defendants and interfere with this property in the circumstances in which they did so. For these reasons I think that it was a trespass, and the counterclaim succeeds ; if I am right, the damages were agreed at £10.

Now I come to a matter which is, I think, more difficult, and that is the right to sue, that is to say, not the right to sue in the abstract, but the right to bring this action against these defendants, that is, whether the statement of claim alleges, and whether the evidence proved, a legal right on the part of the plaintiffs to any part of the relief claimed.

Now it is obviously necessary to look first and see what this action is. Is it to be regarded as an action brought by the plaintiffs in virtue of proprietary rights by them in the meadows and banks alleged to be injured and threatened ? We know that the proprietor of one of these meadows immediately above the weir was to some extent injured by the undue height at which the water was being kept, and might have brought an action against the millers, his neighbours, and have obtained damages, or an injunction or both, and that a 20 years' prescription, if the defendants could have proved it, would have been a good defence as between them and the plaintiff. It would then be shown that his meadow had become servient to the dominant tenement of the mill, and that he could no longer complain of the injury done to his meadow by reason of the fact that the water in the mill-pond was kept at a level to which the millers had become entitled from long user, openly and as of right. Now is this an action brought upon that footing ? Is it an action brought upon the footing that the plaintiffs have and are entitled to exercise rights in respect of these meadows on this mill-pond, which are the same as those which the owner of the injured meadow could exercise, so that unless a prescriptive right to dam the river to this extent can be proved they would have a right to cause the obstruction at the weir to be lowered ; is it an action of that kind, or is it an action brought by a public authority to prevent interference with a dam in the discharge of their public duties, or to enforce the removal of something which is in fact an obstruction to the efficient drainage of their district ? That, it seems to me, would be an action of an entirely different kind, and one has to consider, first, which of those two kinds of action it is. Now it seems to me quite clear upon the pleadings that this was intended to be and is an action of the former kind, and it was so conducted and so fought for some four days ; it is an action complaining of injury to the meadows above and to the banks which separate the water from those meadows. It was said that the water was kept to such a height as to interfere with the drainage of the meadows, and that the banks which kept it from flooding the meadows were being injured, and the water was making its way over the meadows, and the defence raised was prescription. Now it appears to me that if this were an action to prevent an interference with the plaintiffs in the discharge of their public duties, or an action to enforce the removal of something which was obstructing the general drainage of the district, any question of prescription would be perfectly immaterial. It is true that there is an allegation here that the water had been kept to this depth from time immemorial. The jury did not so find and were not so asked to find. This is an old mill, no doubt a very old mill ; it used to belong to the Bishops of Winchester, and it doubtless has been there for centuries, but that is not the point. The point is whether the maintenance of the water at this depth has been maintained for 20 years, 40 years, or from time immemorial. No attempt was made to show that it had been so maintained for 40 years, and certainly no attempt was made to show that it had been so maintained from time immemorial ; indeed, the evidence all went to show that, if any right had accrued to keep it at the full height which the defendants claimed, it was a user for not more than 20 years, or very little more than 20 years, and the dispute before the jury turned on whether or not a 20 years' prescription was made out. With regard to the existence of the obstruction complained of in this case, the weir, from time immemorial, I do not profess completely to understand the principle of the decision in the case of the Monmouth Weir, which is reported in Callis, Third Edition, page 310 ; there the Commissioners having taken all proper proceedings to remove the weir, or some such obstruction which was in the River Severn in their district, it was held that they had no right to remove it because the mill was an ancient mill which had existed from time immemorial. I will suppose that that means that the things complained of had existed from time immemorial. I do not myself understand on what principle that would deprive the plaintiffs of their statutory right, or relieve them from their statutory duty of removing a thing which was in fact an obstruction to the drainage of their district, but it is not necessary to go further into that, because here there was no suggestion at all that this obstruction, the weir as complained of, and the depth of water resulting, were things which had existed from time immemorial. They had existed not very much more than, if so long as, 20 years. Prescription was pleaded, it was the defence relied upon ; 20 years' prescription was the matter fought before the jury, and, moreover, it was admitted in the reply : "That if the same has been maintained at the same height as alleged in paragraph 5 of the amended defence (which is denied)," that is to say, maintained for more than 20 years, "the defendants have the right claimed by them in paragraphs 5 and 6," that is, a right to succeed in this action ; so it is admitted on the pleadings that 20 years' prescription, if made out, is a good defence to this action.

Now that seems to me to show quite clearly that this is an action upon the footing that the plaintiffs are entitled to exercise the same rights as the rights of adjoining riparian proprietors, otherwise 20 years' prescription could not be any defence against them. Moreover, the evidence was entirely the evidence which is always brought in cases between adjoining riparian proprietors where prescription is set up, evidence of old inhabitants and persons who have known the place for many years, evidence of continuous user, evidence of interruption, and evidence of objection made, and so forth. Now dealing with the action as an action of that kind (I am going to deal with it afterwards as an action of the other kind), but supposing that I ought to treat it as being an action based upon proprietary right, have the plaintiffs any proprietary right to support such an action, have they any such right in or vesting of the meadows which have been injured or in the bed of the stream, or in the banks which keep the water from flooding on to the meadows, have they any such vesting or proprietary rights in those things as would entitle them to bring this action? Now in the case of Duke of Newcastle and Others v. Clark (8 Taunton, 602), the Commissioners of Sewers were seeking to bring trespass in respect of their own works, things which they had themselves made, and paid for. It was held that they had no right to sue, and this decision resulted, I should think not unnaturally, in section 47 of the Sewers Act of 1833. That section declares that the property in certain lands, tenements, hereditaments, buildings, erections, works, and so forth shall be vested in the Commissioners of Sewers. Now the meaning of that section came before the Court of Appeal in Stracey v. Nelson (12 M. and W., 535), and that Court, perhaps (if one may presume to say so) slightly straining the actual wording of the section in order to give effect to the obvious intention of Parliament, decided that the meaning of that section was that it vested in the Commissioners of Sewers their own works and their own property and no more. In the case of Crossman v. Bristol and South Wales Union Railway Company (11 W.R., 981), there was a pebble beach in the River Severn which was under the jurisdiction of Commissioners of Sewers, which was an extremely valuable beach as a protection against the sea, and as a protection to navigation, and the Commissioners had always refused all applications to remove any part of it. An application was made to them by the defendant railway company to remove some of it, and was refused; thereupon the railway company took it away without leave, and the Commissioners brought an action, and obtained an interim injunction. What relief exactly was claimed does not, I think, appear from the report, and there is nothing to show what became of the case; the Court was only concerned with an interim injunction; it was a very strong and special case indeed, and in those circumstances, Stracey v. Nelson (supra) not apparently having been quoted, an interim injunction was granted.

In the case of Nesbitt v. Mablethorpe Urban District Council ([1917] 2 K.B., 568), before Mr. Justice Bailhache, and ([1918] 2 K.B., 1), in the Court of Appeal, the Courts followed Stracey v. Nelson (supra) in construing the meaning of this section 47. I have no doubt at all in this state of the authorities that I ought to follow Stracey v. Nelson (supra) and Nesbitt v. Mablethorpe Urban District Council (supra), and to hold that this section does not vest this weir, or these banks, or the body of the stream, or these meadows, or any part of them, in the plaintiffs, so as to give them any proprietary rights, and it is to be observed that the statement of claim does not allege any vesting in the plaintiffs of any of those things, or that the plaintiffs have any property in any of those things. Therefore, if this is to be treated, as I think it must be treated in its form and on the evidence, as an action based upon proprietary right, I think that no cause of action was alleged or proved.

Now I will consider the matter upon the footing that this case can be treated as a case in which the plaintiffs are alleging a cause of action apart from any right of property. It is said that they have a right to sue given to them by section 16 of the Act of 1861. The side note is: "Declaration of powers of Commissioners"—"The powers of Commissioners of Sewers acting within their jurisdiction shall extend to the following acts: (1) To cleansing, repairing or otherwise maintaining in a due state of efficiency, any existing watercourse," and so forth. "(2) To deepening, widening, straightening, or otherwise improving any existing watercourse or outfall for water, or removing mill-dams, weirs, or other obstructions to watercourses, or outfalls for water, or raising, widening, or otherwise altering any existing wall or other defence against water," and so forth. "(3) To making any new watercourse or new outfall for water, or erecting any new defence against water, to erecting any machinery," and so forth. Now in my opinion that is a section which is confined to works; it is confined to acts which they may do to keep in good order, to improve and to add to existing physical things which may be in their districts; it is not in my opinion a section which confers any right to bring actions which was not in existence before; and in the next place I think that even if it does give a right to bring an action, it gives that right subject, so far as a mill dam and works are concerned, to sections 17, 18, 19, and 20, and that if it gives any right to sue to enforce the removal of a mill dam it only gives that right after the steps contemplated in sections 17 to 20 have been duly taken. If that section does not give a right to bring an action, was there any right existing before that Act? If there was, then the plaintiffs may enjoy it. Now with regard to that, I think that the absence of precedents of actions, I will not say of this kind, but of actions such as this case might have been if the pleadings had been differently drawn, and the evidence differently directed, the absence of all such cases is very strong to show that there did not exist in the Commissioners of Sewers a right to bring an action of this kind to enforce, without any previous steps, the removal of an alleged obstruction to the drainage of the district. In Duke of Newcastle v. Clark (supra), which was an exceedingly strong case and a decision which had to be corrected by legislation, Mr. Justice Burrough said: "My Lord Chief Justice has truly observed that, as there has been no instance of such an action, it is a strong presumption, under the circumstances of this case, that no such action could be maintained." There is the decision of Vice-Chancellor Wood in the case of Crossman v. Bristol and South Wales Union Railway Company (supra), but upon all the authorities I think that that is not a decision on which I ought to found my judgment in this case. I can find no reported case which can fairly be said to be an action brought by Commissioners of Sewers without any previous proceedings to enforce the removal of an obstruction to the drainage of their district. The Commissioners or Justices are a Court of Record, they are armed with ample powers for the removal of obstructions, and for the discharge of all their duties, and I do not think that it was intended that they should bring actions, I will not say in a case like this, but in a case such as this might have been.

With regard to the highways cases to which it has been suggested there is an analogy, I think there is no analogy ; in the case of highways there is a statutory vesting of the highway itself in the highway authority, and, moreover, the obstruction of the highway is a public nuisance. I do not find in these pleadings any allegation of a public nuisance, and certainly I think there is no evidence to support such an allegation. The case of Bagshaw v. Buxton Local Board of Health (1 Ch.D., 220) is certainly a remarkable case. That action was brought before the statutory vesting of highways. The judgment was given after such statutory vesting ; it was a most exceptional case. The Master of the Rolls was dealing with an equitable remedy, and all that he said was that in the circumstances of that case he would not interfere to restrain a public authority from removing a thing which he found to be a nuisance. There is nothing in that case, or in any of the highway cases, to alter the view which I have taken on this matter.

Then there is the gas case, London County Council v. South Metropolitan Gas Company (20 The Times L.R., 83 ; [1904] 1 Ch., 76), where there was a series of statutes which authorized the predecessors of the London County Council to make a daily inspection at the office of the South Metropolitan Gas Company ; it had been customary to make those inspections on the six working days of the week, and not on Sundays. The London County Council claimed that they had a right, and therefore a duty, to make the inspections seven days in the week. The defendants differed from that reading, and refused to admit the inspectors on Sundays, and thereupon the London County Council brought an action ; it was held that they were entitled to do so ; they brought an action for a declaration as to the meaning of the statute. That was a case in which they were being obstructed in the exercise of their public duties, and, further, it was a case in which it was necessary to obtain the decision of the Court somehow or other as to the meaning of the statute. In this case there is no allegation and there is no proof of any obstruction by the defendants of the plaintiffs in the exercise of their public duties. The only thing that the plaintiffs did was to trespass on the premises of the defendants and to resist that trespass was no obstruction of them in the discharge of their duties, nor does any question with regard to that arise for the decision of the Court as to the meaning of the statute. I think therefore there is nothing in that case.

In this case no declaration is claimed, and there is no allegation, as I say, of interference with the plaintiffs in the discharge of their duties. Therefore, I come to this conclusion : That if this had been an action in which the plaintiffs ought to have alleged and proved that this was a public nuisance, I do not think that they alleged it, and certainly they did not prove it ; if it had been an action in which they ought to have alleged and proved that this was an obstruction to the general drainage of their district, I do not think they alleged that, and they certainly did not prove it ; but if this had been an action of that kind, and if the thing in question had not been a mill dam, I do not propose to express an opinion, although I doubt very much whether such an action could be brought, except after proceedings under sections 16 to 20, or section 33 ; but this is a mill dam, and, therefore, I will not express any opinion as to what the rights of the parties might have been if it had not been a mill dam, but, as it is a mill dam, I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs if they had alleged and could have proved the matters to which I refer, a public nuisance or obstruction to the general drainage of the district, would not have been entitled to bring an action for an injunction except after proceedings under sections 16 to 20, or section 33. As I said just now, I should think it would be very arguable whether they could succeed under section 33 in the case of a mill dam without giving the defendants the rights which are given by sections 16 to 20, but it is unnecessary to consider that. On this part of the case, as to the right of a drainage board to sue without any previous steps for the removal of something which was said to be an obstruction to the drainage of their district, I will refer to the observations of Lord Justice Romer in Devonport Corporation v. Tozer (19 The Times L.R., 257 ; [1903] 1 Ch., 759, at p. 764). The plaintiffs were a municipal corporation and the defendants were erecting certain houses at Devonport, which the plaintiffs said infringed the by-laws, and they sued, and they claimed an injunction and declaration that they were entitled to pull down and remove the work ; the by-laws, which were framed under the Public Health Act of 1875 and prescribed a penalty for infringement, to be recovered by summary proceedings, provided that the plaintiffs might remove and pull down the work. It was held that they had in those circumstances no right to sue, and Lord Justice Romer made some general observations to which I wish to refer : "The decision of Mr. Justice Joyce on the question of whether this action would lie without the Attorney-General being a party, appears to me to be a perfectly right decision. It is to be borne in mind that the plaintiffs here have no proprietary rights which are being interfered with by what is being done by the defendants. The plaintiffs, no doubt, have powers conferred upon them to make by-laws, but that alone gives them no special rights over other bodies, or other members of the public, as to initiating proceedings to enforce those by-laws. Such powers as the plaintiffs, the public body, have to enforce by by-laws, must be conferred upon them by special powers given to them by statute, and, in fact, you do find special powers here given ; and, except in so far as special powers are given, they have no inherent right to take proceedings. And I think it is rather to be deprecated that public bodies such as the plaintiffs in this case should be at liberty, without the leave of the Attorney-General, to commence expensive proceedings, such as these, at their own will. The fact that you do find a special power given to a public body, such as the plaintiffs, to initiate proceedings at law, or in equity, in certain special cases, is an additional proof that the Legislature never contemplated that, apart from special legislative permission, they should have a right to take any proceedings they might think fit for the purpose of enforcing the by-laws, apart from the special power conferred upon them by statute." I think that those observations as general observations are very material in this case. The result is that, in my opinion, the plaintiffs have never alleged or proved any cause of action against the defendants for any part of the relief claimed, that the action therefore fails, the counterclaim succeeds, and I must enter judgment in the action for the defendants, and on the counterclaim for the sum of £10.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Atkin, and Lawrence, L.JJ.) 1927. July 26.

CONTINENTAL CONTRACTORS, LIMITED v. MEDWAY OIL AND STORAGE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Practice—Costs—Taxation—Claim and counterclaim—Dismissal of both, with costs—Apportionment of costs.

Where in an action there are both a claim and a counterclaim arising out of the same contract, and, except with regard to the amount of the respective damages, all the substantial contentions on either side are common to both claim and counterclaim and judgment is given for the defendant, with costs, on the claim, and for the plaintiff, with costs, on the counterclaim, the costs of the litigation must be apportioned between the parties, and it is for the Taxing Master in his discretion to say what in his opinion is a fair apportionment as between the plaintiff and the defendant.

Christie v. Platt ([1921] 2 K.B., 17) approved and followed.

Wilson v. Walters ([1926] 1 K.B., 511) dissented from.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice MacKinnon. The question raised was with regard to the taxation of costs in an action where there were both a claim and a counterclaim, and where an order was made giving the defendants the costs of the claim and the plaintiffs the costs of the counterclaim.

It was an action by sellers against buyers claiming damages for repudiating a contract to take delivery of a large quantity of oil. The amount claimed was £62,000. The plaintiffs alleged that the original contract time for delivery had been extended at the request of the buyers because the tanks of the latter were not ready to take all the oil. The defendants denied that any extension of time had been asked for or given, and they counterclaimed £46,000 damages, asserting that breaches of contract on the part of the plaintiffs justified them in putting an end to the contract. The defendants raised on their counterclaim substantially the same matters that they had alleged as a defence, and the plaintiffs raised in defence to the counterclaim substantially the same matters as they alleged in reply to the defence, and all the substantial contentions on either side were common to both claim and counterclaim.

The Judge who tried the action dismissed both claim and counterclaim, and gave the costs of the claim to the defendants and the costs of the counterclaim to the plaintiffs.

On taxation, the Taxing Master held that the costs of certain issues were attributable to the claim and those of other issues were attributable to the counterclaim and taxed the costs accordingly. On appeal, Mr. Justice MacKinnon ordered re-taxation, as he differed from the Taxing Master with regard to the issues which were attributable to the claim and those which were attributable to the counterclaim. From this order an appeal was brought to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Cyril Atkinson, K.C., and Mr. Roland Burrows appeared for the appellants; and Mr. van den Berg for the respondents.

* Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This appeal from an order of Mr. Justice MacKinnon raises the much debated question how the costs should be taxed in cases where orders have been made for payment of the costs of the claim by one of the parties to the action and of the counterclaim by the other party. The question in the present case does not really turn on what the rule in such cases is, but as the authorities on the point have been cited and discussed, I will express my opinion on the question quite shortly.

In his judgment in the recent case of Wilson v. Walters ([1926] 1 K.B., 511) Lord Justice Scrutton refers with approval to the judgment of Lord Justice O'Connor in the Irish case of James Crean and Son, Limited v. M'Millan ([1922] 2 I.R., 105). There is in that judgment much which is instructive, though I am not prepared to accept all that the Lord Justice says. There is, however, one passage in his judgment and one in the judgment of Lord Justice Andrews, with both of which I cordially agree. The first passage is where Lord Justice O'Connor in criticizing Mr. Justice Fry's view in Saner v. Bilton (11 Ch.D., 416), that the principle on which a taxation should proceed is rested on expediency, says that he prefers to speak of it as resting on justice. The other passage is where Lord Justice Andrews, in referring to the case of Christie v. Platt ([1921] 2 K.B., 17), says that that case only illustrates the absurdity of trying to lay down any one rule which must govern all cases.

The perusal of the judgments in James Crean and Son, Limited v. M'Millan (supra) as well as other judgments in which all the decisions on this particular question of taxation have been reviewed drives me to the conclusion that the path leading to justice is obscured by the number of these decisions, and the variety of judicial opinions on the point, and that a clear way to arriving at the desired result will be found by concentrating on the view expressed by Lord Justice Atkin in Christie v. Platt (supra), namely, that what the Master has to ascertain is what costs have in truth and fact been incurred by the one party and by the other to whom costs have been awarded.

This cannot, in my opinion, be ascertained by any rigid application of a principle or a formula applicable to all cases. Each case must be separately examined and all the circumstances involved in the fighting of the issues must be examined as well as the mere issues themselves. As an illustration, I will refer to a case that was put during the arguments in the case of Hilliard v. Dugon (unreported, Court of Appeal, June 18, 1926). It was said, take the case of a collision between two motor vehicles. Both drivers were injured, the one only slightly, the other very seriously—the respective insurance companies had taken the matter up and each had instructed its solicitors to take proceedings. The solicitors for the insurance company interested in the case of the driver only slightly injured were the first to commence proceedings, and the less injured driver consequently became plaintiff in the action. Both claim and counterclaim were dismissed with costs. In support of so much of the plaintiff's claim as related to the extent of his personal injuries it would have been necessary to call only his own medical man, a general practitioner, but in view of the very serious nature of the counterclaim it was essential to be provided with the opinion of specialists of position and standing. As these gentlemen had to be present at the trial they were called as witnesses for the plaintiff in support of his case and the services of his own medical man were dispensed with. On taxation no attention ought, in my opinion, to be given to the fact that one of the two parties happened to be plaintiff, nor ought the fees of these specialists, if justice is to be done, to be treated as solely occasioned by the claim or solely occasioned by the counterclaim, but a fair adjustment should be made which, if I was acting as Taxing Master, would be by treating a small portion of the costs of these witnesses, or possibly of one of them, as costs of the claim and a substantial portion as costs of the counterclaim. This view is, I think, in accordance, not only with the decision in Christie v. Platt (supra), but with the unreported case of Hilliard v. Dugon (supra), both of which were cases in this Court, and which, therefore, we must follow.

There is, in my opinion, in the decision of Wilson v. Walters ([1926] 1 K.B., 511), having regard to the facts of that case, nothing which is inconsistent with the above-mentioned decisions in this Court, but if in the judgments there are passages which appear to be inconsistent with the decision in Christie v. Platt (supra), it is the latter decision which must prevail.

I pass now to consider what is the real difficulty in the present case, namely, to arrive at what, for the purposes of a just taxation, were the issues in the present case. For this purpose, as I shall indicate later, it does not appear to me that the question what from the pleading point of view were the issues in the action, is an infallible guide to what costs should be allowed. The substance of the main claim in the action by sellers against buyers was for damages for repudiating a contract to take delivery of a large quantity of oil within the original contract time, that time having been extended at the request of the buyers because their tanks were not sufficiently completed to take the oil. The subsidiary claim was for breach of an agreement to take from the plaintiffs all the oil that the defendants required. By their defence, the defendants denied that any extension of time had been asked for or given and they counterclaimed for damages, asserting that breaches of contract on the part of the plaintiffs justified their putting an end to the contract. By their reply the plaintiffs, for the first time in their pleadings, set up as a justification for the non-fulfilment of their contract the alleged failure to provide tankage accommodation. They also, in the amended reply, for the first time, set up as an answer to the defendants' counterclaim a failure on the part of the defendants to give the guarantee required by the contract.

The action was tried by Mr. Justice MacKinnon. He dismissed both the claim and the counterclaim with costs.

As he explained when the matter was brought before him on a later occasion, he dismissed the counterclaim, not because the defendants had been in any default in carrying out the terms of their contract, but because they had suffered no damage, having been enabled to supply themselves with oil at a less price than the contract price. Whether in these circumstances judgment should have been entered for the plaintiffs on the counterclaim is not now in question. The order of the learned Judge dismissing the counterclaim with costs, though challenged both in this Court and in the House of Lords, was not seriously criticized in either place and it stands and must be accepted as a direction as to how the costs are to be taxed.

Both before the learned Judge and in this Court the matter has been treated as one in which four issues, or points of controversy, were raised: (1) Whether there was an agreement to extend the time for the delivery of the oil; (2) whether the tanks of the defendants were ready to receive the oil at the contract dates of delivery; (3) the questions which were involved in regard to the giving of the guarantee; and (4) the question of the alleged arrangement with the suppliers to the plaintiffs whereby the plaintiffs were prevented from obtaining the oil.

The Master has treated the whole of the costs incurred under the last three heads as solely attributable to the counterclaim and has taxed the bills accordingly, allowing to the plaintiffs as their costs of the counterclaim and cross-appeal £2,033 4s. 4d., and to the defendants as their costs of the claim £913 15s. 8d., and of the appeal £409 4s. 5d., together £1,323 0s. 1d. Against this taxation the defendants appealed, alleging that the taxation had proceeded upon a wrong principle and that as the successful parties in the action it was unjust that on balance they should be called upon to pay the plaintiffs any such amount as £700, that sum being the difference between the amount allowed to the plaintiffs and the amount allowed to them.

The appeal came before Mr. Justice MacKinnon, and he directed a re-taxation of the costs. From this order the present appeal is made.

The points on which the Judge differed from the Master were that he considered that the question under heads 3 and 4 arose solely upon the claim, whereas the Master had treated them, as well as the question under head 2, as arising solely upon the counterclaim, and he considered that the question under head 2 was common to both claim and counterclaim, but in reference to the latter he considered that no apportionment should be made.

With respect to both the Master and the Judge I cannot agree with the view of either of them. In considering what the real contest between the parties under each of these heads was, I do not think that justice can be done except by treating the costs of the litigation under each head as costs which must be apportioned if the order as to costs is to be complied with. For these reasons I think that the order for a re-taxation must stand, but it must be in accordance with the judgment of this Court, and the order of Mr. Justice MacKinnon must be varied accordingly. As the appellants have succeeded they must have the costs of the appeal and before the Judge. It will be for the Taxing Master in his discretion to say what, in his opinion, is a fair apportionment as between the two parties of the various items falling under these several heads.

Lord Justice Atkin.—In this case judgment was eventually entered for the defendants on the claim with costs, and for the plaintiffs on the counterclaim with costs. It appears to me that the provisions of Order LXV., rule 2, do not apply: that no separate issues in fact and law were raised upon claim or counterclaim decided for either party so as to produce an event other than the final event, the failure of both claim and counterclaim. Moreover, if Bush v. Rogers ([1915] 1 K.B., 707) is to be treated as an authority that the provisions of that rule can only be brought into effect by an order of the trial Judge defining the issues, it is plain that the learned Judge did not make an order at the trial, or thereafter, if thereafter he had any jurisdiction to do so. I think therefore that the learned Master was correct in his general answer to the objections in assuming the complete defeat of each party in respect of his affirmative claims. This, however, leaves open the question whether there were costs incurred over matters which were common to both claim and counterclaim, and if so upon whom such costs should fall. The pleadings seem to disclose the following contentions :—1. The plaintiffs sued for £62,000 damages for breach of a contract to take oil, alleging an oral agreement to extend the first date of delivery to March 15, 1924, relying upon an alleged repudiation in writing, dated February 18, 1924. 2. The defendants denied the oral extension of the time and relied upon a fundamental breach by the plaintiffs, namely, a failure to deliver any oil by February 15. 3. The plaintiffs in reply said that they had committed no breach on February 15, because (a) the time was extended as originally alleged, (b) the defendants had committed a breach of a condition precedent, namely, a condition that they would provide on request a banker's guarantee ; and that the defendants were not ready and willing to take delivery on February 15, for their tanks were not ready on that date to receive the oil. Those seem to me to be the matters raised on the claim. The defendants counterclaimed on their part against the plaintiffs for £46,000 damages for breach of the same contract in not delivering the oil. They raised on their counterclaim the same matters that they had alleged as a defence, and the plaintiffs raised in defence to their counterclaim the oral extension of the time and the other matters that they had alleged in reply to the defence. In addition they raised for the first time in their defence to the counterclaim a suggestion that the defendants had themselves procured the plaintiffs' inability, if any, to deliver the oil by collusion with the plaintiffs' suppliers. At the hearing this matter was also treated as matter of reply to the defence. In the result it appears to me that there were a substantial claim and a substantial counterclaim arising out of the same contract, and that except as to the amount of the respective damages, all the substantial contentions on either side were common to both claim and counterclaim.

The question arises how the costs are to be taxed on a judgment which gives the costs of the claim to the defendants and the costs of the counterclaim to the plaintiffs. This point as to the costs of items common to claim and counterclaim arose in the Court of Appeal in Christie v. Platt ([1921] 2 K.B., 17). There the plaintiff sued for rent of a furnished house ; the defendant raised as a defence the contention that it was uninhabitable and repeated the allegation by way of counterclaim and claimed damages. The question whether it was uninhabitable was therefore common to claim and counterclaim. It was not a good plea in law to the claim, but that in itself is obviously no reason for not awarding costs to a plaintiff who incurs costs in resisting it. The plaintiff succeeded with costs on the claim for rent not otherwise disputed, and the defendant succeeded with costs on the counterclaim for damages exceeding the rent. The Master had allowed the plaintiff £214 costs and the defendant £3. He had taxed the costs, as he said, on the footing that he had to inquire whether the item would have been reasonable had there been no counterclaim ; and as to the costs of the counterclaim he had inquired, is this an item which was incurred by reason of the counterclaim ? He came to the conclusion that the whole of the witnesses were called for the defence, and their allowances were not increased by the counterclaim. They would have been necessary if there had been no counterclaim. Lord Justice Younger and myself considered all the cases on the topic of taxation of costs common to claim and counterclaim. We were aware that there had been conflicting decisions and dicta in the Courts of first instance and the Court of Appeal, and we had in mind in particular the decision of Lord Justice Lindley and Lord Justice Chitty, in Atlas Metal Company v. Miller ([1898] 2 Q.B., 500), which appeared to be an authoritative statement of the practice. As a result we came to the conclusion expressed in the judgment in that case, holding that the Master was wrong in principle and remitting the case for taxation. I have nothing to vary in that judgment, which appears to be binding upon the Court of Appeal. Since that case there has been decided by a Divisional Court, consisting of Lord Justices Scrutton and Sargant, the case of Wilson v. Walters ([1926] 1 K.B., 511). The judgments in that case distinguish Christie v. Platt (supra), but I am unable to reconcile the two decisions. It appears to me that the later case applies principles which were intentionally discarded in Christie v. Platt (supra) as working in practice the injustice complained of in that case. The case of Christie v. Platt (supra) was under discussion in the Irish Courts in James Crean and Son, Limited v. M'Millan ([1922] 2 I.R., 105). That was a case where the plaintiffs sued for the price of goods bargained and sold and for £346 damages for non-acceptance, and the defendant counterclaimed for £57 damages for non-delivery, the claim and counterclaim turning upon investigation of the same facts. Both the plaintiffs and the defendant failed. The Master in taxing had given the defendant all the general costs of the action and had only given the plaintiffs such costs as were incurred solely by reason of the counterclaim, and had allowed none of the costs that would have been incurred if there were no counterclaim, and allowed altogether only £5. It appears that in the proofs and brief for the plaintiffs there was no mention of the counterclaim or any instructions as to the damages of the counterclaim. The result of the taxation was therefore apparently in accord with the principle laid down in Christie v. Platt (supra). But I cannot agree with some of the judgments delivered, notably so much of the judgment of Lord Justice O'Connor as appears to approve the application of the rule in Saner v. Bilton (11 Ch.D., 416). I prefer the judgment of the late Lord Justice Bowen, and would accept as substantially correct the first three principles laid down by Lord Justice Andrews with the exception of the last words, " or where both claim and counterclaim arise out of the one transaction and in effect raise the same issue."

By reason of the later cases I will add a few words to what I said in Christie v. Platt (supra). The question is in every case what are the costs reasonably occasioned by the claim, what are the costs reasonably occasioned by the counterclaim. The plaintiff in an action bases his claim on the allegation that a certain event, or events, occurred ; for example, that the defendant was negligent or broke his contract ; presumably he is from the commencement of the action prepared to prove the event as he alleges. The defendant meets the claim by saying that the alleged events did not occur, but goes on to say that the real events were that the plaintiff was negligent or broke the contract, and the defendant counterclaims. The same evidence is relevant on both contentions. It appears to me that after the counterclaim is put in the plaintiff is in a different position. On claim alone he had to incur expense to support his claim ; with counterclaim delivered he has to incur expense to resist his opponent's claim. The claim involves recoupment of loss, the counterclaim exposes him to further loss, possibly affecting his whole fortune. The determination of the event has a double interest to him, and in seeking to prove it the expense which he incurs is occasioned not by the claim alone or by the counterclaim alone, but by both. It appears to me wrong, both in law and in fact, to say that when a man sues for £62,000 and is sued in counterclaim for £46,000, and the event is to be determined by consideration of the same evidence, he incurs all the cost of evidence because of the claim. It seems to me that obviously he incurs the cost because of both; in other words, the costs are occasioned by both. And it is quite irrelevant as to such costs to consider what he would have incurred if there had been no counterclaim, that is, with no other cause operating. The result of the rule now laid down is that where there is a substantial counterclaim involving common evidence, the Master will apportion. But "apportion" does not necessarily mean "divide into equal moieties." He will decide how much in fact should be attributed to the claim, how much to the counterclaim. Nor does this rule preclude him in appropriate cases from finding that all the costs, or substantially all, have been in truth and in fact occasioned by claim or counterclaim. Some counterclaims are merely intended to be consequential upon the defence, as where there is a defence of fraud and there is a counterclaim for delivery up of the document or for a declaration of non-liability. Some counterclaims have no substance, as in James Crean and Son, Limited v. M'Millan (supra). In other cases the Master has grounds for concluding that all the costs were, in fact, incurred in meeting the claim, as in the case of Hilliard v. Dugon (unreported), decided on June 18, 1926, in this Court. The opposing principle seems to give to an order for costs of the counterclaim the same effect as though a counterclaim were an issue in an action in respect of which an order was made in the terms of Order LXV., rule 2. The reason given by Lord Justice Fry in Saner v. Bilton (supra), that the plaintiff is to be regarded as letting loose the waters of litigation, and, therefore, if unsuccessful is to be in a worse position than an unsuccessful counterclaimant, appears to me, with respect, to be unsatisfactory. I see no reason for inflicting punishment on anyone, for bringing a bona fide dispute before the Courts, in excess of his obligation to pay the costs actually occasioned to his opponent, and, if the question were really material who began the litigation, it would often be found that the effective cause was the defendant, and that the plaintiff's writ was due to his having won the race to be first in the contest brought about by the defendant.

It follows that the principles adopted by both Master and Judge cannot be approved, and the case must be remitted for taxation on the lines laid down in this Court. The plaintiffs should have their costs here and before the Judge.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—This appeal raises once again the vexed question what is the proper principle of taxation in cases where the plaintiff has failed in his claim and the defendant has failed in his counterclaim and the Court has dismissed both the action and the counterclaim with costs.

It is apparent from the authorities that there is no consensus of judicial opinion on this question, and the Taxing Masters may well be in doubt as to the right principle to apply. There appear to me to be three divergent views, in support of each of which authority may be found either in actual decisions or in judicial dicta. Speaking for myself I find it impossible to reconcile all the decisions and dicta. Although I propose to confine my judgment to the principles applicable to cases in which the Court has dismissed the action and the counterclaim with costs, the same principles, in my opinion, apply conversely to cases in which both parties have succeeded, and the Court has ordered the defendant to pay the costs of the action and the plaintiff to pay the costs of the counterclaim.

The first view is that the proper principle of taxation is to treat the counterclaim as being in effect a cross-action and to allow to the defendant the costs which he had in fact incurred in defending the action as if there had been no counterclaim, and to allow to the plaintiff the costs which he had in fact incurred in resisting the counterclaim as if there had been no action. (For example, see Atlas Metal Co. v. Miller ([1898] 2 Q.B. 500), and Christie v. Platt ([1921] 2 K.B. 17).

The second view is that the proper principle of taxation is to allow to the defendant the costs of the action as if there had been no counterclaim, and to allow to the plaintiff only the extra costs occasioned by the counterclaim, that is to say, only the amount by which his costs of action had been increased by the counterclaim. (For example see Saner v. Bilton (11 Ch.D., 416) and Wilson v. Walters ([1926] 1 K.B. 511).

And the third view is that the proper principle of taxation is a combination of the two previously mentioned principles, viz., that if the counterclaim raises a separate and substantial question the first of the above mentioned principles is the proper principle of taxation, whereas if the subject-matter of the counterclaim is substantially the same as the defence, or part of the defence, the second of the above principles is the proper principle of taxation. (See James Crean and Son, Limited v. M'Millan ([1922] 2 I.R. 105).

Before considering which of these three principles is the proper principle of taxation, it is necessary to explain what I consider to be their effect in practice. In applying the first of these principles the Taxing Master would have to allow to the plaintiff all such costs as he had in truth and in fact incurred in opposing the counterclaim, and would have to allow to the defendant all such costs as he had in truth and in fact incurred in defending the action. In taxing the plaintiff's costs of the counterclaim on this principle, no allowance would, of course, be made in respect of any costs which the plaintiff had been spared by reason of the counterclaim being made in the action instead of in a separate cross-action; on the other hand every item of costs properly incurred by the plaintiff which is common both to the action and to the counterclaim would have to be considered on its merits, and the Taxing Master would have to apportion to the counterclaim such portion of the common items as he in his discretion should consider had been incurred by reason of the counterclaim. Thus the plaintiff would get no costs of the counterclaim until after it had been delivered, but from the time of its delivery he would get such costs as he had in truth and in fact incurred in opposing such counterclaims, although at the same time he had been incurring costs in prosecuting his claim. Take as an example the fee paid to the plaintiff's counsel on his brief at the trial; this would fall to be apportioned between the action and the counterclaim on the principle which I have mentioned, and the plaintiff would be allowed such part of the fee as the Taxing Master in his discretion considered to have been incurred by reason of the counterclaim, notwithstanding that the whole fee did not exceed in amount the fee which would properly have been payable if there had been no counterclaim. In the same way, in taxing the defendant's costs of the action, the Taxing Master would have to investigate every item of costs common to the action and to the counterclaim, and to apportion to the action the part in truth and in fact incurred in defending the action, although the defendant had at the same time been incurring costs in prosecuting his counterclaim.

In applying the second of the above mentioned principles the Taxing Master would have to allow to the defendant the full costs of the action excluding only the amount by which those costs were increased by the counterclaim, and would have to allow to the plaintiff only the extra costs occasioned by the counterclaim, namely, the amount by which his costs of action had been increased by the counterclaim. In such a case there would be no apportionment of any items common to both the action and the counterclaim unless the plaintiff could prove that a common item had been increased by reason of the counterclaim, and then he would only be allowed such increase. Thus, in the example which I have given, the Taxing Master would make no allowance to the plaintiff for counsel's fee on the trial, if that fee did not exceed an amount which might properly have been allowed if there had been no counterclaim.

In applying the third of the above mentioned principles the Taxing Master, before commencing the taxation, would have to determine upon which of two different principles he was going to tax and for that purpose he would have to decide whether the counterclaim did or did not raise a separate and substantial question, or whether the subject-matter of the counterclaim was or was not substantially the same as the defence or part of the defence, and then, according to his decision on that preliminary point, he would have to tax the costs either on the first or on the second of the above mentioned principles.

No useful purpose would, in my opinion, be served by a detailed examination of the authorities; they are all discussed and commented upon at length in the cases which I have mentioned. What I deduce from the authorities is that the only proper principle of taxation generally applicable to all cases of the kind under consideration is the first of the above mentioned principles, which moreover is laid down as the proper principle of taxation in Christie v. Platt (supra), a case binding on this Court. This principle is elastic; it does not bind the Taxing Master down to any set formula, but on the contrary allows him ample latitude, and in applying it he can do substantial justice in every case. In dealing with common items he should take into account whether the counterclaim raises a separate question, whether it is substantial or unsubstantial, and whether it is or is not based on the same facts as the claim, and should exercise his discretion in apportioning such items accordingly. As regards the second of the above mentioned principles, I am of opinion there are valid reasons why it should not be adopted as a general principle of taxation. Under the express provisions of the Judicature Acts and of the Rules a counterclaim is for all purposes of procedure and evidence placed upon the same footing as a cross-action, and may be proceeded with although the action be stayed, discontinued or dismissed. The application of this second principle of taxation, however, places the counterclaim in the same position as if it were an issue in the action upon which the plaintiff had succeeded, and as if at the trial the Judge had made an order upon the defendant to pay the amount by which the plaintiff's costs of action had been increased by reason of such issue. In some cases no doubt the application of this principle may work substantial justice, for example, where the success or failure of the counterclaim is merely consequential upon the success or failure of the claim, or where the counterclaim is really in the nature of a defence. On the other hand in many cases the application of this principle would obviously work injustice, for example, where the counterclaim raises a separate and substantial question or where the real controversy between the parties is raised by the counterclaim, and the plaintiff has forestalled the defendant in order to gain the advantage of being in the position of plaintiff. Christie v. Platt (supra) furnishes a striking example of a case in which injustice would result from the application of this principle. Even in cases where a substantial counterclaim is based on the same facts as the claim, the application of this principle may work an injustice, for example, in the example given in the judgment of Lord Justice Bankes. In my opinion there is no valid reason why the plaintiff should not be allowed such costs as he has in truth and in fact incurred in resisting the counterclaim, merely because the facts are common to both claim and counterclaim, and because the defendant has been able to take advantage of the cheaper procedure by way of counterclaim afforded to him by the Judicature Acts and the Rules. In such cases the unsuccessful counterclaiming defendant would still reap considerable advantage if the first of the above mentioned principles of taxation were applied, as he would not only be saved the initial expenses of commencing a separate cross-action but also would have to pay only an apportioned part of all common items, which in a separate cross-action he would, for the most part, have to pay in full. In my opinion the taxation of the plaintiff's costs of the counterclaim on the second of the above mentioned principles, should only take place where a special order to that effect has been made. Moreover I think that the Court ought to exercise great caution in making any such special order as in most cases the Judge is not in a position to know merely from what takes place at the trial what costs the plaintiff has in truth and in fact incurred in resisting a counterclaim. It often happens that the plaintiff has had to make serious preparations, and to incur substantial costs in meeting an apparently substantial counterclaim, only to find at the trial that it is abandoned or minimized under the advice of leading counsel in such a way as to produce the impression in the Court that it was never put forward seriously. The Taxing Master on the other hand sees the advice on evidence, the proofs of witnesses, and the brief, and is therefore in a far better position than the Judge to arrive at a just conclusion as to what costs the plaintiff has in truth and in fact incurred in resisting the counterclaim, and can exercise his discretion in apportioning all common items of costs accordingly.

As regards the third of the above mentioned principles, although at first sight it seems to approximate closely to the first principle, I am of opinion that it is objectionable in that it places all counterclaims, however substantial, if based on the same facts as the claim, in the same category as unsubstantial and consequential counterclaims; moreover it has this serious disadvantage that it compels the Taxing Master before commencing the taxation to decide which of two different principles he is going to apply to the taxation. The duty of determining this preliminary point would not only lead to a serious contest between the parties, but would also in most cases lead to an application by the dissatisfied party to review the taxation. Many cases are on the border line and in such cases there might be a real difficulty in determining which of the two principles ought to be adopted, whereas if the first of the above mentioned principles were applied, the allowances and disallowances in respect of all common items would be reduced to questions of quantum only, and finality would then be assured. Turning to the present case I am of opinion that neither the Taxing Master nor the learned Judge has applied the proper principle of taxation. In my judgment all the four issues raised in the pleadings and at the trial are common both to the action and to the counterclaim though in a varying degree. In taxing the bills of costs of the parties in accordance with the terms of the order the Taxing Master should apply the first of the above mentioned principles as above explained.

In the result therefore these bills of costs must be remitted to the Taxing Master for re-taxation, and as the plaintiffs have substantially succeeded on this appeal, they must have their costs here and below.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. PAKENHAM AND OTHERS.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. COUNTESS OF LONGFORD.*

Revenue — Super-tax —Infant — Income of his trust property—Sums paid by trustees for maintenance — Accumulation of balance——Accumulations "receivable by infant"—Infant's liability to super-tax — Liability of trustees and guardian to make super-tax returns—Representative assessments—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII., c. 8), s. 72 (2) (5) (6)—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), ss. 5 (3) (c), 7 (2) (5) (6), 161—All Schedules Rules, Rule 4.

Where trustees of a settlement set apart certain sums annually for the maintenance of an infant beneficiary and allow the balance of the income to accumulate, the income that is being accumulated is "receivable" by the infant within the meaning of s. 5 (3) (c) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and he is liable to be assessed to super-tax in respect of it. But representative assessments to super-tax cannot be made upon the trustees or the guardian of the infant beneficiary, either in respect of the actual total income of the infant, or in respect of a total income limited, as regards the particular trustee or guardian, to that income with which the trust or guardianship is concerned.

So held by the Court on the first point, and by the Court on the second point as regards the guardian, and by Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Scrutton, L.J., as regards the trustees. But held by Sargant, L.J. (dissenting), that the words of section 72 (6) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, or the equivalent words in section 7 (6) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, are wide enough to enable such assessments to be made upon trustees.

Decisions of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 157 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 594), affirmed.

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts of these appeals are fully set out in the report of the case before Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 157 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 594), but may be summarized as follows.

The sixth Earl of Longford was born on December 29, 1902. He became in 1915 tenant in tail under a settlement made by his father on August 22, 1899, of estates in Ireland. The settlement contained no express power of management during minority, and no direction that the statutory provisions were not to be applied. The trustees were appointed trustees for the purposes of section 42 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. The sixth Earl was also tenant in tail under a settlement made upon the marriage of his grandparents in 1862. That settlement contained a clause directing the trustees to enter and receive and apply the rents and profits during minority, and they were given powers of management and, subject thereto, were to apply such sums as they should think fit to the maintenance of an infant son of the fourth or fifth Earl entitled as tenant in tail, and to accumulate the surplus. The trusts of the accumulations were, if the son should attain 21 or die under that age, leaving inheritable issue, for the son, but, if he should die under 21 without such issue, then the accumulations were to be treated as capital money. The provisions were to apply, so far as they were or could be made applicable, to the minority of any person for the time being entitled under the settlement to the rents and profits. The sixth Earl became tenant in tail of these estates in 1918. The trustees of this settlement were not the same persons as the trustees of the settlement of August 22, 1899.

After the sixth Earl became entitled to the estates that were the subject of the settlement dated August 22, 1899, the trustees of that settlement paid yearly during his minority a sum of £2,500 for his maintenance, and after he became entitled to the estates that were the subject of the settlement of 1862, the trustees of that settlement paid yearly during his minority a sum of £500 for his maintenance, and the balance of income arising from both estates was accumulated.

During 1919 the question of the Earl's liability to super-tax arose. The Countess of Longford was called upon, as guardian of the Earl, to make a return for the year ending April 5, 1917 ; and upon her failure to do so an estimated assessment to super-tax was made upon her for that year with the intention of bringing into assessment the total income of the previous year of the Earl from all sources, including the whole income arising from the estates that were the subject of the settlement of August 22, 1899, but not the income arising from the estates that were the subject of the settlement of November 8, 1862, as the Earl did not become entitled to such estates until January 22, 1918.

At a later date notices to make returns of the total income of the Earl from all sources for super-tax purposes for the years ending April 5, 1918, 1919, and 1920 respectively were served on the trustees, and the returns were in due course made by Mr. H. N. Walford on behalf of himself and co-trustees. In these returns there was included as the income of the Earl arising from both the settled estates each year only the sums paid by the respective trustees of both settlements for maintenance in the respective previous years. Assessments to super-tax were subsequently made upon the trustees with the intention of including therein each year the total income of the Earl from all sources for the respective previous years, including the whole income arising from both estates, whether used for maintenance or accumulated, but, as regards the income from the estates which were the subject of the settlement of November 8, 1862, only from the time at which the Earl succeeded thereto.

It was contended on behalf of the trustees and the guardian :—

(a) That the guardian was not liable to assessment as guardian for any year.

(b) That by virtue of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the Earl was not entitled, under the settlement of August 22, 1899, to receive more than the sums allowed to him for maintenance under that settlement, and that by the provisions of the settlement of November 8, 1862, he was assessable on the same principle as regards the income of that settlement.

(c) That the trustees of neither settlement were under any obligation to make super-tax returns on behalf of the Earl.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown (inter alia) :—

(a) That the trustees were liable to be assessed to super-tax in respect of the total income of the Earl from all sources.

(b) That such total income included for the purposes of super-tax for each of the three years ending April 5, 1918, 1919, and 1920 respectively, the whole income arising during the respective previous years (i.) from the estates which were the subject of the settlement of August 22, 1899, and (ii.) from the estates which were the subject of the settlement of 1862, from the date at which the Earl succeeded to them.

(c) That the trustees were liable to make super-tax returns of the income of the Earl.

(d) That the guardian was liable to be assessed to super-tax in respect of the total income of the Earl from all sources.

(e) That such total income included the whole income arising from the estates that were the subject of the settlement of August 22, 1899, during the year ending April 5, 1916.

The Special Commissioners held that the trustees were debarred from objecting to the form of the assessments, so far only as the minor was liable either through his trustees or his guardian to assessment to super-tax ; that the liability through the guardian was restricted to so much of the income of the minor as passed through her hands ; that, since the liability of the minor to super-tax did not depend on the estates, but upon his total income from the estates and all other sources, the trustees were not liable to make the returns ; and that the income of the minor which was being accumulated by the trustees was not " receivable " by the minor so as to be liable to super-tax. They accordingly discharged the assessment for the year ending April 5, 1917, and reduced the assessments for the years ending April 5, 1918, 1919, and 1920.

Upon appeal by the Crown, Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that the total income of the estates was " receivable " by the infant Earl so as to be liable to super-tax. Upon the question of the liability of the guardian or the trustees to make returns he upheld the decision of the Special Commissioners.

The present appeal was brought by the Crown upon this latter point.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), Mr. J. H. Stamp, and Mr. Reginald Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. A. M. Latter, K.C., and Mr. A. Andrewes-Uthwatt for the guardian and trustees.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in his considered judgment, said :—The present, or sixth, Earl of Longford was born on December 29, 1902, and thus came of age on December 29, 1923. His father died on August 21, 1915, and after that date until he attained his majority his mother, the Countess of Longford, acted as his guardian, and in the year 1916-17 received £2,500 for his maintenance from funds held in trust for him.

The Hon. G. M. Pakenham, G. F. Stewart, and H. N. Walford are the trustees of the marriage settlement made upon the marriage of the late, the fifth, Earl and the Countess of Longford in 1899, and in the financial years 1917-20 received the income of that particular trust and paid therefrom the £2,500 a year to the Countess for the maintenance of her son.

In 1862, upon her marriage with the fourth Earl of Longford, certain estates were settled by the grandmother of the present Earl, and upon her death on January 22, 1918, the present Earl became entitled as tenant in tail to the rents and profits of these estates. The trustees of this settlement of 1862 were not the same as the trustees of the settlement made in 1899. During the minority of the present Earl these trustees of the settlement of 1862, since the present Earl became entitled in 1918, have contributed a sum of £500 a year for his maintenance, thus increasing the total sum paid to the Countess for his maintenance to £3,000 a year. The balance of the income received by the two sets of trustees under the two settlements was accumulated.

The Countess of Longford was called upon by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax to make a return for super-tax for the year ending April 5, 1917, in respect of the income of the present Earl, and failed to do so. The Special Commissioners thereupon made an estimated assessment of £12,000 for that year upon her as guardian, based upon the total income of the Earl in the previous year from all sources, including the whole income arising from the property the subject of the settlement of 1899, but not the income arising from the estates subject to the settlement of 1862, which, as already stated, did not fall into the possession of the Earl till the death of his grandmother in January, 1918.

For the financial year ending April 5, 1918, the trustees of the settlement of 1899 were called upon to make a similar return for super-tax of the income of the Earl, but returned only the sum paid for his maintenance in the previous year.

In the years ending April 5, 1919 and 1920, these trustees returned the total sum paid for his maintenance from both settlements of 1899 and 1862 in the previous years respectively, but not the full sums received as the income of both settlements.

The Special Commissioners thereupon made estimated assessments upon the trustees as follows : For the year ending April 5, 1918, £16,000 ; for the year ending April 5, 1919, £16,500 ; for the year ending April 5, 1920, £26,000.

The Special Commissioners claim the right to make these assessments upon the guardian and trustees respectively by virtue of the powers given originally by section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, which is now replaced by section 7, subsection 5, of the Income Tax Act, 1918. Inasmuch as the earlier assessments were made before the later Act superseded the Act of 1842, I have in this judgment referred to the original sections, but have given a reference to the existing sections.

The question in these appeals is whether the guardian and trustees can be assessed to super-tax in a representative capacity under section 41 (General Rule 4) to the full amount of the income of the minor or their beneficiary respectively.

The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the Countess of Longford upon the assessment for the year ending April 5, 1917; and inasmuch as the income received by her for the maintenance of the Earl for the previous year ending April 5, 1916, fell below the total income upon which super-tax was payable for the financial year ending April 5, 1917, they discharged the assessment altogether.

For the year ending April 5, 1918, the Special Commissioners made an assessment upon the trustees in respect of the income paid over for the use of the minor in the previous year under the 1899 settlement, and for the years ending April 5, 1919 and 1920, upon the income paid over from the settlement of 1862, as well as that of 1899. The figures were agreed, but the above is the nature of the assessments made. The Special Commissioners held that the amounts received by the trustees which were not paid over for the use of the minor, but accumulated in their hands, were not income which should have been included in the assessments.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt has upheld the decisions of the Special Commissioners. The result is that the assessments upon the trustees are only upon the amounts actually allowed to the minor, and not upon the full sums received by them under their trust, part of which was not paid over, but accumulated. Counsel for the Crown have argued in this Court both points, and claimed that the guardian and the trustees can be assessed in a representative capacity (a) upon the total income of the minor whether in fact it is paid into her hands or is received by the trustees from the trust which they administer, or from a trust or trusts, not under their control, and (b), alternatively, upon the full sum in fact received by the trustees whether that sum is, or is not, immediately payable to and enjoyed by the minor, or is in part accumulated for his ultimate benefit when he has become of full age.

The charge to super-tax was imposed by section 66 (1) of the Finance Act (1909-10), 1910 (Income Tax Act, 1918, section 4), in respect of the income of any individual the total of which from all sources exceeded the original limit of £5,000, as an additional duty of income-tax, and by section 66 (2) (now Income Tax Act, 1918, section 5 (1)) the total income of any individual from all sources was taken to be the total income of that individual from all sources for the previous year, estimated in the same manner as the total income from all sources is estimated for the purposes of exemptions or abatements under the Income Tax Acts, subject to certain directions thereinafter specified. These latter words in section 5 (1) have now been altered to "is required to be estimated in a return made in connection with any claim for a deduction from assessable income, but subject to the provisions hereinafter contained." These words were introduced in substitution for the previous ones by section 32 of the Finance Act, 1920, when the system of assessable income was introduced. But there is no substantial change in effect. Their meaning is that section 190 of the Act of 1842 is introduced whereby Schedule G, with its rules and directions, is to be followed, "so far as the same are respectively applicable to the case of each person, corporation, company or society, described or mentioned in this Act, on behalf of themselves and also of others for whom they act in any of the characters described in this Act, . . . by each such person, corporation, company or society, or by his or their agents or officers, in the cases where such agents or officers are authorized to make such returns." That is to say, the returns are to be made according to the several schedules, and these are to be followed and attended to by persons who act in a representative character. The same system is preserved by section 207 of the Act of 1918 and the rules and directions contained in the Fifth Schedule to that Act.

By section 72 (2) of the Act of 1910 (Income Tax Act, 1918, section 7 (2)) every person upon whom a notice is served requiring him to make a return of his total income from all sources is to make that return, whether he is or is not chargeable with super-tax after the return has been made. This section expressly lays this duty upon a person who is chargeable in a representative capacity under section 41 of the Act of 1842 (Income Tax Act, 1918, section 7 (2)).

It has been held that under this subsection trustees are to make a return, to the full extent of their knowledge and information, of all the sources of income of their beneficiary, whether that income is derived from their own trust or another source. See Brooke v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (34 The Times L.R., 142; [1918] 1 K.B., 257). But that subsection only secures the return to the extent of the best ability of the person on whom the duty of making it falls, and expressly leaves open the question of chargeability in respect of the income returned. The right to charge the trustees as claimed in the present appeals is said to be derived from section 72 (6) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (section 7 (6) of the Act of 1918).

The subsection applies the provisions of the Income Tax Acts relating to persons who are to be chargeable with duty, to assessments, and to the appeals against these assessments, and to the collection and recovery of the duty and the like, "so far as they are applicable" to the "charge, assessment, collection, and recovery of duty under this section." There are persons who are chargeable under that section, for the super-tax, which is primarily charged under section 66, is to be assessed and charged by the Special Commissioners, and they have power under section 72 (5) to make an assessment to the best of their judgment upon any person who fails to make such a return as is required of him under s. 72 (2) of the Act of 1910 and to make additional assessments under section 7 (7) of the Act of 1918.

It is thus, in my opinion, pressing the words of section 7 (6) a very long way to claim that under it the sections of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which are introduced by reference "so far as they are applicable," and in reference to persons who are to be chargeable, have made trustees who are compelled to make a return also chargeable fully, not only to the extent of the income which they receive, but also to the extent of the totality of the income of the beneficiary for whom they receive and hold a contributory part. The mere reference to section 41 of the Act of 1842 in s. 72 (2) and the actual words "who are to be chargeable" in subsection (6) will not, in my judgment, have such an effect, and if there is such a power, it must be derived from elsewhere.

Under section 41 of the Income Tax Act of 1842 an agent who was charged in respect of the profits of a foreign principal was chargeable to the extent only of moneys received into his hands. That was by virtue of the words in section 100, "shall be charged annually on and paid by the persons . . . receiving . . . the same," and was decided in Colquhoun v. Brooks (5 The Times L.R., 728; 14 App. Cas., 493). It was not until section 31 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, came into force that an agent was made liable in respect of profits on business carried on through his agency, whether he received them or not. Thus section 41 of the Act of 1842, as it was originally interpreted, did not contemplate or impose a liability beyond the actual receipt of income into the hands of the representative person.

An infant can be directly assessed to super-tax.

This was decided in Rex v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners—Ex parte Huxley (32 The Times L.R., 353; [1916] 1 K.B., 788), and by section 173 of the Act of 1842, upon default of the infant to pay income-tax, the parents or guardians or tutors of such infant were made liable and charged with the payments which the infant ought to have paid. See also section 92 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880. Both these sections contemplate the direct liability of an infant by their words, "where a person chargeable with the duties is under the age of 21 years."

In my judgment, therefore, no inference can be drawn from the Income Tax Acts as they stood that there was any liability imposed upon guardians or trustees beyond the sums actually received by them in their representative capacity.

Lord Dunedin in his speech in Whitney v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (42 The Times L.R., 58; [1926] A.C. 37) stated that there are three stages in the imposition of a tax: (1) The declaration of liability—that is, the part of the statute which determines what persons, in respect of what property, are liable. (2) The assessment which fixes the amount that a person has to pay. (3) The methods of recovery if the person taxed does not voluntarily pay. Applying the process of these three stages to the present case, by section 66 of the Act of 1910 (section 4 of that of 1918) super-tax is levied in respect of the income of any individual the total of which from all sources reaches a certain standard. In Tischler v. Apthorpe (1 The Times L.R., 344) it was decided that direct assessment upon a firm can be made even though supplementary machinery under sections 41 and 53 of the Act of 1842 is available whereby their agent could be assessed; and see per Lord Justice Fry in Werle v. Colquhoun (4 The Times L.R. 396; 20 Q.B.D. 753). In Rex v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners—Ex parte Huxley (supra) Lord Cozens-Hardy took this same view. Looking at section 173 of the Act of 1842 and section 92 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, he said (at p. 798): "I cannot escape from the language of those two sections. They seem to assert that the infant is a Crown debtor, except so far, if at all, as a different result may follow under the earlier sections where there is a trustee or guardian." The other members of the Court used language to the same effect. This case also decides that the machinery of direct assessment can be used. Mr. Justice Rowlatt in Maclaine and Co. v. Eccott (10 Tax Cas., 480, at p. 545) pointed out that when the liability of non-resident persons was enlarged it is the non-resident who remains chargeable and assessable though in the name of, and by the instrumentality, of the agent. Thus there can be no question that the first two stages stated by Lord Dunedin can be fulfilled without recourse to the imposition of the liability upon the trustee or guardian. The third stage is easily complied with, for, in addition to the usual methods of recovery, sections 41 and 173 of the Act of 1842, and section 92 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, come in aid to lay the duty of payment upon the representative person (General Rules of 1918, r. 13) in lieu of the person primarily liable.

But the argument for the Crown in the present case is in the reverse order. It is claimed that because representative persons are required to make returns for super-tax, and because sections relating to the income-tax are made available "so far as they are applicable," and relating to persons who are to be chargeable, there must be a liability laid upon these representative persons.

Section 31 (2) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915, provided that a non-resident person should be chargeable in respect of certain profits or gains under section 41 of the Act of 1842, as amended and enlarged by section 31, and it was attempted in Greenwood v. F. L. Smidth and Co. (38 The Times L.R., 421; [1922] 1 A.C. 417) to impose a liability upon a non-resident in respect of trade even though it was not exercised in the United Kingdom, because section 31 (1) (b) had extended section 41 so as to cover profits not actually received by the agent. The attempt failed, and Lord Buckmaster observed that the Courts cannot assent to the view that, if a section in a taxing statute is of doubtful and ambiguous meaning, it is possible out of that ambiguity to extract a new and added obligation not formerly cast upon the taxpayer.

I have already said in Whitney v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (40 The Times L.R., 705; [1924] 2 K.B., 602) that I agree with Lord Sterndale's view expressed in Davis v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (39 The Times L.R., 102; [1923] 1 K.B., 370) that, if it be sought to deduce from the statement that super-tax is an additional income-tax "this proposition that therefore all provisions with regard to income-tax or super-tax are to be considered as common to them both, there is no foundation for such a deduction." I agree with Mr. Latter that it is a big jump to hold that the agent, trustee, or guardian is assessable and chargeable for the total income of the person whom he represents, and of whose income from all sources he may have imperfect knowledge, both as to its total amount and as to the deductions which that person may be entitled to make from it; while, as I have already pointed out, the same system of estimation of the income is retained as is required in a return made for income-tax in connexion with any claim for a deduction from assessable income under the distributive schedules and with the deductions allowed under them.

The inconveniences—indeed hardships—which the view contended for by the Crown involves are well set out by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in his judgment. Assume three trusts with a beneficial income in each of £1,500 a year; how can the super-tax, with its graduations of the rate to be charged, be estimated upon the total income of £4,500 and recovered from one set of trustees? In Williams v. Singer (35 The Times L.R., 455; [1919] 2 K.B., 108) it was clearly stated in the judgments of the Court, which was considering section 41, that the person liable to be taxed is the beneficiary, and that the purpose of the section is to provide machinery by which, in the cases specified, income-tax may be more readily recovered.

In the report of the same case in the House of Lords (36 The Times L.R. 661; [1921] 1 A.C., 65) Lord Cave expresses the view that there may be cases in which a trustee in receipt of trust income may be chargeable with income-tax upon such income, but that, in cases where a trustee or agent is made chargeable with the tax, the statutes recognize the fact that he is a trustee or agent for others, and he is taxed on behalf of and as representing his beneficiaries or principals—see also per Lords Wrenbury and Phillimore. For these reasons I agree with Mr. Justice Rowlatt on the first point.

The second point, as to the liability of the guardian, was apparently not fully argued before Mr. Justice Rowlatt, but it has been fully argued by Mr. Hills in this Court. In my judgment, the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt is right upon both points. I agree with his reasoning upon the second point and do not desire to add more, for the reasons which I have given upon the first point apply in a large measure to the second.

The appeals must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—The present Earl of Longford was born on December 29, 1902, succeeded to the earldom on August 21, 1915, and came of age on December 29, 1923. He had, on succeeding to the title, a total income which subjected him to the payment of super-tax. These appeals relate to the endeavours of the Inland Revenue to find the best way of making him pay.

1. For the year April 6, 1916, to April 5, 1917, the Crown assessed his mother and guardian, the Countess of Longford. She paid on the amount of income which she administered; the Revenue desired to assess her on the total income of the Earl. The Special Commissioners declined so to assess her, and Mr. Justice Rowlatt affirmed their decision. The Crown appeals.

2. For the year 1917-18 the Crown assessed the trustees of the settlement under which the whole income of the Earl was derived on the whole income of the year. The Special Commissioners discharged the liability as to such part of the income as the trustees were accumulating, as not being income of the Earl, and also declined to assess the trustees personally for either the whole income or the part of the income which they handed over. Mr. Justice Rowlatt disagreed with their decision as to the accumulated funds, but held that the trustees could not be assessed either on the whole income or on that part of the income which was paid to the guardian of the Earl. The Crown appeals.

3. On January 22, 1918, the Earl, by the death of his grandmother, became entitled under another settlement with different trustees to a further income. The Crown accordingly assessed for the years 1918-19 and 1919-20 the first trustees on the whole income of the Earl. The Special Commissioners again declined to assess either the whole income of both trusts or of either trust or the part accumulated or the part administered. Mr. Justice Rowlatt disagreed as to the part accumulated, but declined to assess both sets or either set of trustees either on the whole income of the two trusts, or the whole income of either trust, or on the part handed over.

4. For the year 1920-21 the Crown assessed the Earl of Longford directly. The assessment was discharged by the Special Commissioners, but restored by the Judge on the authority of Rex v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners—Ex parte Huxley (32 The Times L.R. 353; [1926] 1 K.B., 788), and there is no appeal against this decision.

All infants therefore can be directly assessed to super-tax, and having been so assessed, under section 173 of the Act of 1842 (now section 161 of the Act of 1918), the parent, guardian, or tutor can be made liable for the tax originally charged on the infant.

The questions in the appeal are:—

i. Whether the guardian can be directly assessed to super-tax in respect of the infant, either on the infant's whole income or the part of it which the guardian administers, without the necessity of assessing the infant.

ii. Whether the trustees of the settlement under which the infant receives income can be assessed directly to super-tax in respect of the infant, and, if so, whether on the whole of the infant's income from every source or the whole of the income from the settlement of which they are trustees. The distinction between funds paid over and funds accumulated is no longer in question; both are income of the infant.

Super-tax was granted by the Finance (1909-10) Act of 1910, and is now dealt with in Part II. of the Income Tax Act of 1918, as modified by subsequent Finance Acts, especially that of 1925, which imposes a graduated tax at a rate rising with the amount of income. Income up to £2,000 is free; the next £500 pays ninepence in the pound, and so with gradual rises till each thousand pounds above £30,000 pays six shillings in the pound. By section 66 of the Act of 1910 super-tax is charged on "the income of any individual" (which excludes companies); it is charged on the total income of that individual from all sources for the previous year. By section 72 (1) the super-tax is assessed by the Special Commissioners. In this it differs from income-tax, which is assessed on various parts of the income by various general or additional commissioners, according to the situation of the property or residence of the individual, or schedule under which the income is taxable.

Section 72 (2) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, provides for returns of total income, and section 72 (4) provides for penalties if the person who has to make the return "without reasonable excuse" fails to make such a return. The "persons" who have to make returns are:—

(1) A person required to make a return of "his total income";

(2) A person who is chargeable with or liable to be assessed to income-tax under section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, as representing an incapacitated or non-resident person, . . . who makes a return of the total income from all sources of the incapacitated or non-resident person;

(3) A person who is chargeable with or liable to be assessed to income-tax under section 24 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1890, as representing a deceased person, who makes a return of the total income from all sources of the deceased person. The recited section provides that, if a person dies without having made a return of his profits, his executors or administrators may be directly charged in respect of the profits arising before his death.

Every person in clauses (1), (2), and (3) is to make a return "whether he is or is not chargeable with the super-tax"; and this assumes that some of them are not chargeable with super-tax. These words may refer to total incomes under £2,000, not chargeable, as compared with incomes over £2,000 which are chargeable; or to persons chargeable, such as the owner of the income, or the executor, who is chargeable though his testator is not assessed, as compared with trustees, if they are not chargeable on the whole income of the cestui que trust.

Section 41 of the Income Tax Act of 1842 provides that certain classes of persons, (1) bearing certain relations to a second class of persons (who are described in the Act of 1910, section 72 (2), and the Act of 1918, General Rules, Rule 4, and section 237 (definitions), as "incapacitated persons," and (2) having the direction, control, or management of the property of such incapacitated persons, shall be chargeable to the duties of income-tax in the same manner and to the same amount as the incapacitated person would be charged if he were not incapacitated. The first class of persons is described as "trustees, guardians, tutors, curators, or committee"; the incapacitated persons as "infants, married women, lunatics, idiots, or insane" (one would have liked to ask the draftsman the difference between a lunatic and an insane person). The first class of trustees, &c., were to be taxed, whether the incapacitated person was or was not resident in Great Britain. Section 41 dealt with a further class of person. The resident factor, agent, or receiver of a non-resident person, who had the receipt of any profits or gains belonging to such non-resident person, was chargeable in the like manner and to the like amount as if such non-resident person were resident in Great Britain and were in the actual receipt of such profits.

Of the persons whose own income could be taxed in the name of a representative, it will be seen that (a) the infant was also directly assessable (Huxley's case (supra), (b) the married woman under section 45 was taxable in the name of her husband and not in the name of her trustee or in her own name. Now under Rule 16 of the General Rules of the Act of 1918 a married woman can in certain circumstances and for certain profits be taxed in her own name. Thirdly, as to a lunatic, Mr. Justice Lush in Huxley's case (supra) seemed to think, obiter, that a lunatic could not be directly charged, but Lord Cozens-Hardy in the Court of Appeal appears to take an opposite view.

It seems clear that, so far as income-tax is concerned, the liability of the trustee or agent does not exclude the liability of the principal, whether incapacitated or non-resident, and vice versa. It also seems clear that for income-tax purposes the liability of the trustee or agent is limited to the profits which he controls or manages; and, though the limitation of the liability of the agent to profits received has been removed by the Finance (No. 2) Act of 1915, section 31 (now Income Tax Act, 1918, General Rule No. 5), I think the liability of the trustee or agent for income-tax is still limited to the British property or trade which he controls or manages, though he does not "receive" the profits, and it does not extend to all British profits of the principal though the trustee or agent has nothing to do with part of these profits, still less to all profits whether British or not. There may be an assessment for income-tax on the trustee or agent in respect of part of the profits, just as there may be a partial assessment on a resident principal, or one of full capacity.

We now reach the real difficulty in the case. Section 72 (6) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (now section 7 (6) of the Act of 1918), enacts that "all provisions of the Income Tax Acts relating to persons who are to be chargeable with duty, assessments . . . shall, so far as they are applicable, apply to the charge . . . of duty under this section," i.e., to the duty of super-tax. The Crown says that the trustee or guardian of an infant is chargeable to income-tax under section 41 of the Act of 1842, and is therefore by this section made chargeable to super-tax. The Crown's contention would also apparently apply to all representatives under section 41, including the agent of a non-resident principal who has British properties yielding profits liable to income-tax. The Crown further contends that it can assess these representatives to super-tax on all profits of their principal, though the representative has no control, management, or receipt of these profits or of the properties from which the profits are derived. Mr. Justice Rowlatt says that the contention of the Attorney-General before him extended to assessment of the total income of the principal and was not put forward in a limited form as to the total income of the trust controlled by the trustees to be assessed. Before us, however, undoubtedly the latter view was contended for, in the alternative at any rate, by the junior counsel for the Crown.

Counsel for the subject contended that section 41 was only to apply "so far as applicable to super-tax," and that the limited assessment for income-tax, which might be one of a number of assessments in different places and by different Commissioners, together covering all the profits liable to tax, had no application to a single assessment for super-tax made by one authority at a rate varying with the amount of the total income. The argument may be illustrated by a case: A, a non-resident principal, has three English agents, carrying on three separate businesses, each producing a profit of £1,500; £4,500 in all. No one of them will be assessed to income-tax at more than £1,500. How in the Crown's view are they to be assessed to super-tax? The income under £2,000 is not to be assessed at all; from £2,000 to £2,500 it pays 9d. in the £; from £2,500 to £3,000, 1s.; from £3,000 to £4,000, 1s. 6d.; and the last £500, making £4,500, at 2s. 3d. To which trustee are you to allot the first £2,000, and at what rate will each trustee pay? There is no provision for this sort of thing in section 41, which is concerned not with assessments on total income at different rates in one assessment, but only with assessments on income, controlled or managed, at one rate. Of course you might have a provision that the total amount due from the principal for super-tax, if he were assessed directly, should be ascertained, and then the liability divided amongst the three trustees proportionately to their respective incomes. But where is there a trace of this in section 41? I do not understand how a provision for liability for income-tax only on income controlled or managed, when applied to super-tax, can produce a liability on the trustee for all income of the principal, whether controlled or managed by the trustee or not. If the trustee cannot be assessed on his cestui que trust's total income, I can see nothing in section 41 to provide for a pro rata adjustment of the super-tax obtained by one assessment of the total income over the various trustees who manage parts of that income.

It has been held by the House of Lords in Whitney v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (42 The Times L.R. 58; [1926] A.C. 37) that a non-resident principal can be directly assessed to super-tax on his British profits after notice sent to him. There is, as far as I know, no decision yet in a case where an agent has been assessed to super-tax on the whole or part of the profits of his non-resident principal.

In my opinion, the provisions of section 41 are "not applicable" to the assessment of super-tax on a representative of a principal, in respect either of the whole or of part of his principal's income; and I therefore agree with the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt, and think that the appeals of the Crown should be dismissed.

There are two matters of regret in the case. First, there is the length of time that these proceedings have occupied. In 1927 the assessment for 1916 has not yet finally been determined; and five years were taken to state the special case. No satisfactory explanation was offered to us of the delay. Secondly, I think the case is a bad example of legislation by reference. Probably to get a Bill through Parliament, a number of existing statutory provisions are incorporated "so far as applicable." I doubt whether Parliament, or the draftsman, or the responsible Minister ever considered which of these provisions were applicable, but the whole block is thrown at the heads of the Judges, who have to consider which of them are applicable in whole or part. This case is an example of the deplorable result.

Lord Justice Sargant: In my opinion, in the Countess of Longford's case there is a clear and simple reason for dismissing the appeal. I cannot see that the Countess ever had, within section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, "the direction, control, or management of the property or concern" of her infant son, or the receipt of the profits or gains of the property within the language of Lord Parker in Drummond v. Collins (31 The Times L.R. 482; [1915] A.C. 1011). The control or management of the property and the receipt of the profits and gains were in the hands of the trustees, who made to her, from and out of the income of the property, such an allowance as they thought fit for the purpose of the maintenance and education of her son. It was, of course, not she, but they, who were chargeable with income-tax on the whole income of her property, including the amount of any such allowance, which was no doubt a net sum. Nor did she, I think, receive it as guardian in the sense in which that word is used in section 41. She received it not of independent right, but as the person to whom the trustees under their discretionary powers thought fit to entrust the actual expenditure of the allowance in question. Even, therefore, if the allowance in the year 1916-17 exceeded the then limit for super-tax, the Countess was not within section 72 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, not being a person chargeable with super-tax as representing her son.

With regard to the case of Pakenham and others, super-tax was created and imposed for the first time by Part IV., sections 65 to 72 inclusive, of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. At that time the machinery for the assessment and collection of income-tax was regulated by the Income Tax Act, 1842. Section 72 of the above Act of 1910 contains a general referential application of this machinery to the assessment and collection of super-tax, and the questions to be determined on this appeal depend on the effect of this general referential application, and particularly with regard to any application to super-tax of the special provisions of section 41 of the Act of 1842.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt in his judgment has referred throughout to the similar provisions of the consolidating statute—namely, the Income Tax Act of 1918. But the appeal has been argued before us with reference to the similar provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1842, and Part IV. of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. The latter seems to me the more convenient course and is that which I propose to adopt. For these two Acts do in fact govern the earlier of the three periods which are in question. And further, in considering the incorporation in the later provisions of 1910 of the earlier existing provisions of 1842 it is of assistance to preserve the chronological order of the legislation.

Section 41 of the Act of 1842 provides that (amongst other persons) trustees having the management of the property of an infant shall be chargeable to income-tax in like manner and to the same amount as would be charged if the infant were of full age, and that every such trustee shall be answerable for the doing of all such acts as shall be required to be done by virtue of that Act in order to the assessing of any such infant to the duties granted by that Act and paying the same. It is clear that the respondent trustees were under this section chargeable for and liable to pay the income-tax payable as from August 21, 1915, in respect of the Irish estates which were comprised in the settlement of 1899.

Under subsection 2 of section 72 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, after service upon any person of a notice by the Special Commissioners requiring him to make a return of his total income from all sources, he becomes bound to make such a return, whether he is or is not chargeable with super-tax, these last words, I think, clearly referring to cases where the subject may think that he is below the super-tax limit, and they prevent such a person from refusing to make a return on that ground. And in the case of such a notice served upon any person who is chargeable with or liable to be assessed to income-tax under section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, as representing an incapacitated person (which phrase, of course, includes an infant), he is liable to make a return of the total income from all sources of the incapacitated person. It seems clear that the terms of this section apply to and include the respondent trustees, and impose a statutory obligation on them to make a return of at least the income of the Irish estates as comprised in the settlement of 1899. Indeed, this was hardly contested by the counsel for the respondents, and appears to be concluded by the decision in Brooke v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (34 The Times L.R., 142; [1918] 1 K.B., 257). And see also Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Huni (39 The Times L.R., 459; [1923] 2 K.B., 563), and Whitney v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (42 The Times L.R., 58; [1926] A.C., 37). Further, the words of the subsection, taken in their ordinary meaning, do in terms appear to impose a prima facie obligation on the respondent trustees to make a return of the total income of the infant, though ignorance as to any income other than that from the Irish estates may be a reasonable excuse under subsection (4) for failing to make a return of any such other income.

Then, after subsection (5), which enables the Special Commissioners to make an assessment in default of a satisfactory return, comes subsection (6), which is the really crucial one in this case. Under that subsection: "All provisions of the Income Tax Acts relating to persons who are to be chargeable with duty, assessments, and appeals against those assessments, and to the collection and recovery of duty, and to cases to be stated for the opinion of the High Court, shall, so far as they are applicable, apply to the charge, assessment, collection, and recovery of duty under this section." The question here is whether the respondent trustees are persons who fall within the words of that subsection and so are liable to have made upon them what the learned Judge in a very convenient phrase has called representative assessments.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt has pointed out with much force the marked distinction between income-tax and super-tax, consisting mainly in the partial, local, and piecemeal assessment of the one and the wide general assessment of the other. He has also pointed out the difficulties that may arise in certain cases through a sweeping application to super-tax of the principle of representative assessment, as enacted with regard to income-tax. And in the result he has, as I understand him, held that representative assessments cannot be made in respect of super-tax at all under this subsection. But in my judgment, and with great respect to him, he has allowed his consciousness of these difficulties to lead him in effect to strike out subsection (6) altogether from the statute. To my mind it is reasonably clear that subsection (6) is consequential on subsection (2), and deals with and renders representatively assessable to super-tax the same classes of representatives as are liable to make returns under subsection (2), who again are the same classes as are liable under section 41 of the Act of 1842 to representative assessments to income-tax. The Legislature in enacting subsection (6) and assimilating the liability of trustees for super-tax to their liability for income-tax must have had in mind the broad distinctions between income-tax and super-tax. And I do not think any construction of section 72, and particularly of subsection (6), is permissible which negatives altogether the possibility of representative assessments to super-tax. The marked distinction pointed out by the learned Judge between income-tax and super-tax might have formed a good ground for declining to pass legislation applying to the collection of super-tax machinery analogous to that already existing for the collection of income-tax. It does not, in my view, form a reason for interpreting the legislation, when once passed, in any other than the natural meaning of the words used. And I do not think that the language of subsection (6) as to persons chargeable with duty can be satisfied by construing it as referring merely to the liability of a husband to tax on his wife's income under section 45 of the Act of 1842.

The words in subsection (6) "so far as they are applicable" have still to be considered. Much more stress was laid upon them in the argument for the respondents than in the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt. But they do not seem to me sufficient to exclude, in the cases now in question, the prima facie representative assessability of the respondent trustees. Taking, for instance, the two years in which the income of the infant was derived from the Irish estates, I cannot see that the mere possibility that there might be some other income of the infant can prevent the provision of the Income Tax Acts with reference to the representative assessment of the trustees to income-tax from being applicable so as to render them representatively assessable to super-tax to the extent of the assessments which were actually made upon them. As regards these years at least the assessments on them would appear to be sustainable, for I omit for clearness the possibility that in the second year some small income had been brought in from the Bedfordshire estates.

Then again, take the case of the year 1919-20, when the income of the infant was derived both from the Irish estates under the settlement of 1899 and from the Bedfordshire estates under the settlement of 1862. Is there sufficient in the fact of there being this double source of income to relieve the trustees of the Irish estates from the obligation to make a return of the total income of the infant from both estates, or to exclude the trustees of the Irish estates from liability to assessment on the total income? I do not think so. No doubt, if these trustees are unable to ascertain and state the income of the Bedfordshire estates, this will be a reasonable excuse within subsection (4) for failure to make a return of total income, and will save them from any penalty under that subsection. But it will not prevent the Special Commissioners from making an assessment under subsection (5) if they choose. And I see no sufficient reason for holding that the circumstances of the case are such as to bring into play the saving words of subsection (6) and to make the provisions of section 41 of the Act of 1842 as to the assessment of these trustees to income-tax inapplicable to their assessment to super-tax in respect of the income of both estates.

There is, indeed, one case in which the provisions of section 41 might not be applicable to the assessment of trustees of a particular fund to super-tax—namely, a case in which the income of that fund was so small in proportion to the other income that the super-tax on the total income actually exceeded the income of the particular fund. In such a case the words "so far as applicable" might, no doubt, prevent any assessment of the trustees to an amount exceeding their trust income. But this would be a very exceptional case, and is obviously not the case here. As matters stand here, I do not see sufficient to render inapplicable the general statutory direction that the liability of the trustees to assessment to income-tax under section 41 is extended to a liability to assessment to super-tax, although that tax will be calculable on the income of both estates.

A great deal was made, in the argument for the respondents, of the difficulties that might arise where there were several trust funds, particularly in view of the present graduated rates of super-tax. I doubt whether it is permissible to rely on this last circumstance in construing the Act of 1910, which imposed a flat rate of duty only, unless, perhaps, for the purpose of urging that the graduation of the rate of duty is another circumstance which has by now prevented the provisions of section 41 of the Act of 1842 from being "applicable." But, in my opinion, these difficulties are more apparent than real. After all, the charge of super-tax falls ultimately not on the trustees, but on the total income of the infant cestui que trust, and it matters not at all, either to the infant or to the trustees sought to be assessed, whether the tax is taken from the income of one trust fund rather than of another, so long as the trustees of any one fund are not rendered liable for more than the whole income of their fund. In such a case, where their liability would exceed their funds, and in any other possible case in which the perfectly rigid application of the provisions of section 41 of the 1842 Act would be liable to cause actual injustice, this result would, I think, be prevented by the limiting words of subsection (6), "so far as applicable." But, in cases like the present, where there are two funds only and the figures are such that the assessment of super-tax on the trustees of the one fund (in this case the Irish estates) involves a liability very far short of the income of that fund, I cannot myself see that the provisions as to the assessment of these trustees to income-tax are so inapplicable to their assessment to super-tax as to except this case from the general legislative directions of section 72 and particularly of subsections (2) and (6) thereof.

In my opinion the judgment in this case should be reversed and the assessment on the trustees should be confirmed, subject, of course to the ascertainment of figures, which, it is agreed, need some examination and adjustment.

ADMINISTRATION — Grant—Minority interest —No grant to less than two individuals— Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), ss. 160 (1), 162 (1)].—Under ss. 160 (1) and 162 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, the Court cannot make a grant of administration to less than two individuals when it is aware that there is a minority interest.—In re White [C.A.] .. 729

AGRICULTURE—Minimum wage—Benefit or advantage reckoned as payment—Set-off—Onus of proof—Misrepresentation of age by worker — Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 37), s. 7 (1), (2), (3), (11)].—The employer of an agricultural worker is not entitled in proceedings under the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, to set off as a debt due from the worker the amount of any benefit or advantage which he is prohibited from reckoning as a payment in lieu of payment in cash. Where an employer is charged with paying a worker in agriculture less than the minimum rate of wages applicable, the onus of proof is on the prosecution to show what is the minimum rate applicable, and, as one of the elements on which the rate depends, to prove the age of the worker. When the prosecution have established what the minimum rate is it is for the accused (under s. 7 (2) of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924) to prove that he has paid not less than that rate. The rate payable is governed by the actual age of the worker, and it is no defence that he misrepresented his age.—Jones v. Harris [Div. Ct.] 1

ARBITRATION—Award—Reinsurance contract —Provision for arbitration in Norway—Contract not a policy—Not properly stamped as a policy—Action on award—Proper law applicable].—The plaintiffs, an insurance company in London, and the defendants, an insurance company in Norway, entered into a written contract headed "Reinsurance contract—Marine insurance." The contract was not a policy as it did not contain the particulars required by the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, and was not stamped as a policy, but it contained the usual terms of a reinsurance treaty, the plaintiffs being the reinsured and the defendants the reinsurers, and there was a clause providing that in the event of disputes an arbitration should take place in Norway. The contract was signed by the plaintiffs in Norway and by the defendants in London and was stamped with an English sixpenny stamp, but it was not stamped in accordance with the English law as to contracts of marine insurance. It was, however, valid by the law of Norway. An arbitration under the contract was held in Norway, and an award was issued in favour of the plaintiffs. In an action on the award the defendants submitted that, as the defendants resided in England and therefore the award against them could be enforced only in the English Courts, the law applicable to the whole contract must be the law of England, and that, since the contract neither was a policy as required by English law nor was properly stamped as such a policy, the plaintiffs could not recover on the award. Held, that as the action was brought on the award and not on the contract of reinsurance, and, as the proper inference from the provision as to the arbitration being held in Norway was that the parties intended the law of Norway to govern the contract, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum awarded.—Norske Atlas Insurance Company, Limited v. London General Insurance Company, Limited [MacKinnon, J.] 541

Lands—Compulsory acquisition—Illness of arbitrator — Replacement — Authority of Reference Committee—Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 57), s. 1].—Where an arbitrator, appointed by the Reference Committee under s. 1 of the Statute of Limitations—Award a condition precedent to an action—Cause of action not arising till after award—Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. I., c. 16), s. 3].—A steamship belonging to the claimants was requisitioned in 1917 on behalf of the Admiralty on the terms of charterparty T.99. Clause 18 provided that the Admiralty should not be liable for ordinary marine risks, and clause 19 that the war risks should be undertaken by the Admiralty. Clause 31 provided for arbitration as follows :—"Any dispute arising under this charter shall be referred, under the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, or any amendment thereof, to the arbitration of two persons, one to be nominated by the owners and the other by the Admiralty, and should such arbitrators be unable to agree, the decision of an umpire whom they must elect shall be final and binding upon both parties hereto, and it is further mutually agreed that such arbitration shall be a condition precedent to the commencement of any action at law." The steamship was sunk by collision in July, 1917, and in November, 1923, the claimants began arbitration proceedings against the Crown in respect of the war risk. The Admiralty set up the defence of the Statute of Limitations, 21 Jac. I., c. 16. The arbitrator made his award in 1925 in the form of a special case, finding that the ship was lost in consequence of warlike operations. Held, that as the words of clause 31 of the charterparty contemplated that an action at law could not be brought until the result of an arbitration had been obtained, no cause of action arose until after the award, and therefore the period of six years, fixed by 21 Jac. I., c. 16, did not begin to run till the making of the award, and no question of the Statute of Limitations arose. Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 731; [1927] 1 K.B., 269) affirmed.—BOARD OF TRADE v. CAYZER, IRVINE AND COMPANY, LIMITED [H.L.] .. 625

ASSIGNMENT — Assignment to trustee for benefit of creditors—Business and goodwill—Covenant by assignors to assist trustee in realizing the estate and in distribution of assets—Whether broken by solicitation of customers by assignors on behalf of rival business].—By a deed of assignment, the debtors, who were three brothers who had been carrying on a bakery business in partnership, assigned the business and goodwill thereof to the plaintiff as trustee. The debtors covenanted, inter alia, that they would "do all such acts and things in relation to the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors as may be reasonably required by the trustee, and will aid to the utmost of their power the realization of the debtors' property and the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the creditors." In an action by the plaintiff as trustee under the deed of assignment claiming an injunction to restrain the debtors from soliciting the customers of the business for orders for and on behalf of themselves and the defendant Cooper, who carried on business as a baker, and to restrain the defendant Cooper from instigating the debtors so to do, Held, that the action would not lie against the defendant Cooper, as the acts which it was alleged that he instigated were not wrongful. As the debtors themselves were justified in law in soliciting the customers of the business, and were not precluded from so doing by their covenant, the defendant Cooper could not be restrained from instigating them so to do. Green v. Morris (30 The Times L.R., 301; [1914] 1 Ch., 562) approved and applied.—FAREY v. COOPER AND OTHERS [C.A.] 803

Chose in action—Debt—Amount recoverable expressed to be less than debt—Whether absolute assignment of the whole—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 136].—The defendant owed £285 to one W., who owed money to the plaintiff bank, and W. assigned to the bank the debt owed to him by the defendant. The assignment, which was in writing, provided that "the amount recoverable under these presents shall not at any time exceed the sum of £150." Due notice of the assignment was given to the defendant. In an action upon the assignment, Held, that the assignment was not an assignment of part only of the debt, but an absolute assignment of the whole debt with a proviso that if the bank recovered more than £150 they must hold the balance as trustees for the assignor, and it was therefore a good legal assignment, and that even if it was an assignment of part only of the debt it would still be a good equitable assignment, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.—BANK OF LIVERPOOL AND MARTINS, LIMITED v. stand in place of creditors].—The defendant bank negligently and in breach of the instructions given by their customer the plaintiff company paid cheques drawn on the company's account signed by one director only. All the cheques were paid to the company's trade creditors. Held, (1) that the bank being put on inquiry and being negligent (as the jury found) were not entitled to rely on the rule in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (6 E. and B., 327) and assume that a signature purporting to be that of a new director was that of a person duly appointed; (2) that whether the plaintiff company's account was in credit or in debit at the time of the payments to trade creditors the bank were, on the equitable doctrine under which a person who has in fact paid the debts of another without authority is allowed to take advantage of his payment, entitled to credit for the cheques paid in discharge of the debts of the plaintiff company. An inquiry was ordered into the circumstances of payment of each cheque.—B. LIGGETT (LIVERPOOL), LIMITED, v. BARCLAYS BANK, LIMITED [Wright, J.] .. 449

Garnishee order—Bank balance of debtor in foreign branch of English bank—Banker's duty to customer—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XLV., r. 1].—Money held by an English bank to the credit of a judgment debtor at a foreign branch cannot be made the subject of a garnishee order by an English Court, as such money is not recoverable within the jurisdiction.—RICHARDSON v. RICHARDSON AND THE NATIONAL BANK OF INDIA, LIMITED [Hill, J.] 631

Negligence—Cheque—Directions by customer to stop payment — Wrong number mentioned — Other particulars correct — Cheque honoured by bank].—The plaintiff, who had an account with the defendant bank, on July 31, 1924, drew a cheque, No. 117285, and post-dated it August 2. On August 1 he telegraphed to the defendants to stop payment of cheque No. 117283, mentioning the payee and the amount. These particulars were correct as to cheque No. 117285, but the number of the cheque was wrong. Cheque No. 117285 was presented on August 6, and the bank officials paid it, supposing that it had been drawn in place of the one that had been stopped. In an action for negligence, Held, that as the one certain item of identification was the number the bank was not guilty of negligence, and the action failed. Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 423) reversed.—WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED v. HILTON [H.L.] 124

Negligence — Transmission of money abroad — Cheque sent by registered letter — No insurance — Failure to reach payee — Forgery of indorsement—Clearance of cheque —Non-liability of bank].—The plaintiffs, being customers of the defendants, who were bankers in London, instructed them to transmit a sum of money to a person in Rumania, and the defendants sent a cheque by registered post to him personally. The cheque never reached him, but someone apparently put on it a forged indorsement of his name, and it was eventually cleared through a bank in Poland, and the defendants debited the plaintiffs with the amount. In an action for negligence the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants should have sent the cheque by a letter which was insured in addition to being registered. Held, that as the loss of a cheque was a rare occurrence, and as the standard of the defendants' duty should not be measured by a consideration of all the precautions which subsequent events might suggest, the action failed.—OSE GESELLSCHAFT, &C., v. JEWISH COLONIAL TRUST [MacKinnon, J.] 398

Overdraft — Fraudulent book-entries by manager for own advantage—Notional credit and debit—Rights of customer].—The account of a customer with the plaintiff bank was overdrawn. The manager, for the purpose of concealing the overdraft from the auditors, fraudulently credited the account with a sum sufficient to put it in credit, and subsequently debited it with a similar sum. In an action by the bank against the customer, Held, that the customer could not rely upon the credit as payment and repudiate the debit as being unauthorized.—BRITISH AND NORTH EUROPEAN BANK, LIMITED v. ZALZTEIN [Sankey, J.] 299

BANKRUPTCY—Bankruptcy notice—Act of bankruptcy—Validity of notice disputed—Fresh bankruptcy notice issued—Whether debtor bound to comply with fresh notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 59), ss. 1 (g), 2, 37].—Creditors having obtained judgment issued a bankruptcy notice for £945 and served it on the debtors. The debtors paid a sum of £100, including £5 for costs, nine days later, but in the belief that the notice would be disputed the creditors issued and served a fresh bankruptcy notice about two months later for £857, and, that notice not having been complied with within seven days, a petition based on the fresh bankruptcy notice was presented and served. The debtors gave notice of an application to set aside service of the petition, but the Registrar refused to do so, and made a receiving order on the fresh bankruptcy notice. On appeal, Held, that the debtors could not refuse to comply with the fresh bankruptcy notice on the ground that as the previous notice had resulted in an act of bankruptcy this had put it out of the power of the debtors to make any payment in compliance with the fresh notice or otherwise deal with their property. If, however, they did make a payment in compliance with the fresh notice it might be that if a trustee were appointed under the previous bankruptcy notice the payment might be set aside, and the money made available for the general body of creditors.

A wife who was possessed of certain shares died intestate. Her husband took out administration, settled the shares upon trusts for the daughter of the marriage, and became bankrupt within two years. Held, that notwithstanding the operation of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the independence which it gave to a wife in the holding of her property, the husband had taken the shares jure mariti, or "in right of his wife," and the settlement upon the daughter was not void. —IN RE BOWER WILLIAMS [C.A.] 225

and the defendants could not contend that the cheque was a document given in escrow, so as not to impose liability until the fulfilment of a special condition, since both the drawer and indorser, when signing the document, had intended that it should be used and negotiated as a cheque.—GUILDFORD TRUST, LIMITED v. Company—Receiver for debenture-holders—Signature as drawer—Words of description—Surrounding circumstances — Intention of parties—Right of receiver to sue acceptors—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 26 (1) (2)].—By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 26, subsection 1 : "Where a person signs a bill as drawer, indorser, or acceptor, and adds words to his signature, indicating that he signs for or on behalf of a principal, or in a representative character, he is not personally liable thereon ; but the mere addition to his signature of words describing him as an agent, or as filling a representative character, does not exempt him from personal liability." By subsection 2 : "In determining whether a signature on a bill is that of the principal or that of the agent by whose hand it is written, the construction most favourable to the validity of the instrument shall be adopted." The plaintiff, who had been appointed receiver on behalf of the debenture-holders of a limited company, sued the defendants as acceptors of a number of bills of exchange. The bills were signed by "R. Kettle, Receiver, Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited" as drawer. They had been accepted in respect of goods supplied by the company to the defendants, and the plaintiff had stated that it must be "clearly understood that I am in no way accepting any liability or responsibility whatever in respect of the orders themselves." The defendants contended that these were "surrounding circumstances" from which the inference should be drawn that the plaintiff did not intend to make himself personally a party to the bills and that, therefore, he was not entitled to sue upon them. Held, that the above were not "surrounding circumstances" from which the intention of the parties could be inferred, and that such intention must be gathered from the terms of the document alone ; that the words "Receiver, Ford Paper Works (1923), Limited" were words of description only, and that the bills did not purport to have been drawn on behalf of the company. The plaintiff, therefore, was entitled to recover against the defendants upon the bills. Chapman v. Smethurst (25 The Times L.R., 383 ; [1909] 1 K.B., 927) and *Elliott v. French law—Action by indorsees—Whether acceptors liable on bill—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), ss. 32 (1), 72 (1)].—A bill of exchange was drawn in France by E. V. upon the defendants in London to the order of M. V., and the defendants accepted it. It was indorsed in France to the plaintiffs by E. V. with the authority of M.V., but the signature was not expressed to be for M. V., and on presentment the defendants declined to pay the bill as it did not bear the indorsement of M. V. In an action by the indorsees against the acceptors evidence was given that a valid indorsement might be made according to French law by an agent signing his own name if he was so authorized by the payee, and the trial Judge held that though by s. 72 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the validity of the indorsement "as regards requisites in form" was governed by French law, this provision did not let in the French law so as to dispense with the signature of the payee as required by s. 32 (1), and the plaintiffs could not recover. Held, that as the trial Judge had accepted the evidence as to the French law, and as by s. 72 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the validity of the indorsement as regards requisites in form was governed by French law, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. BY-LAW — Reasonableness — Ultra vires—Restraint of trade—Severn Navigation Acts, 1842 to 1920].—By the Severn Navigation Act, 1920, s. 9, extending s. 16 of the Severn Navigation Act, 1914, the Severn Commissioners were empowered to make by-laws "for prescribing the place or places at public wharves and quays at which passengers and goods may be embarked or disembarked. . . . " None of their enabling Acts empowered the Commissioners to impose tolls on persons embarking or disembarking. To prevent the dangerous racing of rival steamers starting from private landing-stages at Worcester, the Commissioners made a by-law : "No person shall anchor or moor any passenger vessel near to or against any portion of Worcester Quay for the purpose of enabling any passenger to be taken on board or disembarked from such passenger vessel . . . if and so long as the Corporation of the City of Worcester maintain . . . a pier . . . or piers . . . connected with the quay and available for giving access from the quay to a passenger vessel . . . and allow any persons desirous of travelling by a passenger vessel to enter upon and pass along the said piers . . . who have previously paid to the Corporation or their authorized agent, such sum, not exceeding twopence, as the Corporation may be entitled to charge in respect of every such person, which sum shall allow the person paying the same to pass along the said piers

. . . to the quay when disembarking from the said passenger vessel on the same day as that on which the said sum was paid." Held (Shearman, J., dissenting), that this by-law was not ultra vires, unreasonable, or in restraint of trade. It did not impose a tax or toll upon the public but restricted the duration of the by-law for the protection of the public to the period during which the charge made (assuming that the Corporation were entitled to make any charge at all) did not exceed twopence. The justification for the charge, if its legality were challenged, was not to be found in the by-law, but must be derived *aliunde. CANADA—Admiralty jurisdiction—Claims under charterparties—No local residence of parties impleaded—No cause of suit arising within the local jurisdiction—Whether process in rem competent—Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 27), s. 2 (2)].—Under s. 2 (2) of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890, apart from local legislation, a Court of Admiralty in Canada cannot, irrespectively of the residence of the defendant or place of origin of the alleged cause of action, be called upon by arrest of a vessel within its area to adjudicate upon all claims of plaintiffs suing under any charterparty made in respect of the vessel. Similarly, throughout the Empire, outside England, litigants in Courts of Admiralty jurisdiction have, apart from local legislation, no right of proceeding by process in rem in respect of like claims, in like circumstances of the absence of local residence of parties impleaded and the non-existence of any cause of suit arising within the local jurisdiction. The above Act defines as a maximum of jurisdictional authority for the Courts to be set up thereunder the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England as it existed at the time when the Act was passed. The Act therefore does not include in such jurisdictional authority the jurisdiction in claims on charterparties which was for the first time conferred on the Admiralty Division of the High Court in England by s. 5 of the Administration of Justice Act, 1920.—THE YURI MARU. CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY SEA—Damage by oil fuel—Unseaworthiness—Design of ship—Bad workmanship—Leakage from oil bunker—Non-responsibility of shipowners].—The plaintiffs shipped a quantity of carcasses of lamb for carriage from Australia to London by a new oil-fuel steamer built for the defendants. The bills of lading incorporated the rules in the Schedule to the Australian Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, by which the carrier is not liable for damage from unseaworthiness unless caused by want of due diligence to make the ship seaworthy. During the voyage some of the rivets between an oil bunker and the hold became loose, and oil leaked through and tainted the meat. In an action for damages the plaintiffs contended that the ship was unseaworthy, in the sense of being unfit for the carriage of the particular cargo, by reason of inefficient design or of bad workmanship, and the defendants pleaded that the unseaworthiness (if any) was not owing to any want of due diligence on their part. Held, that the damage was caused by defects of design, and, although in view of recent experience the particular design was unsatisfactory, yet the adoption of it, at the time when the ship was built, did not involve any lack of due diligence on the part of the defendants, and that, although bad workmanship did to some extent contribute to the damage, yet, as it was not such as could have been discovered by the defendants' inspectors, and as the shipbuilders were not servants or agents of the defendants, the defendants were not liable for it, and therefore the action failed.—W. CHILDREN — Youthful offender — Reformatory school — Residence — Liability for maintenance—Children Act, 1908 (8 Ed. He was then taken to stay with his grandparents in Wiltshire for three months while his mother went abroad to her husband. He had then no home to which he could return in London. On July 18, 1926, he committed an offence in Wiltshire and was ordered to be sent to a reformatory school, London being specified in the order as his place of residence, the London County Council being thereby made liable for his maintenance. Held, that there was no evidence of an actual residence in London at the date of the offence, and therefore, though he was in Wiltshire only on a temporary visit, he was presumed to reside there under s. 74 (3) of the Children Act, 1908, and the liability for his maintenance fell on the Wiltshire County Council.—LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. No woman member of the club received notice of that meeting, as none of the women members held any

The power to alter or add to the articles under this section must be exercised, not only in the manner required by law, but also bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole, and the question whether a given alteration of or addition to the articles is for the benefit of the company is a question for the shareholders, acting bona fide, and not for the Court, and the Court will not interfere with the action of the shareholders except on grounds on which it would interfere with a verdict of a jury. Dicta of Peterson, J., in *Dafen Tinplate Company, Limited v. Bills of exchange—Bills wrongfully drawn by branch manager on behalf of company—Ostensible authority to bind company—Forgery—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 24—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 69), s. 77].—The defendants, a limited company, by their memorandum had power to sign, make, draw, accept and indorse bills of exchange. By article 18 of the articles of association the directors were empowered "to determine who shall be entitled to sign and make, draw, accept and indorse on the company's behalf bills, notes, receipts, acceptances, indorsements, cheques, releases, contracts and documents." The defendants carried on business in London as general carriers and forwarding agents, and they had a branch office at Manchester, of which one Sydney Clarke was manager. Clarke was also concerned in the formation of a company known as Clarke and Walker, Limited. Having bought goods on behalf of the last-named company, Clarke, without any authority to do so from the defendants, drew seven bills on behalf of the defendants signed "S. Clarke, Manchester Manager." The bills were made out to the order of the drawers, accepted by Clarke and Walker, Limited, and indorsed on behalf of the defendants "S. Clarke, Manchester Manager." The bills were discounted by the plaintiff bank, and when they were dishonoured by the acceptors the plaintiff bank as holders in due course sued the defendants as drawers, but the latter repudiated the whole transaction, and stated that Clarke had acted without authority. Held, (1) that in the absence of evidence that the branch manager had ostensible authority to draw bills on behalf of the company, the plaintiffs were not entitled to assume that he had such authority (Houghton and Co. v. Nothard, Lowe and Wills, [1927] 1 K.B., 246, followed), and (2) that the bills were forgeries and therefore null and void and the defendants were not precluded from setting up the forgery or the want of authority of the manager. *Ruben and Ladenburg v. General meeting — Right to attend and vote — Non-cumulative preferred ordinary shares—No right of holders to attend unless dividend in arrear—Meaning of "in arrear" in the articles].—A company's articles of association provided that the original preference shares, carrying a cumulative preferential dividend of 7 per cent., should not confer upon the holders the right to attend and vote at any general meeting or to have notice thereof unless (inter alia) the dividend thereon was "in arrear" for more than three months. Subsequently the capital of the company was increased by the issue of preferred ordinary shares with the right to a non-cumulative preferential dividend of 10 per cent. payable in respect of each year exclusively out of the profits earned in each year and to rank after the preference shares. It was further provided that the holders of these preferred ordinary shares should, mutatis mutandis, be subject to the same restrictions as to receiving notices of and attending and voting at general meetings as the holders of original preference shares. Since 1920 no profits had been available to pay dividends, and for the general meeting of 1926 the holders of preferred ordinary shares received no summonses. In an action by holders of such shares against the company for a declaration that they were entitled to have notice of and to attend and vote at the general meetings, Held, that the words "in arrear," in the context in which they appeared in the articles, could not be construed to cover the non-payment of a non-cumulative preference dividend payable out of the profits of each year and not paid because there were no profits available for the dividend, and the action failed.—COULSON v. CONFLICT OF LAWS — Debt — Assignment—Validity—Deposit in English bank—Assignment made abroad — Invalidity by foreign law—Validity by English law—Which law applicable].—In 1906 the defendant's father, when President of the Republic of Guatemala, deposited a sum of money with London bankers. The President was afterwards deposed and imprisoned, and by letters written in prison in the year 1921 he admitted that the money belonged to the Republic, and he ordered the bankers to place the amount at the exclusive disposal of the Government of Guatemala. The defendant gave notice to the bankers that his father had assigned the money to him by a letter written in 1919, during the defendant's infancy, and, when a demand was also made upon them on behalf of the Republic of Guatemala, they declined to hand over the money. The Republic then brought an action against the bankers, and they brought the money into Court, and an interpleader issue was directed between the Republic as plaintiffs and the ex-President's son as defendant. The plaintiffs alleged that the money had been misappropriated from the Republic by the defendant's father, and that the assignment to the defendant in 1919 was invalid by the law of Guatemala owing to non-compliance with the formalities requisite in the case of an infant donee. The defendant pleaded that the assignment to him in 1919 was valid by the law of England, and that the letters of 1921 had been written by his father under duress. Held, that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the money had been misappropriated from the Republic, and that, although the assignment of 1919 to the defendant was valid by the law of England, yet, as the law applicable was that of Guatemala, the claims of both parties failed. After the plaintiff reached the age of 65 the defendants altered their rules by providing that agents should be compulsorily retired at the age of 65, and in accordance with the amended rules the defendants terminated the plaintiff's employment. Carriage by sea—Responsibility of carrier—Fault of his agents or servants—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22), Schedule, Art. IV., r. 2 (q)].—By Art. IV., rule 2, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from—(a) Act, neglect, or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship. . . . (q) Any other cause arising without the actual fault or privity of the carrier, or without the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier, but the burden of proof shall be on the person claiming the benefit of this exception to show that neither the actual fault or privity of the carrier nor the fault or neglect of the agents or servants of the carrier contributed to the loss or damage." The plaintiffs shipped a case of cotton goods on the defendants' steamer at Liverpool for carriage to Tampico and delivery there. Without the fault or privity of the defendants, and in spite of the vigilance of the ship's officers, the goods were stolen by the servants of the stevedores, who were employed by the ship's agents to discharge the cargo at Vera Cruz, where the ship called before going to Tampico. In an action for non-delivery, Held, that the stealing of the cargo was not an act in the management of the ship, and therefore the defendants were not protected by rule 2 (a) ; and that in rule 2 (q) the words "or without" must be read as "and without," and therefore, although the defendants themselves were free from blame, yet, since the servants of the stevedores were the defendants' agents, and since the defendants, in order to succeed, had to prove that both they themselves and their servants or agents were free from blame, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. For this purpose part of the cargo had to be shifted, and rain got into the hold, and when the tinplates were discharged at Vancouver they were found to have been damaged by rust. In an action for damages for breach of duty in the carriage of the tinplates, the Court found that the facts were as above stated and that if the damage was not caused by rain getting into the hold the cause was unexplained. Held, that the defendants had failed to carry out the obligation imposed on them by Art. III., rule 2, of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, carefully to stow, keep, and care for the goods, and that, even if the cause of the damage was unexplained, the onus was not on the cargo-owners to prove negligence but on the shipowners to prove that neither they nor their servants had been guilty of negligence contributing to the loss, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.—GOSSE MILLARD, LIMITED v. By the bill of lading the defendants were to have the protection given by the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924. After discharge was begun at Shanghai by stevedores, who were independent contractors, some of the cloth was stolen from the steamer. It was admitted that the loss had occurred without the actual fault or privity of the defendants themselves. In an action for damages for breach of contract, Held, that the stevedores must be treated as "agents or servants" of the defendants within Rule 2 of Article IV. of the Schedule to the Act, and, as on the facts the defendants had failed to establish that the theft had not been committed by the stevedores' men, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.—HEYN AND OTHERS v. Indemnity—Undertaking to indemnify against all claims—Whether inclusive of claims by the persons giving the undertaking].—The plaintiffs took a lease of premises from the defendant railway company, and, by an agreement supplemental to the lease, the defendants gave the plaintiffs permission, on certain terms, to use for the transport of materials a portable gangway which could be moved over certain of the defendants' railway lines. One of the terms was that the plaintiffs "agree and undertake to indemnify the said [railway] company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway." When the plaintiffs were using the gangway some trucks were shunted down the line, and the gangway was destroyed. In an action for damages for negligence and/or breach of duty the defendants denied liability and pleaded the aforesaid term of the supplemental agreement. On a preliminary point as to the construction of the agreement, Held (Sargant, L.J., dissenting), that the undertaking was only one to hold the defendants harmless against claims by third parties, and the preliminary point must be decided in favour of the plaintiffs. Sale of goods — Condition — Breach—Right of rejection—Whether validly exercised—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), ss. 11 (1) (c), 30 (3), 35].—The appellants sold to the respondents, for shipment from Hamburg to Liverpool, a cargo of coal to consist of briquettes, size 2in., the contract providing as follows:—"Bills of lading to be accepted by buyers as absolute and conclusive proof of weight, quality, and description, the buyers having right of inspecting the cargo. No warranty is expressed or implied, and sellers accept no responsibility in regard to the description, size, quality, condition, or fitness for steaming purposes or otherwise of the coal or fuel contracted for or supplied, and no reduction in price will be made in respect of any such matters." The respondents required the coal to supply power stations, and at the time of the contract the appellants were aware of this. The cargo was shipped, some of it being in the holds and the remainder on deck and covering the hatch covers. On arrival at Liverpool the vessel had to wait for a discharging berth, and the captain, finding that the cargo in the holds was heating, bought the deck cargo from the respondents and removed it and opened the hatches. The respondents then found that though the briquettes on the deck were of the contractual size the briquettes in the holds were larger and were not suitable for use in power stations, and they gave notice of rejection of the whole cargo. Held, on a case stated by an arbitrator, (1) that it was a condition of the contract that the briquettes should be of the size of 2in., and the condition was effective as the warranty clause dealt only with warranties as such and did not affect a condition; (2) that the respondents had a right to reject the underdeck part of the cargo, but that as they had claimed the right to reject the whole cargo they had never validly exercised their right to reject the underdeck part; and (3) that they were remitted to their right to recover damages for breach of a condition, namely, failure to ship a cargo in conformity with the contract.—WILLIAM BARKER (JUNIOR) AND CO., LIMITED v. ED. T. AGIUS, LIMITED [Salter, J.] 751

Sale of goods—Defect—Cylinder for ship's engines — Supply to ship repairers—Subject to "our usual" guarantee clause — Damages for detention of ship — Uncertainty as to clause indicated].—The plaintiffs, a ship-repairing company, requiring a new intermediate pressure cylinder for the engine of a steamer which they had contracted to repair, obtained a quotation from the defendants, who were marine engineers. At the head of the defendants' letter was a printed notice, "All offers are subject to our usual strike and guarantee clauses, accidents, &c." The plaintiffs ordered the cylinder, but after it had been delivered and fitted it was found to be defective. A new cylinder was subsequently supplied by the defendants, but owing to the delay the plaintiffs were not able to complete the repairs in accordance with their contract with the shipowners, and had to pay them damages. In an action to recover the amount of the damages the defendants alleged that the contract for the supply of the cylinder was made subject to "our usual" guarantee clause and that their guarantee clause provided (inter alia) that "the contractors shall not in any case be liable for any detention of the vessel or other consequential damages howsoever arising." Held, that as it was not clear what guarantee clause was incorporated, since the clause suggested by the defendants was inapplicable to the contract, and as it was not proved that the defendants had made it clear that they intended to limit their liability, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Sale of goods—Specific performance—Purchase of 1,000 tons of wheat to be loaded on named ship—Sale of 500 tons—Arrival of ship with wheat in bulk—Payment—Bankruptcy of vendor—"Specific or ascertained" goods—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), s. 52].—One W. made a c.i.f. contract to buy 1,000 tons of wheat to be loaded in America on a named ship for Avonmouth, and the respondents then made a c.i.f. contract to buy 500 tons of it from him. Subsequently the wheat was shipped in bulk and a bill of lading for the 1,000 tons was received by W. on January 4, 1926, the price being payable on February 6. On January 5 W. delivered to the respondents a provisional invoice for the 500 tons, the price of which, less half the freight payable at destination, was due on February 6. On February 5 the respondents gave W. a cheque for the price of the 500 tons. On February 24 W. was adjudicated bankrupt, and on February 28 the vessel arrived at Avonmouth with the wheat in bulk. On an application by the respondents against the trustee for specific performance of the contract by delivery of the 500 tons on payment of their proportion of the freight, Held (Sargant, L.J., dissenting), that the 500 tons were not specific or ascertained goods within s. 52 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and therefore specific performance of the contract would not be ordered. Theatrical engagement—Agreement to advertise the performer—Refusal by employers to allow performer to play the part—Payment of full salary—Action for breach—Obligation to allow performer to act—Damages for loss of reputation].—The plaintiff, an actress, was engaged by the defendants to play a certain part in a play for the period of rehearsal and for the run of the play, and there was a collateral agreement that the defendants would advertise her in a prominent position. The defendants refused to allow the plaintiff to play the part, but they paid her the whole of her salary down to the end of the run of the play. In an action for breach of contract the jury awarded to the plaintiff, over and above her salary already paid, damages for loss of reputation through her not being employed to play the part. The defendants contended that under the written contract they were under no obligation to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for loss of reputation. Held, that there was an obligation to give the plaintiff an opportunity of acting, and the plaintiff was entitled, in addition to her salary already paid, to the damages awarded by the jury for loss of reputation. CONVERSION—Mercantile agent—Possession as such—Consent of owner—Wrongful sale by agent—Title of purchaser—Estoppel—Factors Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict., c. 45), ss. 1, 2].—The plaintiff was the owner of certain tapestries, known as the Aubusson tapestry and the Leopard tapestry, and he gave to one P., a dealer in antiques, a limited authority to obtain and submit offers from possible purchasers. P. falsely represented to the plaintiff that he could obtain £525 for the Aubusson tapestry, and the plaintiff allowed him to take it away for delivery to a purchaser, who in fact did not exist. P. then sold the Aubusson tapestry to the defendant for £250. Subsequently P., who never had authority to sell the Leopard tapestry, stole it from the plaintiff and sold it to the defendant. In an action for conversion the defendant contended that P. had been in possession of the tapestries as a mercantile agent within the meaning of the Factors Act, 1889, and that as he had bought them from P. in good faith he had acquired the property in them. He also contended that the plaintiff had held out P. as a person with authority to sell and was therefore estopped from saying that P. had no such authority in fact. Held, that although P.'s authority was limited, and although he was not acting for any principal other than the plaintiff, yet these facts did not prevent him from being a mercantile agent, and, in the circumstances he was a mercantile agent in possession of the Aubusson tapestry with the consent of the plaintiff, and therefore as to that tapestry the defence under the Factors Act, 1889, was established, but, as to the Leopard tapestry, that as P. was never in possession of it with the plaintiff's consent, the defence under the Act failed, and, as the plaintiff had never represented to the defendant that P. had authority to sell it, there was no estoppel, and therefore the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the Leopard tapestry alone.—LOWTHER v. HARRIS [Wright, J.] 24

COPYRIGHT — Broadcasting—Opera—Music—Performance in public—"Broadcasting" by wireless telephony—Grant by composer of right to perform—Assignment or licence—Whether grant determinable on death—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), s. 1].—By an agreement dated March 23, 1905, the plaintiff granted to G. E. "the sole and exclusive right of representing or performing" in certain areas a play, of the music of which the plaintiff was the composer. G. E. died in 1915, and in 1920 his executors assigned to a limited company the benefits of copyrights and other rights previously held by G. E. In October, 1926, the limited company agreed to permit the defendants to "broadcast" by wireless telephony a performance of the opera. The defendants "broadcast" the opera from their studio, to which the public was not admitted. Held, that the defendants, in doing so, gave a public performance of the opera within section 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and that, as the agreement of March 23, 1905, was not an assignment by the plaintiff to G. E. of all his performing rights, but was a licence confined to ordinary performances at a theatre, and of such a personal character as to be determinable on the death of G. E., the defendants had acquired no lawful licence to perform the opera in public and were, therefore, liable in damages to the plaintiff for breach of copyright.—MESSAGER v. BRITISH BROADCASTING COMPANY, LIMITED [McCardie, J.] 818

Infringement — Musical work — Performance in public — Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), ss. 1, 2].—The question whether the performance of a musical work was a performance in public, so as to constitute an infringement of copyright, is a question of fact, and, in determining that question, the quantum of damage likely to accrue and the number and class of persons having a right to be present at the performance are factors to be noted. COUNTY COURT — Jurisdiction—Breach of promise of marriage—Action for return of articles given during engagement—Alleged bailment].—The respondent brought a County Court action against the applicant for the return of certain money and articles, alleging that the parties had promised to marry one another and that the applicant had broken the promise. The applicant applied for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the County Court on the ground that the action was really one for breach of promise of marriage and that therefore the County Court had no jurisdiction. The respondent contended that the action was brought on a bailment, which was within the County Court jurisdiction. Held, that in substance the claim was for damages for breach of promise of marriage and the writ must issue. Hunt v. North Staffordshire Railway Company (2 H. and N., 451) followed.—PARSONS v. V., c. 73), s. 1].—By s. 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as amended by s. 1 of the County Courts Act, 1919: "In any action commenced in the High Court, where—(1) the plaintiff's claim is founded either on contract or on tort and the amount claimed or remaining in dispute . . . does not exceed £100, whether the action could or could not have been commenced in a County Court, . . . either party may . . . apply to the Court or a Judge for an order that the claim . . . shall be transferred" to the County Court. Where a borrower from a moneylender issues a writ in the High Court, claiming relief under the Moneylenders Acts, the claim being limited to £100, such a claim is one founded on contract within the meaning of s. 1 of the County Courts Act, 1919, and can be transferred to the County Court for trial under that section.—WHITE v. Threatening to accuse of certain crime with intent to extort money—Use of words capable of meaning some offence not within the enactment—"Improper conduct"—Larceny Act, 1916 (6 and 7 Geo. The evidence was that they enticed a man into a compromising situation with one of themselves and then threatened to accuse him of "improper conduct." Held, that the mere fact of the words being capable of being understood to mean some offence not within the section was no defence, as it was a question for the jury what was the effect on the mind of the man on whom they were intended to operate, and as there was evidence on which the jury could properly come to the conclusion that the threat was a threat to accuse of the particular crime mentioned in the indictment; and that therefore the convictions must be affirmed.—Rex v. VII., c. 29), s. 29—Patents and Designs Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 80), s. 8].—The plaintiff Mackenzie-Kennedy, who was a consulting engineer and designer of aeroplanes, designed an aeroplane with a tail gunpit, and under a contract of July, 1916, with the Director-General of Military Aeronautics he agreed to carry out the work of its construction for the War Office, and it was alleged for the plaintiffs that it was an implied term of the contract that the specifications and designs were not to be disclosed to rival designers but were to be used only by the Directorate of Military Aeronautics, the Admiralty, and the Air Board. The plaintiffs further alleged that the Air Board disclosed the designs in 1917 to an aeroplane company, with the result that the company fitted a tail gunpit to an aeroplane of their own. In 1918 the company applied for a patent for it, and thereupon Mackenzie-Kennedy applied for a patent, which was granted, subject to a reference to the company's patent. The plaintiffs alleged that in 1917 and 1918 orders were given by the Government to the company for aeroplanes fitted with Mackenzie-Kennedy's tail gunpit and that but for the disclosure of his designs the orders must have been given to him. In an action by Mackenzie-Kennedy and his trustee in bankruptcy against the Air Council the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that Mackenzie-Kennedy's patent was valid, damages, and royalties, and a declaration that he was entitled to have compensation determined in pursuance of the Patents and Designs Acts, 1907 and 1919. Held, that the Air Council was not liable to be sued on any contract made on behalf of the Crown, and that under s. 29 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1907, as substituted by s. 8 of the Patents and Designs Act, 1919, an action was not the proper procedure, and therefore the action failed. Provided that administration of the drugs by or under the direct personal supervision of a duly qualified medical practitioner . . . shall not be deemed to be supplying the drug within the meaning of this and the following regulations." Held, that the word "administration" in the proviso to reg. 4 as to administration by a medical man is not confined to administration in an emergency as contrasted with a general supply, and that the words "personal supervision" are not limited to cases where the medical man is personally present when the dose is taken.—KINGSBURY v. V., c. 49), s. 178].—The petitioner filed a petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent, and it was disclosed to the Court that the petitioner and the co-respondent had agreed (1) that the co-respondent should pay the petitioner £2,500 damages, of which £1,750 was to be paid down and the rest later, and (2) that the petitioner should claim no further damages from the co-respondent and should put no obstacles in the way of a decree nisi being made absolute. The petition was therefore dismissed on the ground that the suit was collusive. After the dismissal the respondent and the co-respondent continued to live in adultery, and the petitioner, who had received the £1,750, presented a second petition against them, complaining of the adultery since the date of the former petition. Held, that the petitioner had by the agreement prevented himself from complaining of any adultery whether past or future, and that therefore he had connived at the adultery of which in his second petition he complained, and the second petition must be dismissed.—GIFFORD v. V., c. 60), s. 1; Schedule, para. 1 (b)].—The unmarried parents of an illegitimate child married one another, the father being domiciled in England at the time of the marriage. Subsequently the husband obtained a decree nisi of divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery, and he applied that there should be inserted in the decree nisi, (1) a declaration that the child was the legitimated child of the parties, and (2) an order that he should be given the custody of the child. Held, that although upon the evidence the conditions of s. 1 of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, had been fulfilled, yet, as the child was not a party to the suit, the Court ought not to adjudicate upon the question whether the child was legitimated by the Act, since the Court was not, unless the child was a party, a "Court of competent jurisdiction" within para. 1 (b) of the Schedule to the Act; and that therefore the Court had, as matters stood, no power to make an order for the custody of the child.—BEDNALL v. Subsequently the respondent married the co-respondent, a domiciled Dutchman, and she was now resident in Holland. The respondent paid the damages into Court out of her separate estate, and she obtained leave to enter an appearance so that she might be heard on the question of their payment out. The petitioner, by leave, then presented a petition for an order that the respondent should make a settlement on the two children, and the respondent entered an appearance to this petition. The Registrar reported that the respondent had an income of £500 a year, mainly from foreign investments, and he submitted that the £1,000 damages should be paid out to the petitioner and that the respondent should be ordered to settle £100 a year on each child. The petitioner moved to confirm the report as to the damages and to vary it by an order on the respondent to lodge in Court £4,000 to be settled on the children. The respondent opposed the motion on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to make the variation asked for. Held, that the £1,000 damages ought to be paid out of Court to the petitioner, but that, as the respondent was not domiciled in England and had no property in England, and as her appearance was not entered to meet the claim made on the motion and was qualified by a denial of jurisdiction, there should be no order on the respondent to settle money on the children or to lodge money in Court for the purpose of such a settlement.—TALLACK v. EDUCATION—Defective child—Parent—Father a convict—Child residing with mother—Consent to child being sent to special school—Education Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 51), ss. 42, 53, 54 (1), 170 (12)].—The parent whose consent is required to be given or unreasonably withheld before a defective child can be ordered, under s. 54 (1) of the Education Act, 1921, to be sent to a special school which is not within reach of the child's residence or to a boarding school, is the parent who has de facto custody of the child. Hence in a case where the father of a defective child was a convict serving a term of penal servitude and the child resided with its mother, Held, that the mother was the parent for the purposes of the section.—Woodward v. Non-provided school — Teacher's salary—Burnham Report — Adoption by local education authority — "Carry-over" — Payment by instalments—Alleged unsatisfactory service after adoption—Refusal to pay third instalment—Powers of local education authority].—The plaintiff was appointed head teacher of a non-provided school in 1904, and in 1921 the Burnham Report on Standard Scales of Salaries for Teachers in Public Elementary Schools was adopted by the local education authority. That report provided by clause 9 : "All teachers shall be brought to their correct positions on the standard scale adopted by the authority in the following manner. . . . (e) Nothing in this Report is intended to preclude an authority from dealing specially, for the purposes of the 'carry-over,' with the case of a teacher whose service has been declared to be unsatisfactory and continues to be so regarded, provided always that no teacher shall be penalised in respect of years of satisfactory service." The "carry-over" meant the difference between the salary which a teacher would have received at the date of the adoption of the report by the local education authority if throughout the teacher's service the Burnham scale had been in operation, and the salary which at that date the teacher was in fact receiving. The effect of the adoption of the report was that the plaintiff became entitled to an increase of salary, and it was agreed that the payment of the "carry-over" should be spread over three years. The education committee, however, refused to pay the third instalment of the "carry-over," namely, for the year ending March 31, 1924, on the ground that in 1923 the plaintiff's service had been unsatisfactory. In an action by the plaintiff against the managers and the local education authority for the third instalment, Held, that the local education authority had no power, under the terms of the report, to withhold from a teacher any part of the "carry-over" by reason of unsatisfactory service after the date of the adoption of the report, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.—WITTS v. MACKAY AND OTHERS [Div. Ct.] 535

EMERGENCY REGULATIONS — Supply of fuel—Publication of statement calculated to restrict — Distribution—Emergency Regulations, 1926, reg. 21].—During a strike it was agreed between the colliery owners and the miners that the safety men should remain at work. Some owners posted up offers of work to miners, and certain miners, not safety men, returned to work. A board of enginemen, deputies, and miners, of which the appellant was secretary, then passed a resolution that if coal were raised for other than safety purposes all the safety men would be withdrawn; and the appellant, by direction of the board, sent copies of the resolution to the secretary of the owners' association and to the managers of certain collieries. The appellant was convicted of distributing a document containing a statement the publication of which was calculated to impede, delay, or restrict the supply or distribution of fuel, contrary to reg. 21 of the Emergency Regulations, 1926. Held, per Lord Hewart, C.J., that the document was not calculated to restrict the supply of fuel, but was merely a complaint that the agreement for preserving the pits was being broken, that it was not "distributed" by the appellant, but merely communicated, and that the matter came within the proviso to reg. 21 (1); per Salter, J., that there was a publication, and that it was calculated to stop the supply of fuel, but that the communication was "taking part in a strike" within the proviso; and per Talbot, J., that the regulation did not apply to an official communication sent by one party in a dispute to the other party. The conviction was accordingly quashed.—SMITH v. WOOD [Div. Ct.] 179

Chemin-de-fer—Losses—Payment by cheque to croupier or banker—Action on cheque].—The plaintiff and other players of chemin-de-fer took it in turn to be croupier or banker. The defendant, who was one of the players, bought counters to stake, and at the end of the game, having lost £500, he gave a cheque for that amount to the plaintiff in payment of what he had lost to the plaintiff and/or other persons. In an action on the cheque, Held, that a payment to a winner at gaming, or to a person who accepted payment for winners, in the form of a cheque, was void and unenforceable, and the action failed.—RICHARDSON v. By s. 4 (1) of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, "The several terms 'hackney carriages,' 'hackney coach,' 'carriages,' and 'carriage,' whenever used in sections thirty-seven, forty to fifty-two (both inclusive), fifty-four, fifty-eight, and sixty to sixty-seven (both inclusive) of the principal Act [the Act of 1847] shall, notwithstanding anything contained in section thirty-eight of that Act, be deemed to include every omnibus." By s. 3 of the Act of 1889, "The term 'omnibus,' where used in this Act, shall include every omnibus, charabanc, wagonette, brake, stagecoach, and other carriage plying or standing for hire by or used to carry passengers at separate fares to, from, or in any part of the prescribed distance; but shall not include . . . any omnibus starting from outside the prescribed distance, and bringing passengers within the prescribed distance, and not standing or plying for hire within the prescribed distance." Licensing of omnibuses—Imposition of undertaking as to fares — Appeal to Minister of Transport — Roads Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 72), s. 14 (3)].—The Corporation of H. refused to grant licences for the applicants' motor omnibuses unless the applicants gave an undertaking to charge fares within the City of H. higher than those of the corporation tramways. Their reason for requiring this undertaking was that the omnibuses were only needed for through passengers from H. to points outside the city; and that it was not in the public interest that revenue should be diverted from the tramways which provided an adequate service within the city, or that short-distance passengers should occupy the seats in the omnibuses to the exclusion of the long-distance passengers for whose benefit alone the omnibus service was permitted. The Minister of Transport made no order on an appeal by the applicants, considering that it was in the public interest that passengers should be discouraged from using the applicants' omnibuses for short distances, and that the only legal way to secure that result was some arrangement as to fares. Held, that the Minister had not taken extraneous matters into consideration merely because he proposed, by the regulation of the fares, to secure an object which he considered in the public interest.—REX v. MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—EX PARTE H.C. MOTOR WORKS, LIMITED [Div. Ct.] .. 432

On the return journey they accepted as passengers from R. only persons holding return tickets issued on one of the company's omnibuses—not necessarily the same vehicle as the one on which the passenger proposed to return. Held, that in these circumstances there was no plying for hire in the district of R. Sales v. Lake (38 The Times L.R., 336; [1922] 1 K.B., 553) followed. *Armstrong v. These streets subsequently became highways repairable by the inhabitants at large. An action was commenced by the Attorney-General against the local authority for a declaration that they were liable to repair and keep in repair these seven bridges. Held, that, having regard to the fact that the word "street," as defined by s. 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, includes (if this is not inconsistent with the context) any bridge (not being a county bridge), the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. The local authority included the expenses in a single account, and made an apportionment of the total among the frontagers of both streets. Held, that the apportionment was bad, and the local authority could not recover the amount ascertained by such an apportionment.—NASH v. GILES [Div. Ct.] 121

Such an application is therefore subject to the time limit of six months provided in s. 11 of the Act of 1848. The justices have no jurisdiction to discharge an order under the latter part of s. 7 of the Act of 1895 unless complaint of an act of adultery by the wife subsequent to the order is brought within six months of the time when the adultery was committed.—WALLER v. INDIA—Action against public officer—Requirement of two months' notice — Whether subject to exception — Case of hardship or irreparable damage — Action for injunction —Question of ultra vires—Government of India Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict., c. 106), s. 65—Code of Civil Procedure (Act V. of 1908) (Indian statute), s. 80].—By s. 80 of the Indian Code of Civil Procedure, "No suit shall be instituted against the Secretary of State for India in Council, or against a public officer in respect of any act purporting to be done by such public officer in his official capacity, until the expiration of two months next after notice in writing has been, in the case of the Secretary of State in Council, delivered to, or left at the office of, a secretary to the Local Government or the Collector of the District, and, in the case of a public officer, delivered to him or left at his office, stating the cause of action, the name, description, and place of residence of the plaintiff and the relief which he claims; and the plaint shall contain a statement that such notice has been so delivered or left." Held, that the above provision is not ultra vires, as the regulation of civil procedure is not subject to s. 65 of the Government of India Act, 1858, and that it is applicable to all forms of action and to all kinds of relief, and is not subject to any exception in an action where an injunction is prayed or in cases where hardship or injury not reparable by money compensation may arise; and that therefore, where a plaint, such as is referred to, is issued before the expiration of two months from the notice required, the action is unsustainable in limine.—BHAGCHAND DAGDUSA GUJRATHI AND OTHERS v. By Hindu law, where a natural father during his son's minority consents to the adoption of the son by another upon the terms of an arrangement whereby the adoptive father by his will limits the rights which the adoptive son, if he had been a natural son of the adoptive father, would have had in the ancestral property, the provisions of the adoptive father's will which limit the son's rights, even if the arrangement as a whole was beneficial to the adoptive son, are not binding upon him on his attaining his majority, if these provisions go beyond a mere postponement of the son's interest to a life interest of the testator's widow.—KRISHNAMURTHI AYYAR v. After the admissions and denials before the deity had been recorded by Commissioners who were present the first plaintiff contested the agreement on two grounds—(1) that the condition had not been carried out, and (2) that it was not binding under the Indian Oaths Act, 1873. Judgments of the two Indian Courts affirmed and both objections rejected. What took place before the deity was evidence on oath or solemn affirmation within the meaning of section 8 of the Act, and was binding on the first plaintiff.—LALA INDAR PRASAD AND ANOTHER v. INSURANCE (ACCIDENT)—Death—Exception—Assured not to be in charge of a vehicle—Dismounted bicyclist holding his bicycle—Whether in "charge" of a "vehicle"].—By a newspaper policy of insurance against death by accident the insurers undertook to pay £250 in case of death, "if the reader while a pedestrian . . . in a public thoroughfare be killed by accidental impact with a moving vehicle," provided that "the reader be not at the time of the accident in charge of any vehicle." An insured person who was riding a bicycle got off at the foot of a hill and having pushed it some way stopped to speak to another man and stood holding his bicycle, and an unattended motor-car came running down the hill and struck the insured person and caused his death. On a claim under the policy by the deceased man's executors, Held, that the word "vehicle" in the policy included a bicycle and as the deceased man was "in charge of" the bicycle within the meaning of those words in the policy the insurers were not liable.—HARPER AND ANOTHER v. Motor-car—Third-party risks—Assured drunk when driving—Manslaughter through negligence—Right to recover on insurance—Public policy].—A driver of a motor-car who is insured against third-party risks, and who through negligence, consisting in getting drunk and in driving the car while he was in that condition, has collided with another vehicle and thereby committed manslaughter, is not precluded, on grounds of public policy, from recovering on his insurance, inasmuch as in such a case the criminal act is merely negligent and not wilful.—JAMES v. BRITISH GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED [Roche, J.] 354

Motor-car "to be used only for commercial travelling"—Statement incorporated and made basis of contract—Warranty or description of risk—Arbitration—Award bad on its face—Award set aside].—The respondent had insured his motor-car with the appellants by a policy which incorporated and was based on a proposal and declaration by the respondent which warranted that the motor-car was to be used only for commercial travelling. During the period covered by the insurance, the respondent's motor-car was being used to carry passengers, when it caught fire and was destroyed. Held, that the statement that the motor-car was to be used only for commercial travelling was descriptive of the risk and that the motor-car was not covered by the policy when it was being used to carry passengers. The award of the arbitrator in favour of the respondent was set aside, because it was bad on its face.—ROBERTS v. ANGLO-SAXON INSURANCE ASSOCIATION, LIMITED [C.A.] 359

INSURANCE (BURGLARY) — Misrepresentation — Concealment — Materiality — Evidence].—The appellant and his partner made to the respondent insurance company through the company's agent a proposal for insurance against burglary. One of the questions on the proposal form was, "Has any company declined to accept or refused to renew your burglary insurance?" The plaintiff and his partner answered jointly, "Yorkshire accept, but proposers refused on account of fire proposal," meaning that the Yorkshire company were willing to grant a burglary policy but refused to do so unless at the same time the assured took out a policy against fire. In fact the appellant had, before the commencement of the partnership, been refused by the Sun Company. The respondents issued the policy, and it contained a condition that any misrepresentation, suppression, concealment, or untrue averment in the answers to the questions on the proposal form should render the policy absolutely void. The partnership having been dissolved during the currency of the policy, the latter was continued for the benefit of the appellant alone. Subsequently the appellant made a claim on the policy. The respondents refused to pay on the grounds (inter alia) that the policy was avoided by misrepresentation in the answer to the question on the proposal form and by concealment of a material fact, and in an arbitration the arbitrator decided in favour of the respondents on both grounds but stated a case. Held, that there were grounds for supporting the finding of the arbitrator that the refusal of the appellant by the Sun Company was a material fact which ought to have been disclosed, and the award of the arbitrator must be affirmed. Decision of the Court of Appeal (41 The Times L.R., 566 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 593) affirmed.—GLICKSMAN v. LANCASHIRE AND GENERAL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED [H.L.] 46

INSURANCE (LIFE) — Policies taken out in Russia — Whether existent and enforceable —Russian law—Currency in which policy moneys payable].—Between 1903 and 1909 the plaintiffs, who were Russian subjects, effected with the defendants, an American insurance company then having a branch in Russia, certain insurances in the form of four endowment life policies and paid the premiums in Russia in roubles down to 1918. The amounts secured by two of the policies were now payable if the policies were still existent and enforceable, and it was admitted by both parties that the contracts were to be governed by Russian law. In an action claiming the amount due on the policies or the return of the premiums the defendants contended that by the laws of Russia the policies had become void, as the Russian Government had in 1919 by decree cancelled all kinds of life insurance and transferred all premiums to the Government Treasury. Uncontradicted evidence was given for the plaintiffs that by a Russian law made in 1923 the People's Commissariat of Justice was charged with the "interpretation" of existing laws and that the Commissariat had interpreted the decree of 1919 as having no application to contracts of life assurance made by Russian subjects with companies having assets which were in the United States and which were not liable to confiscation in Russia. Held (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that as the Court could not, by putting its own construction on the term "interpretation," make for Russia a law which the Russian judicial system did not recognize, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the two policies above referred to, and that judgment should be entered for the sterling equivalent of the amounts due in chervonetz roubles at the date when those amounts became due.—BUERGER AND ANOTHER v. an insurance on his life, stating on the form that he was free from disease or ailment. On July 15 the defendants sent him the following acceptance :—"I beg to inform you that the proposal made by you to this company to effect an assurance on the life of yourself (whole world) for the sum of £5,000, with profits, has this day been accepted, and if the health of the life proposed remains meanwhile unaffected, the policy will be issued on payment of the first premium as under, subject to satisfactory evidence of age being furnished. . . . The risk of the company will not commence until receipt of the first premium ; and the directors meanwhile reserve the power to alter or withdraw this acceptance." On July 20 L. became ill and on July 22 he signed a cheque for the first premium, but the cheque was not sent that day. On July 23 pneumonia was definitely diagnosed. On July 24 the cheque was sent. On July 26 the defendants received the cheque and sent the following certificate :— "I certify that the proposal made by Dr. W. Looker to effect an insurance on the life of himself for the term of whole life has been accepted by this company for £5,000, and the first quarterly premium having been paid a policy will be delivered in due course." On July 27 L. died of pneumonia, and the bank did not pay the cheque. In an action by L.'s executors on the policy, Held, that as there had been, between the proposal and the acceptance of the premium, a change in the risk, and as the acceptance was on the faith of the continued truth of the statements in the proposal, the action failed.—LOOKER AND ANOTHER v. LAW UNION AND ROCK INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED [Acton, J.] .. 691

INSURANCE (LOSS)—Bills of exchange—Loss or deprivation through dishonesty—Assured induced to discount bills by false representations—Dishonour of bills—Liability of assured—Whether loss within the policy].— The plaintiff was insured by two policies, subscribed by the defendant, against loss or deprivation of bills of exchange through theft and any other loss whatsoever through theft or other dishonesty. During the currency of the policies the plaintiff was induced by false representations to discount certain bills of exchange. The bills were dishonoured, and the plaintiff brought an action on the policies on the ground that he had suffered a loss through having dealt in the bills. The defendant contended that the above provision in the policies only covered accidental loss of documents or physical deprivation of the possession of documents. Held, that the plaintiff's loss was caused by dishonesty within the meaning of the policy, and he was entitled to recover. —WASSERMAN v. BLACKBURN [Roche, J.] .. 95

INSURANCE (MARINE)—Certificate of insurance—Goods consigned c.i.f.—Sale by consignee on arrival — Goods damaged—Right of action against insurers by purchaser— Condition as to notice—Liability of insurers].—The defendant company insured a quantity of leather, consigned c.i.f., for a voyage from New York to Tunis, by a certificate of insurance which provided: "This certificate represents and takes the place of the policy and conveys all the rights of the original policy-holder . . . as fully as if the property were covered by a special policy direct to the holder of this certificate." By clause 11 of the policy, "In case of loss or damage to the property hereby insured the loss shall be reported to the representative of the company, or, if there be no representative of the company, to Lloyd's agent, as soon as the goods are landed or the loss is known or expected." On the day after the arrival of the goods at Tunis the consignee sold them to the plaintiff, who found them to have been damaged by salt water. In an action by the plaintiff on the certificate of insurance the defendant company pleaded that the clause in the policy as to giving notice within a limited time had not been complied with. Held, that as it was not clear either that the certificate incorporated clause 11 of the policy or that clause 11 was a condition precedent, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Decision of Sankey, J. (42 The Times L.R., 692), affirmed on a different ground.—KOSKAS v. STANDARD MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED [C.A.] 169

Policy — Construction — "Collision with an object"—Stranding—Bumping on rocks—Whether within the policy].—A policy of marine insurance on the hull and machinery of a steamer covered the ordinary perils of the sea and contained the following clause: "Subject to the Institute 'Free of Particular Average absolutely' time clauses as annexed, but this insurance to include damage received by collision with any object (ice included) other than water." The ship, having stranded, bumped on the rocks and damaged her bottom plates. In an action on the policy to recover the damage caused by the bumping, Held, that the contact with the rocks was a "collision with an object" within the meaning of the policy, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.—MANCOMUNIDAD DEL VAPOR FRUMIZ v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE [Roche, J.].. 103

Reinsurance—Payment on original policy—Non-liability by reason of unseaworthiness—Failure of claim against reinsurers].—The plaintiffs insured a consignment of gunpowder on a voyage and reinsured with the defendants. Both the original policy and the reinsurance policies covered perils of the sea and jettison and were expressed to be "warranted free from loss arising from . . . destruction . . . in a port of distress or otherwise." The original policy contained no admission of seaworthiness, but the reinsurance policies did contain such an admission, and they provided that the defendants would "pay as paid thereon," and that the payment should be subject to the same terms as in the original policy. The vessel carried, in addition to the gunpowder, 3,000 drums of sulphuric acid, and owing to heavy weather some of the drums burst and the acid disabled the machinery, with the result that the ship had to put in to a port of distress. There the required repairs could not be carried out with the gunpowder on board, and it was thrown overboard and became a total loss. The plaintiffs paid the owners as for a total loss and claimed to be reimbursed by the defendants. Held, that as the way in which the sulphuric acid was stowed and loaded affected the safety of the ship and rendered her unseaworthy, the plaintiffs were under no liability on the original policy, and therefore they could not recover from the defendants on the reinsurance policies.—FIREMAN'S FUND INSURANCE COMPANY v. WESTERN AUSTRALIAN INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER [Bateson, J.] 680

Reinsurance — Slip — Construction — "On a voyage"]. — The plaintiffs, as original insurers, insured a consignment of oranges from any port in Spain to Antwerp, and, after the ship had left Valencia and had been in wireless communication with Gibraltar, they reinsured with the defendant by a slip, which referred to the fact that the ship had been in such communication with Gibraltar and which contained the words "on a voyage," meaning, according to the evidence, that the risk should attach only from a named port in the course of the voyage. The ship stranded before she reached Gibraltar, the oranges were damaged, and the plaintiffs had to pay on the policy. In an action on the contract of reinsurance, Held, that on the true reading of the slip the intention was to limit the risk to the voyage from Gibraltar, and the action failed.—EAGLE, STAR AND BRITISH DOMINIONS INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. REINER [Salter, J.].. 259

INSURANCE (MOTOR-CAR) — Policies excluding risk covered by another policy — Provision for rateable contribution — Construction].—G. took out with the M. company a motor-car insurance policy covering himself and any friend driving with G.'s consent, and providing as follows:—"Condition 6.—The extension of the indemnity to friends or relatives of the insured is conditional upon such friend or relative being a licensed and competent driver and not being insured under any other policy. Condition 10.—If at the happening of any accident, injury, damage, or loss covered by this policy . . . there shall be subsisting any other insurance or indemnity of any nature whatever covering the same, whether effected by the insured or by any other person . . . then the company shall not be liable to pay or contribute towards any such damage or loss more than a rateable proportion of any sum payable in respect thereof for compensation." L., who was G.'s brother-in-law, took out with the G. company a similar policy providing that "The insured will also be indemnified hereunder while personally driving a car not belonging to him provided . . . that there is no other insurance in respect of such other car whereby the insured may be indemnified," and that "If at the time of the occurrence of any accident loss or damage there shall be any other indemnity or insurance subsisting whether effected by the insured or by any other person the corporation shall not be liable to pay or contribute more than a rateable proportion of any sums payable in respect of such accident loss or damage." While L. was driving G.'s car with G.'s consent it had a collision and L. had to pay damages. G., as trustee for L., claimed against the M. company, and L. on his own behalf claimed against the G. company. Held, that in each policy the provision as to rateable contribution qualified the preceding clause and each company was liable to pay the claimants half the amount claimed.—GALE v. INSURANCE (NATIONAL) — Summary proceedings — Question of insurability—Reference to Minister — Adjournment — Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), s. 22 (7)—National Health Insurance Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 38), s. 97 (4)].—The requirements of s. 22 (7) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, and of s. 97 (4) of the National Health Insurance Act, 1924, are imperative. Therefore if in any summary proceedings under either Act the insurability of any person becomes material, and has not been decided by the Minister, the justices must forthwith refer the question to him and adjourn the hearing pending a final decision.—WOOD v. BURKE [Div. Ct.] 582

INSURANCE (THEFT)—Jewelry—Necklets obtained from assured by woman to show to third parties—Sale by woman—Larceny by trick—Necklets obtained by assured "on approval"—Whether held "in trust"—"Responsibility" of assured—Exception in policy].—The plaintiff, a jeweller, insured against theft with the defendant and other Lloyd's underwriters jewelry which was his own property, or which he held in trust, or for which he was held to be responsible, while it was in his custody or in the custody of any person or persons to whom he might have entrusted the same on the condition of sale or return, for valuation or inspection, or for any purpose whatsoever. The policy excepted "loss by theft or dishonesty committed by . . . any customer . . . in respect of goods entrusted to him. . . ." A woman, who had previously bought from the plaintiff and paid for certain minor articles, told the plaintiff that her "husband" (a man with whom in truth she was living) wished to give her as a birthday present a pearl necklet of the value of £1,000. The plaintiff procured from London firms two necklets on approval, the "appro. notes" declaring that they remained the property of the senders, and he allowed the woman to take them away to show to her "husband," and the necklets were debited to that man in the plaintiff's books. Later the woman brought back one necklet, saying that her "husband" preferred the other, but that he was away, and could not pay for it until his return home. At another interview she said that her sister's fiancé wished to buy the necklet which she had returned, and she was allowed to take it away again to show it to him, the necklet being debited to him in the plaintiff's books. In fact the woman's statements about her "husband" (who knew nothing about the necklets) were all untrue, her "sister's fiancé" was a fictitious person, and she sold both the necklets through a pawnbroker. Held, that the woman's conduct constituted larceny of the necklets by a trick, since the plaintiff had never intended to pass the property in them to her, but only that she should hand them for inspection and approval to others whom only the plaintiff intended to be his purchasers and debtors, and that the goods had not been "entrusted" to a "customer" within the meaning of the exception, since there was no mutual assent to a contract of bailment, and since the plaintiff did not look on the woman as a possible purchasing customer; and therefore the action succeeded. Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 425; [1926] 2 K.B., 51) reversed.—LAKE v. SIMMONS [H.L.] 417

INSURANCE (UNEMPLOYMENT)—Contributions—Employer's failure to pay—Jurisdiction of justices—Limitation of 12 months' arrears—Claim to recover previous arrears—Effect of justices' order—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), s. 22 (3) (6)].—Under s. 22 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, the jurisdiction of the justices, on a conviction for failure to pay contributions under the Act, is limited to 12 months' arrears. Held, that if the jurisdiction of the justices is invoked under that section and they make an order for payment of the 12 months' arrears, the sum paid under the order is not to be treated as a payment in satisfaction of all arrears in respect of the same employee, and other proceedings can be taken in any competent Court to recover the arrears for any period preceding the 12 months. Excepted employments — "Agriculture"—"Horticulture" — Meaning of these expressions — Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), Schedule I., Part II. (a)].—By Part II. INTERNATIONAL LAW—Diplomatic privilege—Action to recover rent—Entry of appearance under protest—Plea of privilege by defendant — Evidence—Consular secretary attached to German Embassy—Extent of privilege — Right of cross-examination—Intervention of Attorney-General on behalf of Foreign Office].—In an action for arrears of rent due under a lease of a dwelling-house the defendant entered a conditional appearance under protest, and pleaded that being an official of the German Embassy he was protected by diplomatic privilege. It appeared that he was a "consular secretary" formerly working at the German Consulate, but that he had been transferred to the German Embassy. The Attorney-General upon the instructions of the Foreign Office appeared and informed the Court that the defendant was recognized by the Foreign Office as being on a list comprising the suite of the German Ambassador. The plaintiff disputed the claim of privilege, and obtained an order from Shearman, J., for the cross-examination of the defendant. Held (Lord Hanworth, M.R., dissenting), that as a consul and a consular official are not within the diplomatic privilege of immunity from process, and the Foreign Office Diplomatic List was not conclusive upon the point, the question was one ultimately of fact, and the exact facts ought to be ascertained by cross-examination, to which the defendant was bound to submit. *Duff Development Company v. Licence — Renewal — Application — Adjournment till after licence due to expire—Whether a refusal of renewal—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V., c. 24), s. 16 (1)].—The appellants, the licensee and the owners of licensed premises, applied to the respondent licensing justices on March 1, 1926, for a renewal of the licence, which was due to expire on April 4, 1926. The justices, on the ground that summonses were pending against the licensee for supplying intoxicating liquor during non-permitted hours, adjourned the application to April 12, 1926, and the appellants gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions. On March 4, 1926, the licensee was convicted, and on April 12, 1926, the licensing justices refused the renewal. At quarter sessions the appellants contended that the licensing justices had no power to adjourn the application for renewal to a date after the expiry of the licence, that the adjournment amounted to a refusal to renew the licence, and that on March 1, 1926, they had no evidence on which they could refuse the renewal. Quarter sessions held that the decision to adjourn the application to April 12, 1926, was not a refusal to renew the licence, and they dismissed the appeal but stated a case. Held, that the decision of quarter sessions was right, as the application was made within the licensing year and the licence remained in force by virtue of s. 16 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910.—Thomas and Others v. Newington Licensing Justices [Div. Ct.] 181

(f) without the leave of the Divisional Court or of the Court of Appeal, from the determination by a Divisional Court of any appeal to the High Court. . . ." Held, that the Divisional Court still has a right to give leave to appeal where such a right had been given by a previous Act. Held, also, that although a corporation can enter into a recognizance by a properly authorized agent, yet where, on a case stated by justices, the appellants are a corporation, a recognizance entered into by their clerk, which does not show that it was entered into on their behalf and that it is their property which is made liable, does not satisfy the requirements of s. 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857. Certiorari — Bias — Justices' clerk a partner in firm which had acted for complainant—No personal knowledge that firm had so acted—Order quashed].—Certiorari will issue to quash a maintenance order made by justices when it is shown that the justices' clerk is a member of a firm of solicitors which acted for the wife at an earlier stage of the same proceedings, even though it is proved that the wife's business was conducted exclusively by a managing clerk in charge of a branch office, and that the justices' clerk was in fact quite unaware that his firm had ever acted for her. The test is not whether there is in fact bias, but whether a reasonable man concerned in the proceedings might think that the tribunal was not impartial. *Rex v. Jurisdiction—Distress warrant—Poor rate—Weekly tenant — Summons — Failure of tenant to appear at hearing—Seizure of tenant's furniture — Act of justices in excess of jurisdiction—Error on question of fact on proper evidence — Action for trespass — Liability of justices — Justices' Protection Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict., c. 44), ss. 1, 2—Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 41), s. 2].—A poor rate was declared against a weekly tenant of certain premises, and a demand made for an amount in excess of the amount which the tenant was liable to pay under s. 2 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869. On the failure of the tenant to comply, a summons was issued. The tenant did not appear at the hearing, and the justices, after hearing the evidence of the overseers, issued and signed a distress warrant against the tenant's goods, which were accordingly distrained upon and sold. The tenant appealed to quarter sessions, and his appeal was allowed. He then brought an action in trespass against the justices for issuing the warrant that had authorized the distress. Held, that the justices were not liable, as they had merely come to an erroneous decision in regard to their jurisdiction on a question of fact on evidence properly before them, as distinct from a wrong decision of law in regard to such jurisdiction. *Calder v. Held, that the conviction was bad on the face of it, because it did not specify the particular contravention of the Betting Act, 1853. The defendant was entitled to demand the same particularity in proceedings under s. 79 (1) (b) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, as he would have been entitled to in a prosecution under the Betting Act, 1853, itself.—POINTON v. weir adjoining it. The defendants, as the plaintiffs alleged (and as the jury found to a lesser extent), raised the weir to a greater height than they were entitled to, with the result that adjoining meadows were flooded. The plaintiffs pulled down the alleged enhancement, and the defendants replaced it. In an action by the plaintiffs for an injunction to restrain the defendants from enhancing the weir, the defendants counterclaimed for trespass. Held, (1) that the plaintiffs, not having obtained a finding of two justices as required by s. 18 of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, were not entitled to remove the alleged enhancement and the defendants were entitled to succeed on the counterclaim; (2) that the plaintiffs had no proprietary rights entitling them to sue; (3) that in the absence of any valid order made by them under s. 33 of the Land Drainage Act, 1861, the plaintiffs had no right of action in respect of obstruction of their statutory duties. Quære, if they had made an order under s. 33 whether they would still have had to comply with the procedure laid down by ss. 16 to 20 of the same Act.—SALISBURY AND FORDINGBRIDGE DISTRICT DRAINAGE BOARD v. Fire insurance—Demise by plaintiffs' lessors of adjoining premises for business causing increase of premium on the plaintiffs' premises — Claim against lessors].—The defendants, the owners of premises, demised them to the plaintiffs, who covenanted (inter alia) "not to do or suffer anything which may render any increased or extra premium payable for the insurance of the said demised premises or other premises adjacent thereto against fire or which may make void or voidable any policy for such insurance." The plaintiffs also covenanted to pay for the insurance of the premises. Subsequently the plaintiffs surrendered a part of the premises to the defendants, who then demised the surrendered part to a woodworker, with the result that the plaintiffs' payments in respect of premiums for insurance against fire were greatly increased. Held, that neither on the basis of an implied correlative obligation nor on the basis of a derogation from their grant were the defendants liable to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of the increased premiums.—O'CEDAR, LIMITED v. SLOUGH TRADING COMPANY, LIMITED [Branson, J.] 382

Lease—Native uncleared land—Covenant by lessee to cultivate—Felling of trees—Alleged actionable waste].—A lease for 42 years of uncleared native land in New Zealand contained a covenant by the lessee to cultivate the land in a husband-like manner and to keep it clear of noxious weeds. About three years after the grant of the lease the lessee felled the timber and sold it and then sold the lease. The reversioners, alleging that to fell the timber so early was to fell it, not for the purposes of cultivation, but with a view to making money by its sale, sued the lessee for actionable waste. Held, that as the covenant to cultivate imposed upon the lessee an obligation to cut the timber, and as the reversioners had no right to complain of the clearance being made at such an early period of the lease as was most to the benefit of the lessee, the action failed.—GARDNER v. Held, that in order that a dwelling-house may become decontrolled under the above provision it must have been let separately up to the time when the landlord comes into possession, and the landlord must come into possession of it as landlord.—COHEN v. GOLD [Div. Ct.] 376

Restrictions—Decontrol—Lessee in possession—Part of dwelling-house lawfully sublet—Sublease after July 31, 1923—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1)].—Section 2 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, subsection 1, provides: "Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act . . . then from and after the passing of this Act . . . the principal Act [i.e., the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920] shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house: Provided that, where part of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is lawfully sublet, and the part so sublet is also a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies, the principal Act shall not cease to apply to the part so sublet by reason of the tenant being in or coming into possession of that part. . . ." Held, that the words in this proviso, "where part of a dwelling-house . . . is lawfully sublet" refer to the time at which the question arises whether the part of the dwelling-house is decontrolled, and not to the date of the passing of the Act. Where, therefore, a tenant who was in possession of the whole of a dwelling-house on July 31, 1923, the date of the passing of the Act, and subsequently sublet four rooms in the house at a rent within the Rent Restrictions Acts, those four rooms were "sublet" within the meaning of the proviso and were protected by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.—DOULIN v. dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ." Held, that "landlord" in the above section, as generally in the Rent Restriction Acts, includes not only an owner, freeholder, or head landlord, but also any person who has a tenant holding under him; and, accordingly, even a quarterly tenant, who has sublet on a weekly tenancy, may be a landlord for the purposes of the section.—OAKLEY v. II., c. 3), s. 3].—In 1910 the defendant, a policeman, became tenant of a house, paying the rent and rates personally, receiving receipts in his own name and drawing from the police authority a grant in aid of those expenses. In 1912 an Order was made, to the knowledge of the defendant, that in future the Chief Constable would be the tenant of all houses occupied by policemen not in barracks, and that policemen should occupy the houses as servants of the police authority and not as tenants. While no express notice was given either by the defendant or by his landlord to determine the defendant's tenancy, after the date of the Order the rent of the house occupied by the defendant was paid by the police authority through the defendant, the receipts being made out in favour of the authority, and no demands for rates or taxes being made to the defendant, who paid none. Deductions were made from the defendant's pay on account of rent, except during certain periods when quarters were free. In March, 1926, the defendant retired on pension, and the plaintiff, the Chief Constable, who in January, 1926, had signed an agreement with the landlord for the tenancy of the house, obtained judgment for possession in an action in the County Court. Held, that there was evidence on which the County Court Judge could find that in 1912 the defendant agreed with the landlord and with the plaintiff to surrender his tenancy and in future to occupy the house as a servant of the police authority and not as a tenant, that the landlord agreed to accept the surrender and to take the plaintiff as tenant, and that the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to accept the tenancy from the landlord, to allow the occupation by the defendant as a servant, and to pay the rent, rates and taxes. The plaintiff had undertaken liabilities of which the defendant had had the advantage; and, therefore, the defendant was estopped from denying that there had been a surrender by him of his tenancy by act or operation of law or an assignment thereby of his interest to the plaintiff.—METCALFE v. BOYCE [Div. Ct.] .. 149

LANDS — Acquisition — Arbitration—Appeal—Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 57), s. 6 (2)].—By s. 6 (2) of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, the decision of the High Court upon a case stated by an arbitrator under the Act is final and conclusive. Held, that the effect of this provision is that where an arbitrator states a case under the Act for the opinion of the Court and afterwards incorporates the decision of the Court in his award, and the claimants then move before a Divisional Court to have the award set aside on the ground that the decision so incorporated is wrong in law, there is no appeal from the rejection of the motion.—NORTHWOOD AND OTHERS v. LIEN — Hire-purchase agreement — Taxicabs—Repairs—No authority to hirer to create a lien—Possession parted with for limited purpose].—The plaintiffs let three taxicabs to B. on hire-purchase agreements which provided that B. should not have authority to create a lien on the taxicabs in respect of repairs. Up to May 1, 1925, the cabs, with the consent of the plaintiffs, had been garaged at the defendants' garage and B. owed the defendants the balance of a general account for garage rent, goods supplied, and washing, cleaning, and repairing the cabs. The defendants had never been aware of the terms of the agreements between B. and the plaintiffs. On May 1, 1925, the plaintiffs terminated the agreements as B. was in arrear with his payments, but the defendants refused to hand them the cabs, asserting that they had a lien for repairs. In an action for the delivery-up of the cabs and damages for their detention, Held, that the lien might attach notwithstanding the provision that B. should not have authority to create a lien, and that, although the defendants did not have continuous possession of the cabs, yet since, in letting B. take them out to ply for hire, they parted with possession without any intention to abandon the right of lien, the action failed. That payment, having been sanctioned by the Ministry, could not be disallowed by the district auditor. On the retirement of the registrar the guardians granted him a superannuation allowance based on the average of his remuneration by fees plus gratuity in the preceding five years. The district auditor disallowed so much of the allowance as was based on the gratuity, and surcharged it on certain guardians and ex-guardians. Held, that the district auditor was wrong in disallowing and surcharging the payment, as he was bound to treat the gratuity as forming part of the registrar's "emoluments" within the meaning of s. 19 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896. Wages paid by borough council—Auditor's finding that wages were excessive—Surcharge — Discretion of council — Whether absolute—Requirement of reasonableness—Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 and 19 Vict., c. 120), s. 62].—In 1920 the Fulham conference of representatives of metropolitan borough councils recommended a scheme for a scale of wages to be adopted by such councils, and the appellants, the Woolwich Borough Council, adopted the scheme for employees other than those whose wages were regulated by trade union rates. The scheme established a minimum rate for the lowest grade of employees, and it did not provide for any sliding scale if any difference should arise in the cost of living. The Joint Industrial Council recommended another scheme which did provide a sliding scale according as the cost of living went up or down. The appellants then adopted the Industrial Council's scale, subject to this, that if it fell below the Fulham scale they adopted the latter. In 1924 the payments were greater than if the Industrial Council's scale had been strictly adhered to, and the district auditor surcharged upon the appellants those parts of the wage payments which were more than 12½ per cent. in excess of the Industrial Council's scale, the 12½ per cent. being allowed by him in respect of the appellant council's discretion in the matter. The appellant council obtained a rule nisi to quash the surcharge on the ground that under s. 62 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, they had a right to pay such wages as they might think fit. Held, that the discretion conferred by the Act must be a reasonable discretion, and the district auditor was entitled to hold the wages payments to be so excessive as to make it his duty to interfere, and the rule nisi must be discharged. *Roberts v. LOTTERIES—Printer of tickets—Sale of complete set—Lottery to be conducted by purchaser—Printer not further interested—No lottery in existence at date of sale—Publication of proposal or scheme—Lotteries Act, 1823 (4 Geo. IV., c. 60), s. 41].—The appellant, a printer, sent to the respondent some specimen tickets for "Weekly Naps and Football Doubles" together with a printed document inviting him to purchase complete sets of tickets for various Divisions of the Football League. For example, for 10s. he would supply 231 tickets each containing the same "winning nap" on a horse race, but a different combination of two of the 22 teams in the First Division (231 being the total of possible combinations). The purpose was that the respondent should sell each of these tickets at 6d. each and should give a prize to the person whose ticket bore the names of the two teams which scored most goals on a given date. Out of the proceeds the respondent was to provide the prize or prizes, the balance being retained by him as profit. The appellant took no further share in the lottery or the proceeds beyond the original 10s. for the tickets. Held, that the appellant was rightly convicted of publishing a proposal or scheme for the sale of tickets or chances in a lottery.—RANSON v. BURGESS [Div. Ct.] 561

He was kept under detention until October, 1921. In an action brought in May, 1922, for negligence in giving the certificate the defendant denied negligence and pleaded the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3, which bars actions on the case six years after the cause of action. The jury found that when the certificate was given the plaintiff was not of unsound mind and that the defendant did not use reasonable care, and they awarded the plaintiff damages. Held, that the action was barred by s. 3 of the Act of 1623 and the plaintiff could not rely on the protection given by s. 7 of that Act to a person who when the cause of action accrued was non compos mentis, inasmuch as the jury had found that at that time he was not of unsound mind. Per Lord Blanesburgh : The only statute of limitations applicable was the Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, and the action was barred by the six months' limitation imposed by s. 1 of that Act, which had the effect of reducing to six months, from the date of the plaintiff's release, the limitation of twelve months imposed by s. 331 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, since the apparent total repeal of s. 331 of the Act of 1890 by the Act of 1893 was in reality only partial. Certification — Negligence — Detention under summary reception order—Form of action—Doctor employed by relative of alleged lunatic—Duty to take care in certification—Whether certificate cause of detention—Lunacy Act, 1890 (53 Vict., c. 5), ss. 16, 330 (1)].—The defendant, a medical practitioner, was called in by the husband and/or the father-in-law of the plaintiff to examine her mental condition. He formed the view that it was serious and he sent for the relieving officer, on whose arrival he filled up a certificate under section 16 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, in which he stated that he had come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was a person of unsound mind and a proper person to be taken charge of and detained under care and treatment. The plaintiff was then taken by the relieving officer to a justice of the peace, who saw her but did not ask her any questions, and made a summary order for her reception in a mental hospital. In two days the plaintiff was released from the hospital on the ground that there was no cause for her detention. The plaintiff accordingly brought this action, in which she claimed from the defendant damages for negligent certification. The jury found that the defendant had not acted with reasonable care—his good faith was admitted—and they assessed the damages at £50. Held, that the plaintiff's action was in form an action on the case for negligence in certification causing her damage through detention in a mental hospital without just cause. On the balance of the authorities, (a) the defendant owed to the plaintiff the duty to take reasonable care in coming to the conclusion that she was of unsound mind, although no contractual relationship existed between them ; and (b), the certificate given by the defendant was the cause of the plaintiff's detention in the mental hospital. The plaintiff was, therefore, entitled to judgment. Hall v. Semple (3 F. and F., 337) ; *Everett v. Compensation for injury by accident—Industrial disease—Painter—Lead poisoning—Liability of last employer—"Employment to the nature of which the disease was due"—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 58), s. 8 and Schedule III., as extended by Order of February 26, 1918 [S.R. and O., 1918, No. 287]].—The appellant, a painter, claimed compensation from the respondents, a firm of builders and house decorators, in respect of disablement caused by lead poisoning. The appellant served in the Navy as a painter until 1918, and during that service contracted the disease of lead poisoning. His last employment was with the respondents from October to December, 1924, when he left owing to illness. In July, 1925, the certifying surgeon certified that he was then suffering from lead poisoning and was thereby disabled from earning his full wages at the work at which he had been employed. The certificate gave no date for the commencement of the disablement, and, accordingly, by virtue of s. 8, subs. 4, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, it was deemed to have commenced at the date of the certificate. The arbitrator was not satisfied that there was anything in the nature of the appellant's employment with the respondents that would tend to aggravate or accelerate the process of the disease so as to warrant a finding that his disablement was due to that employment and made an award in favour of the respondents. Held, that the appellant was entitled to compensation under s. 8 (1) from the respondents as being the last employers who had employed him within the twelve months immediately preceding his disablement in the employment to the nature of which the disease was due, i.e., in work of the same character as that to which his disease was due, namely, lead painting, notwithstanding that he failed to prove that his disablement was due to his employment by the respondents. *Dean v. Under the power now contained in this subsection the Secretary of State made regulations of which the material one was: "In the application of the provisions of the said section to telegraphist's cramp, so far as regards a workman employed by the Postmaster-General, the Post Office medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed shall, if authorized to act for the purposes of the said section by the Postmaster-General, be substituted for the certifying surgeon." C., a telegraphist employed by the Postmaster-General, was on the capitation list of the local Post Office medical officer at Grimsby. She complained that she had telegraphist's cramp; in accordance with the regulations of the department, the case was referred to the chief medical officer, who had special knowledge of telegraphist's cramp. The chief medical officer certified that C. was not suffering from telegraphist's cramp. C. obtained a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the certificate. Held,

(1) that the chief medical officer was not the medical officer "under whose charge C. was placed," and that he was not entitled to give a certificate; (2) that the granting of a certificate was in the nature of a judicial act in respect of which certiorari would lie; (3) that an appeal to a medical referee under s. 43 of the Act was not equally beneficial, since the referee's concurrence with the chief medical officer's certificate would be conclusive, whereas the certificate was a nullity; (4) (per Avory, J.), that whether an appeal was equally beneficial or not, C., being a party aggrieved, certiorari would go ex debito justitiæ at her instance. —Rex v. On claims by the respondents for compensation the County Court Judge awarded compensation for partial disablement. Held, that although but for the strike the respondents would have continued to earn substantial sums, yet, as their loss of the opportunity of light work was caused not by their own act but by that of the workmen who went on strike, the Judge's award must be affirmed.—Hamilton v. Negligence—Doctrine of common employment—Accident to servant—No finding of negligence by employers—Finding of negligence by another servant of employers—Supply of appliances].—The plaintiff, a member of the orchestra at a theatre, sued his employers for damages for injuries suffered by him by reason of a club supplied by the employers to a performer slipping from the performer's hand during a performance and striking the plaintiff. The jury (inter alia) found (1) that the employers were not guilty of negligence in supplying the club, (2) that the employers' stage-manager was guilty of negligence, and (3) that the employers were not negligent in employing the stage-manager. Held, on these findings, that the fact of the stage-manager's negligence being in respect of the supply of appliances did not in the circumstances exclude the application of the doctrine of common employment, and the defendant employers were not liable to the plaintiff.—Laubach v. Truck Acts — Lancashire cotton' trade — "Standard list" of wages — Deductions for bad work — Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 37), ss. 3, 23 — Truck Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 44), ss. 2, 9].—Section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, provides for the payment in current coin of the realm of "the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer . . . in respect of any labour." Section 23 permits an employer to make, and contract to make, reasonable deductions from wages in respect of certain specified matters. Section 2 of the Truck Act, 1896, prohibits an employer from making, except under certain conditions, "any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman, or for any payment to the employer by the workman for or in respect of bad or negligent work or injury to the materials or other property of the employer. . . ." Section 9 provides for the exemption from the provisions of the Act by order of the Secretary of State of persons engaged in certain trades, either generally or within a particular area. By order dated March 3, 1897, the Secretary of State exempted from the provisions of the Act persons engaged in the weaving of cotton in Lancashire. The appellant, a weaver of cotton in Lancashire employed by the respondents, was negligent in performing certain work and, in accordance with a custom which had long existed in the Lancashire trade, the employers deducted a reasonable sum from the "standard list" rates of wages which had been agreed between the employers' and workers' organizations as the remuneration for good, merchantable cloth, and paid her the balance as her wages. Held, that this deduction was not illegal as being in contravention of the provisions of the Truck Acts, since the implied contract between the parties was that the appellant should be paid according

MERCHANT SHIPPING—Load-line—Not submerged at loading port—Heavy weather—Deck cargo — Saturation — Submersion of load-line on arrival—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 60), s. 442 (1)].—By s. 442 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, "If any owner or master of a British ship fails without reasonable cause to cause his ship to be marked as by this Part of this Act required, or to keep her so marked, or allows the ship to be so loaded as to submerge in salt water the centre of the disc indicating the load-line . . . he shall for each offence be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds." Held, that where the centre of the disc indicating the load-line is not submerged at the time of starting on the voyage but owing to the cargo being partly on deck and to its becoming saturated by heavy weather the centre of the disc is submerged on the arrival of the vessel at her destination, the master is liable to be convicted under the above provision.—RADCLIFFE v. to the plaintiffs, who signed a promissory note agreeing to pay the amount to the secretary of the defendant society, which was mentioned by name in the note as the society of which he was secretary. In an action for a declaration that the transaction was void on the ground that the defendants had taken a security in a name other than their registered name, contrary to s. 2 (1) (c) of the Money-lenders Act, 1900. Held, that as no one could sue on the note except the secretary, the security had been taken in a name other than the defendants' registered name, and the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration claimed.—MERTZ AND OTHERS v. If, however, this condition is fulfilled, the Court may entertain the application although the moneylender has not taken any proceedings to recover the money lent and although the time has not come for taking such proceedings.—CROSSINGHAM v. NEGLIGENCE—Architect—Building contract—Interim certificates — Loss to employers — Payment of same amount twice over].—The plaintiffs, a local authority, for the purpose of a housing scheme, made a contract with the builders under which the defendant was the architect. Clause 29 of the contract provided: "No certificate of the architect, except for the final balance, shall be considered conclusive evidence of any works or materials to which it relates nor of the value thereof, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good any defects as provided by these conditions, nor shall it in any way prejudice the employers in the final settlement of the accounts in any case where the contractor has been overpaid during the progress of the works." The Ministry of Health had the right to require the use of materials which the Disposals Board had for sale. While the houses were in course of erection the defendant gave interim certificates in pursuance of clause 29, and he also gave documents under which the plaintiffs paid the Disposals Board for articles supplied by the Board. Owing to the negligence of the defendant the plaintiffs had to pay both the builders and the Board for the same material, and the amount so overpaid to the builders could not be recovered from them. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover from the defendant the amount overpaid the defendant contended that he was a quasi-arbitrator and therefore not liable. Held, that in view of the terms of the particular contract, and in view of the course of business under it, the defendant was not, in giving the interim certificates, acting as an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator, but was merely acting as agent for the plaintiffs, and was liable to pay the amount claimed.—WISBECH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. Damages — Amount — Claim by widow in respect of husband's death—Widow's contributory pension—Whether to be taken into account in assessing damages—Fatal Accidents Act, 1846 (9 and 10 Vict., c. 93)—Fatal Accidents (Damages) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 7), s. 1—Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 70), ss. 1, 3].—A contributory pension payable to a widow under the Widows', Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, is not a "sum paid or payable on the death of" her husband "under any contract of assurance or insurance" within s. 1 of the Fatal Accidents (Damages) Act, 1908, and the value of it must, therefore, be deducted from any damages to which she may be entitled in an action brought by her under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, in respect of the negligence which resulted in her husband's death.—CARLING v. LEBBON [Lord Hewart, C.J.] 454

Highway — Cul-de-sac — Extension — Contractor's road—Unlighted fence across it—Appearance of continuous road—Invitation to use—Accident to invitee].—The defendants, a local authority, who were carrying out road improvements, employed contractors to pull down a wall at the end of a cul-de-sac and to make a new road joining the old cul-de-sac to an existing highway. The contractors pulled down the wall and made up a section of the new road as a contractor's road and then closed further progress by erecting a wooden fence, but there was no night watchman or lamp to give warning of the obstruction. Between the fence and the existing highway with which the cul-de-sac was to be connected there was a dangerous ravine, but the lights on each side of that highway were clearly visible to anyone entering the cul-de-sac and might induce a stranger to suppose that there was a continuous road. The plaintiff, who was driving a motor-car at night, proceeded along the cul-de-sac and the contractor's road, and, not seeing the fence, crashed through it into the ravine and was seriously injured. In an action for negligence, Held, that although the place of the accident was not a highway but a private site, yet, as there was an invitation to go upon it, the defendants were liable for the consequences of putting an unexpected obstruction in the path of the invitee, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.—OLDHAM v. SHEFFIELD CORPORATION [C.A.] 222

Practice — Personal injuries—Defendant insured—Statement of that fact to jury].—On the trial by a Judge and jury of an action for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence, the practice is, where the defendant is insured against liability, not to inform the jury of that fact.—ASKEW v. GRIMMER [Branson, J.] 354

Spectator on golf course—Injury by player].—The plaintiff, while she was carrying the defendant's golf clubs on a golf course, was struck with a golf club by the defendant when she (the defendant) was demonstrating a stroke to the plaintiff's brother, with whom the defendant was playing. In an action for damages for personal injuries caused by negligence the jury found that the defendant was guilty of negligence which brought about the accident, and that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence and did not take the risk of such an accident by going on the course as a spectator, and they awarded the plaintiff damages. Held, that there was no reason why the defendant should be excused merely because the accident took place in the course of recreation rather than of work, and that, as the plaintiff had not agreed, by going on the course as she did, to take the risk of being injured by negligence, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.—CLEGHORN v. OLDHAM [Swift, J.] 465

Vessel in dock—Condition as to sole risk of owners of vessel—Injury in lock through negligence of dock-owners' servants—Whether dock-owners protected by condition—Whether lock included in "dock."]—The defendants, who were the owners of Chelsea Dock and of a lock connecting it with the River Thames, received the plaintiffs' barge into the dock on the condition that "All barges or vessels while in Chelsea Dock are at the sole risk of owners or persons bringing or causing the same to be brought into the dock." While the barge was in the lock on its way out from the dock to the river, it was damaged through the negligence of the defendants' servants. Held, (1) that the words of the condition were not adequate to exempt the defendants from liability for the negligence of their servants, and (2) that although for some purposes, such as the jurisdiction of the dock-master, the word "dock" might include the lock, yet the condition did not clearly and unambiguously apply to the lock so as to exempt the defendants from liability.—FORBES, ABBOTT, AND LENNARD, LIMITED v. NEW SOUTH WALES—Debts due to the Crown—Claim to priority].—The Metropolitan Meat Industry Board was constituted in 1915 under an Act of the New South Wales Legislature, and it performed certain functions on behalf of the Government. It claimed from a company in liquidation sums for telephone services and sanitary and inspection fees, and submitted that the debt was one due to the Crown and had the right of priority of payment over the debts due to the general creditors of the debtor. Judgment of the Equity Judge in New South Wales affirmed, as the debt could not be recognized as due to the Crown.—METROPOLITAN MEAT INDUSTRY BOARD v. SHEEDY AND OTHERS [P.C.] 701

NEW ZEALAND — Monopolies — Offence—Restriction of dealing—Consideration given to another person—Whether including party's own agent—"Contrary to the public interest"—Question of fact—Commercial Trusts Act, 1910 (New Zealand statute) (1 Geo. V., No. 32), ss. 3, 5].—By s. 3 of the Commercial Trusts Act, 1910 (New Zealand statute), "Every person commits an offence who, either as principal or agent, in respect of dealings in any goods, gives, offers or agrees to give to any other person any rebate, refund, discount, concession, allowance, reward, or other valuable consideration for the reason or upon the express or implied condition that the latter person" (a) Shall deal exclusively with any person or class of persons; (b) Shall not deal with any person or class of persons; (c) Shall restrict dealings with any such person or class; (d) Shall be, or become, a member of a commercial trust; or (e) Shall act under the direction of any commercial trust with regard to the sale, purchase or supply of goods. By s. 5, "Any person who conspires with any other person to monopolize wholly or partially the demand or supply in New Zealand or any part thereof of any goods, or to control wholly or partially the demand or supply or price in New Zealand or any part thereof of any goods, is guilty of an offence if such monopoly or control is of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest." Held, that s. 3 applies only to cases where the consideration is given or the promise is made to another party to the dealing and has no application to the case of an advantage given or promised by one of the parties to the dealing to his own agent. Held, further, that in the absence of a statutory definition of the classes of monopoly or control that are to be deemed contrary to the public interest the question whether a particular monopoly or control was contrary to the public interest was in the circumstances a question of fact.—CROWN MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS v. PARTNERSHIP — Dissolution—Notice by one partner to determine partnership—Death of that partner before receipt of notice by other partner—Whether partnership dissolved by notice or by death—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict., c. 39), ss. 32, 33 (1)].—By section 32 of the Partnership Act, 1890, "Subject to any agreement between the partners a partnership is dissolved . . . (c) If entered into for an undefined time, by any partner giving notice to the other or others of his intention to dissolve the partnership. In the last-mentioned case the partnership is dissolved as from the date mentioned in the notice as the date of dissolution, or, if no date is mentioned, as from the date of the communication of the notice." By section 33 (1), "Subject to any agreement between the partners, every partnership is dissolved as regards all the partners by the death or bankruptcy of any partner." Held, that where a partner sends by post a notice to the other partner to determine the partnership as from the date of the notice and dies before the other partner receives the notice, the partnership is dissolved not by the notice but by the death of the partner sending it, inasmuch as the statutory dissolution by notice is not brought about until receipt of the notice. In such a case, therefore, the surviving partner has the rights which by the terms of the partnership he is to have on the death of a partner during the partnership.—MCLEOD v. Amendment Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict., c. 61), s. 35].—A pauper whose father is living, but is an alien with no settlement in this country, cannot take a derivative settlement from his or her mother under s. 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, because the mother is not "widowed." In these circumstances—which appear to be a casus omissus—the pauper, in the absence of a settlement acquired by residence, retains the settlement of birth.—NORWICH UNION v. HENSTEAD UNION [Div. Settlement — Illegitimate child—Child under 16 years of age—Marriage of mother—Residence of child in parish for 11 years — Removability—Settlement—Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict., c. 61), ss. 34, 35].—The mother of an illegitimate child married, and she and her husband subsequently acquired a settlement in a parish in the Wycombe Union. At the time of the marriage the child, then aged 3½ years, went to live in a parish in the Barton-upon-Irwell Union, and lived there for 11 years. She then lived for four years at various places, and at the end of that period she became chargeable to the Wycombe Union. Held, that up to the time of the mother's marriage the child had the settlement of her mother; that the mother's marriage made no difference; that the child was never at any time irremovable from the aforesaid parish in the Barton-upon-Irwell Union; and that, therefore, the child had never acquired a settlement in that parish by residence plus irremovability. The third paragraph of section 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, dealing with derivative settlements, does not apply to a child under 16 years of age, whether the child is legitimate or illegitimate. PRACTICE — Assignment of chose in action — Set-off available against assignor — Judgment obtained against assignor—Action by assignee—Whether set-off still available to defendant — Merger].—In an action by a plaintiff who sued as assignee of the vendor of a business to recover instalments of the purchase money owing by the defendant as purchaser, the defendant claimed the right to set-off the amount to which he was entitled as against the vendor for damages for certain breaches of warranty by the vendor under the same contract of sale. After the assignment, but before notice of it had been given to the defendant, the defendant had proceeded to obtain first an interlocutory, and subsequently a final judgment against the assignor (the vendor). The plaintiff contended that the defendant could no longer rely on the set-off, on the ground that there had been a merger of the original liability of the assignor in the judgment. Held, that the doctrine of merger did not apply, as neither were the parties to this action the same as the parties to the judgment, nor was the remedy of the same kind, since what had been a weapon of offence in the hand of the defendant against the assignor was merely a weapon of defence as regards the plaintiff's claim. The defendant, therefore, was entitled to avail himself of the set-off as against the assignee in the same manner in which he could have used it against the assignor. *Price v. Although an exception may be made to the rule in the case of a miscarriage of justice, yet the words "miscarriage of justice" in this exception mean only such a departure from the rules which permeate all judicial procedure as to make that which happened not in the proper sense judicial procedure at all. The application of the rule may, however, be prevented by showing that the finding of one of the Courts was so based on an erroneous proposition of law that, if that proposition be corrected, the finding disappears.—ROBINS v. RAILWAYS—Passenger's luggage—Hand luggage — Responsibility of railway company — Exception—Loss through negligence of passenger—Onus of proving such negligence]. —The plaintiff, who had a third-class ticket by the defendant railway company's line, got a porter to put his suit-case in a first-class compartment and travelled in another part of the train, third class, with some friends whom he found on the train. At the end of the journey the plaintiff's suit-case could not be found. In an action against the railway company for its value, Held, that as the railway had failed to discharge the onus of proving that the loss of the hand luggage arose by reason of the negligence of the passenger, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.—VOSPER v. Standard charges—Ancillary business—Dock undertaking—Consideration of amount of dock charges—Railways Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 55), s. 58 (4)].—By s. 58 (4) of the Railways Act, 1921, "When fixing the charges necessary to produce the standard revenue, the Tribunal shall take into consideration the charges in respect of any business carried on by the company ancillary or subsidiary to its railways, the charges for which are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, and if in the opinion of the Tribunal the company is not making, or has not taken reasonable steps to enable it to make, adequate charges in respect of any such business, the Tribunal shall, in fixing the charges under this part of this Act, take into account the revenue which would be produced by any such business if adequate charges were in operation." Held, that under this provision, where a railway company is carrying on a dock undertaking as an ancillary business, the conclusive test as to what is railway service and what is dock service is not whether the service has been performed within the territorial ambit of the dock undertaking, but the Railway Rates Tribunal has to take into consideration the different operations which make up the business of a dock undertaking and for which separate charges are made, and the Tribunal may come to the conclusion that some of the charges are subject, and some are not subject, to its jurisdiction.—IN RE THE RAILWAYS ACT, 1921—EX PARTE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL COMPANY AND DOCK AND HARBOUR AUTHORITIES ASSOCIATION [C.A.] 301

Statutory body—Mine drainage—Power to levy rate—Mortgage of future rates—Cessation of drainage works—Survival of rating powers—South Staffordshire Mines Drainage Acts, 1873 to 1923].—A body of Commissioners was created by statute for the purpose of underground and surface drainage of a mining area with power to levy rates upon occupiers of mines. Power was also given them to borrow money upon mortgage of the produce of future rates, and this power was exercised. Owing to financial and other difficulties the Commissioners ceased to carry on drainage operations in 1919. In 1926 they levied a rate upon the defendants as occupiers of mines in their area. RESTRAINT OF TRADE—Agreement by servant not to compete with employer after termination of employment—Limits of time and area—Protection of employer's trade interests—Validity].—The defendant was employed by the plaintiff, a tailor, as manager and cutter, for 12 months certain, the employment being thereafter terminable by one week's notice on either side, under a written agreement which provided (inter alia) that "after a determination of this agreement for any cause whatsoever the manager shall not for a period of five years from the date of such determination carry on any business similar to that of the employer or . . . be employed in any capacity by any person, firm or company carrying on a business similar to that of the employer in Snow-hill, Birmingham, or within a half-mile radius of Aston Cross, Birmingham, or Bristol-road, Birmingham." Held, that the limit of area, as well as the limit of time, applied to all the promises, and therefore it was not necessary to consider any question of severability; and that having regard to the fact that the defendant was an experienced cutter and was well known in certain districts of Birmingham, and to the necessary opportunities that he had of influencing customers, the covenant was not unreasonable to protect the employer's trade interests, and was not invalid as being in undue restraint of trade. "Stop" list—Motor Trade Association—Alleged infringement of price regulations—Publication of name of alleged infringers in "stop" list—Interim injunction refused].—The plaintiffs had been members of the Motor Trade Association, of which the members were not permitted to sell certain motor-cars except at certain prices. The association sent a person to buy a car from the plaintiffs, and, on the ground that their price regulations had been infringed by the transaction, and that the plaintiffs refused to pay a sum in the nature of a fine to the association's indemnity fund, the association caused the name of the plaintiffs to be published in their "stop" list so as to prevent the plaintiffs from obtaining supplies of goods from dealers or manufacturers. In an action against the officials of the association the plaintiffs applied for an interim injunction to restrain them from publishing the name of the plaintiffs in the "stop" list. Held, on the authority of *Ware and De Freville, Limited v. But emulsionized celluloid sheets in the form of rolls 3ft. 9in. wide, although when cut and otherwise treated they could be used in a cinematograph, are not necessarily "cinematograph films" within s. 3 (1) of the Finance Act, 1925, and therefore on importation may not be chargeable with Customs duty under that enactment. The summons asked by whom the estate duty payable at Mrs. C.'s death on account of the annual benefit, agreed at £5,000 a year, conferred on the person for the time being entitled to Brook House was to be paid, and secondly how it was to be assessed. Held, that on the death of Mrs. C. the property which passed was the right to the benefit of the annual sum of £5,000 ; that the estate duty on the property must be borne by the person to whom the property passed, but on equitable terms ; that in the first instance the estate duty should be paid out of residue, and the residue be recouped by a policy being taken out on the life of Lady L. for such an amount as would at her death produce a sum equal to the duty and be vested in the trustees ; and that the interest on the estate duty and the policy premiums should be retained and paid by the trustees in each year out of the £5,000.—IN RE CASSEL—PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. V., c. 36), s. 24].—Under the will in English form of a testator domiciled in Hong-kong his residuary property, subject to an annuity to his widow, was left on trust for his son for life with the remainder to his son's two sons. The tenant for life died domiciled in Hong-kong, which was also the domicil of his sons. Previously the tenant for life had wished to borrow money and the lenders had insisted on English trustees being appointed. Later, it was discovered that the tenant for life, who had been sole trustee, had drawn wrongfully on capital, and against his wish applications for directions regarding the administration of the trust were made to the English Court of Chancery, and the sons, who were infants, became wards of Court. At the time of the death of the tenant for life the trust property was situated abroad. Held, that the property other than the annuity to the widow was subject to estate duty, since section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, applied to the case of a trust established in this country as the result of a foreign disposition in the administration of which trust the Courts of this country might have to apply foreign law, although investments representing the trust fund were abroad and the trust was not established in this country pursuant to directions in the disposition itself. Dicta of Lord Cranworth, L.C., in *Wallace v. v. Birch ([1876] W.N., 177) applied. Excess profits duty—Requisition of goods—Compulsory sale—Assessability of profit—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915 (5 and 6 Geo. The goods were requisitioned in 1918 and a sum of money was then paid on account as compensation. The balance was awarded in 1921 by the War Compensation Court—a tribunal created by the Indemnity Act, 1920—but on the principle of Regulation 2B. Held, that the change of Court did not alter the date when the right to payment arose, and that this balance, which was net profit, was a profit of the year when the goods were requisitioned. Income-tax—Association for mutual insurance—Surplus funds—Whether assessable].—A mutual insurance association was formed, its sole activity being the indemnity of its members, who were coal-owners, against liability for compensation in respect of fatal accidents to workmen. The association formed a general fund by making calls upon members proportionate to the wages paid in their works for the time being, and the balance of the ordinary call fund was transferred to a reserve fund, into which any extraordinary calls were also paid. A member, on retirement, was entitled to get back in cash a proportion of his share in the above reserve fund, but, apart from this, members had no right at all to the cash in the reserve fund, though the interest accruing on the reserve fund could be used in diminution of members' calls. Held, that the surplus funds of the association were not assessable to income-tax, as the association was mere machinery for the purpose of enabling subscribing members to insure themselves. *New York Life Insurance Company v. Income-tax—Capital sales and sales producing income—Distinction].—The appellant and a partner converted their partnership as drapers into a private limited company in which they were the sole shareholders. The Commissioner of Taxes claimed that the amount of £15,025, which was the difference between the value of their stock-in-trade as shown in their last balance-sheet and the value at which it was computed when the company took it over, was a profit assessable to income-tax. Held, that if a business was one purely of buying and selling, a profit made by the sale of the whole of the stock, if it stood by itself, might well be assessable to income-tax, but that in the present case there was merely a slump transaction. The Crown was not entitled to take a bookkeeping entry as conclusive evidence of the existence of a profit, and the sum in question was not assessable to income-tax.—DOUGHTY v. Income-tax — Carrying on trade—Successive adventures—Additional assessment — When made—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. The operation was successful, and the appellant was asked to join, and did join, several further syndicates engaged in "turning over" other mills. In each case a profit resulted to the appellant. On March 24, 1923, the Additional Commissioners for the Division in which the appellant resided signed the book containing an estimated assessment upon the appellant to income-tax under Schedule D for the year 1919-20. The book was not delivered to the General Commissioners until April 18, 1923; notice was given to the appellant on May 5, 1923, and the assessment was signed by the General Commissioners on September 5, 1923. Held, that though each adventure of "turning over" a mill was not a trade, the succession of such adventures, in each of which the appellant took part, might constitute the carrying on of a trade by him. Held, also, that the assessment was in time, having been made by the Additional Commissioners within the three years allowed by s. 125 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The subsequent steps need not be within that time.—PICKFORD v. QUIRKE. PICKFORD v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS [Rowlatt, J.] .. 659

Pending the completion of the administration the executors paid to the trustees for the appellant society certain sums on account of income. The appellants claimed repayment of income-tax, but the Inland Revenue Commissioners refused repayment so far as related to income received by the executors before the date when the residue was ascertained. Held, that as the income when it was received was the income only of the executors and the money paid to the charity was only a sum equal to the income payable to the charity as a matter of equitable bookkeeping in due course of administration, the appellants were not entitled to the repayment claimed.—MARIE CÉLESTE SAMARITAN SOCIETY OF THE LONDON HOSPITAL v. About half the income of the home came from payments from visitors, who included convalescents, persons needing rest and change, and holiday applicants. On a claim by the trustees for exemption from income-tax on the ground that the trust was established for charitable purposes only, Held, that since, on the construction of the trust deed, there was throughout an overriding charity which fulfilled the character of a charitable convalescent home, the trustees were entitled to the exemption claimed. On July 20, 1922, the Finance Act, 1922, was passed, and that statute by s. 18 (1) made Schedule E the proper Schedule and provided by subsection (6): "The provisions of subsection (1) and subsection (3) of this section shall have effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect, for the purpose of any assessment to income-tax which is made or becomes final and conclusive after the first day of May, nineteen hundred and twenty-two, in respect of any employment (other than that of a weekly wage-earner employed by way of manual labour) under any public department, or under any company, society or body of persons or other employer mentioned in Rule 6 of the Rules applicable to Schedule E." In September, 1922, owing to a revision of the appellant's salary and bonus, an additional assessment under Schedule E was made on the appellant for 1921-22 under s. 125 of the Income Tax Act, 1918. In fact the appellant had already paid more under Schedule E than if he had originally been properly assessed under Schedule D on figures including the revised salary and bonus. Held (Lord Atkinson dissenting), that s. 18 (6) of the Finance Act, 1922, had not the retrospective effect of validating the additional assessment under Schedule E. D, Case I.].—The appellants, who were insurance and reinsurance brokers and agents in London, had an office in Paris for the purpose of direct insurance on behalf of companies for which it acted as agents, and the appellants in some cases represented the same companies in London and in Paris. A resident director of the appellants had the sole conduct of the Paris business under a power of attorney. The results of the Paris business were incorporated in the appellants' balance-sheets, but no part of the French profits was remitted to London. Held, that as the power of attorney did not, except as against third parties, divest the directors in London of their power of control over the French business, the appellants were assessable to income-tax under Case I., of Schedule D on the whole of their profits, including those of the Paris office.—B. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case I.].—A syndicate formed to work and develop a group of English and foreign patents carried on business mainly by granting licences to manufacturers at royalties. Certain foreign manufacturers, however, refused to take licences, unless they were also given an option of purchase exercisable within a given period. The syndicate entered into a contract with an American company to grant them a licence to use and work the syndicate's American patents, with an option of purchase thereof. The company exercised its option of purchase and paid to the syndicate the sum of £15,898 for the purchase of the American patents out and out. The syndicate having been assessed to income-tax and excess profits duty upon this sum, the Special Commissioners found that the profits made on the sale of patents were profits of the company's trading, and Rowlatt, J., affirmed their decision. Held (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that the Special Commissioners had misdirected themselves in law, and their finding must be reversed. The sale of the American patent rights was not a profit of circulating capital, but the transmutation of a capital asset into money, and was therefore not assessable to income-tax or excess profits duty. *Collins v. Income-tax—Foreign securities, stocks and shares, and other foreign property—Whether foreign possessions—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Case V., rule 2].—A testator, who was a citizen of the United States, left his property to trustees in that country to be applied to the use of his daughter for life. The fund constituted under the will consisted of "foreign Government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property." The appellant, who resided in England, married the testator's daughter, and was assessed to income-tax on the income under Schedule D. The trustees of the fund were a New York company, which was entitled to payment for its services, and the estate had been fully administered. The income was subject to American income-tax. It was admitted at the Bar that the income was not remitted to this country but was paid into a New York bank to the order of the testator's daughter, less the trustees' commission and the American income-tax. By Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, residents in the United Kingdom are taxable under that Schedule on all property, wherever situate, except that by rule 2 of Case V. of that Schedule tax on income from foreign possessions other than stocks, shares, or rents, is to be computed only on so much as is actually received in this country. The Special Commissioners of Income Tax decided that the assessment was good, but stated a case. Held (Viscount Sumner and Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that as the estate had been fully administered the right of the respondent's wife, if American law was the same as English law, was not merely a right to the balance sum left after deducting the commission and American income-tax, but she was entitled in equity to the dividends, and the right was not a foreign possession, other than stocks, shares, or rents, within rule 2 of Case V., and the case must be referred back to the Special Commissioners to state, (a) The particulars of the "foreign government securities, foreign stocks and shares, and other foreign property" sufficiently to show first, which of them were, in their opinion, "securities" within Case IV., rule 1, and, secondly, which of them were, in their opinion, "stocks, shares or rents" under Case V., rule 1, and thirdly, which were, in their opinion, "possessions out of the United Kingdom other than stocks, shares, or rents" under Case V., rule 2, and (b) which of those they had assessed on the income of the year of assessment and which on the average of the three preceding years ; and (c) that the sums paid into the New York bank had not been in

Income-tax—Income accumulated for benefit of a person contingently — Beneficiary having only a life interest — Claim to relief—Meaning of "benefit"—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 25].—By s. 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918 :—"Where in pursuance of the provisions of any will or settlement any income arising from any fund is accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying, and the aggregate amount in any year of assessment of that income and the income from any other fund subject to the like trusts for accumulation and of the total income of that person from all sources (hereinafter referred to as "the aggregate yearly income") is of such an amount only as would entitle an individual either to total exemption from tax or to relief from tax, that person shall, on making a claim for the purpose within three years after the end of the year of assessment in which the contingency happens, be entitled . . . to have repaid to him" [a sum calculated as therein mentioned]. Held, that the words "for the benefit of" include a case where the accumulations of income are added to the capital of a trust fund in which the beneficiary has only a life interest and where therefore the accumulations never pass to the beneficiary.—DALE v. MITCALFE [Rowlatt, J.] 481

Income-tax—Payments out of profits not brought into charge—Deduction of tax—Liability of person deducting to account to Inland Revenue Commissioners—Housing scheme — Money borrowed by borough council — Interest — Deduction of tax—Council owning profitable undertaking —Interest paid out of council's general fund — Indemnity of council against loss on scheme — Council's liability to account for sums deducted — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), All Schedules Rules, r. 21].—By Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, "(1) Upon payment of any . . . annual payment charged with tax under Schedule D, . . . not payable, or not wholly payable, out of profits or gains brought into charge, the person by or through whom any such payment is made shall deduct thereout a sum representing the amount of the tax. . . . (2) Any such person shall forthwith render an account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue of the amount so deducted, or of the amount deducted out of so much . . . as is not paid out of profits or gains brought into charge . . . and every such amount shall be a debt due from him to the Crown. . . ." Under the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 to 1919, and the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, the respondents, a metropolitan borough council, assigned to the London County Council all rates authorized to be raised by the respondents under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, or the London Government Act, 1899, to secure money advanced by the London County Council. The money so raised was used by the respondents in connexion with the construction of flats for the working classes in pursuance of a scheme prepared by them under s. 1 of the Housing, Town Planning, &c., Act, 1919. In making payments of interest on the sums advanced the respondents deducted income-tax under Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The interest was paid out of the general fund in the hands of the respondents, into which fund were paid all profits or gains whether derived from a housing scheme or from elsewhere. The respondents had only one banking account, out of which all payments, including the interest, were made and into which all receipts, including the profits and gains derived from the respondents' electricity undertaking, or otherwise, were paid. No special fund in respect of any housing scheme was maintained. It was admitted that the respondents possessed profits or gains brought into charge to income-tax sufficient for the payment of interest on the sums advanced, apart from any revenue derived under any housing scheme. Held, that as none of the respondents' profits and gains other than the receipts of the housing scheme contributed to the payment of the interest, and as the respondents had, under the Housing Acts, an indemnity against loss on the scheme, the respondents were liable under Rule 21 to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the amount of the deductions.—DICKSON v. HAMPSTEAD BOROUGH COUNCIL [Rowlatt, J.] 595

Income-tax — Professional footballer—Transfer to different club—Payment of a sum as accrued benefit — Assessability].—The respondent was employed to play football for a club in return for payment, and, on his being transferred in accordance with the rules of the Football Association to another club, he was given by the first-named club a sum of £650 as accrued benefit. Held, that the payment was neither a gift nor compensation for loss of employment, but was really remuneration for services and was therefore assessable to income-tax.—DAVIS v. HARRISON [Rowlatt, J.] 623

Income-tax — Profit or gain — Professional cricketer's benefit—Proceeds—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule E.].—The House (Lord Atkinson dissenting) held that the proceeds of a professional cricketer's benefit match did not, in the circumstances, constitute an income, profit, or gain assessable to income-tax, since they were a personal gift and not remuneration. Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 514; [1927] 1 K.B., 90) reversed.—SEYMOUR v. REED [H.L.] 584

Income-tax — Profits — Deductions — Business expense—Payment to retiring director —Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Cases I. and II., rule 3 (a)].—The Court held that a payment by a company to a director in order to induce him to retire, in circumstances in which the other directors had come to the conclusion that it was essential in the interests of the company that he should retire, was a business expense deductible from the company's profits for purposes of income-tax. Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 100), affirmed.—MITCHELL v. B. W. NOBLE, LIMITED [C.A.] 245

Income-tax—Profits of trade—Gigantic deal in linen—Completion of transaction within a year—"Annual" profits—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Cases I. and VI.].—The appellant, who was an agricultural machinery merchant, bought a gigantic consignment of linen and set to work to make people buy it, and he succeeded in selling it within a year by organizing a vast activity for that purpose. He was assessed to income-tax under Schedule D on his profits on the sale of the linen, and on appeal to the Special Commissioners he contended that he did not carry on any trade in connexion with linen, that the transaction was an isolated one, and that the profit was not an annual profit chargeable to income-tax. The Special Commissioners held that in exercising these activities the appellant was for the time being carrying on a trade the profits of which were chargeable to income-tax. Held, that there was evidence on which the Special Commissioners could find the transaction to be in the nature of a trade, and that the fact of the profits being the income of a trade and belonging to the year of assessment was enough to make the profits "annual" within Case VI. of Schedule D, and the decision of the Special Commissioners must be affirmed. Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 233; [1926] 1 K.B., 550) affirmed.—MARTIN v. LOWRY. SAME v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS [H.L.] .. 116

Income-tax—Public school—Claim of allowance—Absence of elements of permanence—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. A, No. VI., r. 1 (c)].—The appellants, a limited company, owned and carried on a high-class secondary school managed by Governors who were partly elected by the shareholders and partly nominated by the Crown. By the company's articles no profit was to be divided amongst members. Practically the whole of the receipts of the company arose from fees paid for pupils. The appellants claimed under Schedule A, No. VI., rule 1 (c), of the Income Tax Act, 1918, an allowance on the ground that the school was a public school. Held, that the elements of permanence connoted by the word "foundation" were part of the essence of a public school, and as these elements were absent the appellants were not entitled to the allowance claimed.—BIRKENHEAD SCHOOL, LIMITED v. DRING [Rowlatt, J.] 48

Income-tax — Schedule A — House let in apartments—Weekly tenancies—Basis of assessment—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule A, No. VII., Rule 8].—Where a house is let in a number of apartments or tenements on weekly tenancies, the correct method of arriving at the annual value of the entire house or tenement for the purpose of charging the landlord to income-tax under No. VII., Rule 8, of Schedule A of the Income Tax Act, 1918, is to ascertain what the value of each of the separate tenements would be if they were let by the year and to add the values together, making the permitted deductions from the total. It is not allowable either (a) to estimate what a hypothetical tenant would give for the whole house on the basis that he could re-let it in tenements at weekly rents, nor (b) to add together the weekly rents and multiply by 52 and then allow a discount for contingencies.—WILLIAMS v. SANDERS [Rowlatt, J.] 663

Income-tax — Schedule D — Deductions—Machinery and plant—Wear and tear — Obsolescence — Solicitor's law-books — Whether included in "plant"—Finance Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 36), s. 16].—The word "plant" in s. 16 of the Finance Act, 1925, which extends to professions the allowance granted to traders under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the wear and tear and obsolescence of machinery and plant, does not include a solicitor's books which he consults for professional purposes.—DAPHNE v. SHAW [Rowlatt, J.] 45

Income-tax—Schedule D—Profits of trade—Three years' average not applicable—Period over which average to be taken—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Cases I. and II., Rule 1 (2)].—The appellant firm began a new business on March 1, 1919, and made up their first account on December 31, 1919. On March 1, 1920, they sold the business to the appellant company, which decided to make up its accounts to March 31 in each year and accordingly made up an account for three months ending March 31, 1920. It was agreed that the assessment to income-tax, Schedule D, for the year ending April 5, 1920, ought to be apportioned between the firm and the company. Held, that under Rule 1 (2) of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D the liability to income-tax for the year ending April 5, 1920, should be based on a fair and just average, for a year, of the profits from March 1, 1919, to April 5, 1919, without bringing in any profits of the year of charge at all. Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 479; [1926] 2 K.B., 289) reversed.—CLARE AND HEYWORTH v. BETTS [H.L.] 387

Income-tax — Trading profits — Deduction—Multiple shops—Control by head office—

Shops opened and closed as demanded by business as a whole—Difference between cost of fitting new shops and receipts from sale of equivalent second-hand fittings from closed shops—Capital expenditure—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Case I.].—A trading company, carrying on business through a number of branch shops which were all subject to control by the head office, followed a policy of opening and closing branch shops as was demanded by the business as a whole. Held, that the difference between the cost of new fixtures, fittings and utensils for the new shops and the receipts from the sale of equivalent second-hand fixtures, &c., from the shops that were closed was a capital expenditure and was not a revenue expenditure which could be debited to the trading account of the company to ascertain the profits which were assessable to income-tax.—EASTMAN'S, LIMITED v. SHAW [Rowlatt, J.] 549

Income-tax — Water authority — Interest on stock and debentures — Deduction and retention of tax—Whether interest paid out of profits not brought into charge—Liability to account for tax—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), All Schedules Rules, Rules 19, 21].—The profits of the Metropolitan Water Board are assessable under Schedule A, No. III., Rule 3, of the Income Tax Act, 1918, by reference to the profits of the year preceding the year of assessment. The accounts of the Board for the year ending March 31, 1922, showed a loss, and therefore no assessment was made on the Board under Schedule A, No. III., for the year ending April 5, 1923. The accounts for the year ending March 31, 1923, showed a profit of over two millions, out of which the Board paid over one million interest on water stock and debentures, deducting and retaining the income-tax thereon. On an information claiming that under Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules the Board was liable to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the amount of the tax so deducted, the Board contended that the interest paid for the year 1922-23 was payable out of profits brought into charge for 1922-23 within Rule 19 of the All Schedules Rules and was in fact paid out of the profits for 1922-23, and that, although the income-tax for 1922-23 was to be measured by the profits of the preceding year, the profits for 1922-23 had been brought into charge, and Rule 21 did not apply. Held, that as the Board had been assessed at zero under Schedule A for 1922-23, the interest had not been paid out of profits brought into charge, and the Crown was entitled to succeed.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. METROPOLITAN WATER BOARD [Rowlatt, J.] 656

Stamp duties—Receipt forms issued by bank to customers—Availability for payment either to customer or to holder—Limitation to sums under £2—Whether subject to the same stamp duty as cheques—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., c. 39), s. 32].—The appellant bank introduced a scheme by which their customers could obtain free of charge a book of receipts containing forms which, when filled up, could be presented by a customer for payment at a branch of the bank or could be handed to a tradesman or other creditor in settlement of a debt and then presented by him for payment. The receipt forms were available only for the payment of sums under £2 and the bank contended that the forms did not require to be stamped with a 2d. cheque stamp. Held, that as such a document "entitled" the recipient, within the meaning of s. 32 of the Stamp Act, 1891, to payment of the sum mentioned, it was subject to the same stamp duty as a cheque.—MIDLAND BANK, LIMITED v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE [Rowlatt, J.] 754

Supertax—Arrears of interest on bonds—Several years' arrears paid in one sum—Whether income of year in which payment was made—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 5 (3) (c)].—Where a taxpayer purchases bearer bonds on which the interest for several years is in arrear and his purchase confers upon him the right to the arrears, and several years' arrears are subsequently paid to him in one sum, the whole of that sum forms for the purpose of supertax, under s. 5 (3) (c) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, part of his income for the year in which payment was received.—LEIGH v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS [Rowlatt, J.] 528

Supertax — Infant — Income of his trust property — Sums paid by trustees for maintenance—Accumulation of balance—Accumulations "receivable by infant"—Infant's liability to super-tax—Liability of trustees and guardian to make super-tax returns—Representative assessments—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII., c. 8), s. 72 (2) (5) (6)—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), ss. 5 (3) (c), 7 (2) (5) (6), 161, All Schedules Rules, Rule 4].—Where trustees of a settlement set apart certain sums annually for the maintenance of an infant beneficiary and allow the balance of the income to accumulate, the income that is being accumulated is "receivable" by the infant within the meaning of s. 5 (3) (c) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and he is liable to be assessed to super-tax in respect of it. But representative assessments to super-tax cannot be made upon the trustees or the guardian of the infant beneficiary, either in respect of the actual total income of the infant, or in respect of a total income limited, as regards the particular trustee or guardian, to that income with which the trust or guardianship is concerned. So Held by the Court on the first point, and by the Court on the second point as regards the guardian, and by Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Scrutton, L.J., as regards the trustees. But Held by Sargant, L.J. (dissenting), that the words of section 72 (6) of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, or the equivalent words in section 7 (6) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, are wide enough to enable such assessments to be made upon trustees. Decisions of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 157; [1927] 1 K.B., 594), affirmed.—INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. PAKENHAM AND OTHERS. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. COUNTESS OF LONGFORD [C.A.] 835

Supertax—Occupation of family mansion—Permission of trustees—Annual value of house — Whether to be included in occupant's income — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. A].—The Court held that the occupant of a family mansion, under the terms of a will by which trustees were given general powers of management of the real estate and a discretion to admit to the mansion the present occupant or certain members of his family during his lifetime, must be regarded as being in occupation under the will, and that the profits and gains representing the annual value of the house formed part of his income for purposes of supertax.—TOLLEMACHE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS [Rowlatt, J.] 58

SAFEGUARDING OF INDUSTRIES — Dyestuffs — Synthetic organic colouring matter —Prohibition of import—Artists' colours—Small proportion of prohibited matter — Commercial impossibility of use for other purposes—Whether within the prohibition—Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 77), ss. 1, 2 (1)].—Section 1 of the Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act, 1920, which prohibits the importation except under a licence granted in accordance with s. 2 (1), of "all synthetic organic dyestuffs, colours and colouring matters," includes in the prohibition artists' colours which are enclosed in toy paint-boxes and which contain a proportion of synthetic organic colouring matter, even though the proportion is so small that it would not pay to extract it and use it for any other purpose.—WHYTE, RIDSDALE AND CO., LIMITED v. SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS—Extract of meat and malt wine—No fixed standard of quality — Analyst's certificate — Duty of Court to fix standard—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. 63), s. 6—Wholesaler charged with aiding and abetting retailer—Not present at sale—No evidence of knowledge of composition of article sold].—Where an article of food or a drug has no recognized standard of quality, it is the duty of the Court before which a person is charged with supplying that article or drug not of the nature, substance and quality demanded by the purchaser, and to his prejudice, to fix a standard in the sense of considering whether the article supplied must be held to fall below a reasonable minimum, whatever it might in fact be. Where an analyst's certificate is before the Court, and is uncontradicted, the Court ought to act upon it, if it asserts that the article is deficient. A wholesaler who supplies an article to a retailer for re-sale cannot be convicted of aiding and abetting if he is not present when the re-sale takes place, nor in the absence of evidence that he knew the composition of the article.—BOWKER v. SALE OF GOODS—Auction—Conditions of sale —"Lot to be taken away . . . the day after sale"—"All lots uncleared . . . shall be re-sold"— Refusal by buyer to clear lots — Whether re-sale obligatory upon auctioneers].—Certain goods were put up for sale by auction, the conditions of sale printed on the auctioneers' catalogue providing: "The lot to be taken away and paid for . . . the day after sale," and "upon failure of complying with the above conditions . . . all lots uncleared within the time aforesaid . . . shall be re-sold." A purchaser, through his own negligence, bid for a lot for which he had not intended to bid, and the lot was knocked down to him. He afterwards endeavoured to persuade the auctioneers to put up the lot for sale again, but they declined. Upon his refusing to pay, an action for the purchase price was brought by the auctioneers, and the purchaser contended that under the conditions of sale it was obligatory upon the auctioneers to re-sell the lot in question, and that he could be charged only with any deficiency upon re-sale. Held, that the words "all lots uncleared . . . shall be re-sold" did not impose any obligation upon the auctioneers, but merely conferred upon them an option of re-selling at their discretion, and that the auctioneers were entitled to recover the full price at which the lot was knocked down to the purchaser.—ROBINSON, FISHER AND HARDING v. BEHAR [Div. Ct.] 66

Goods sold to Turkish customers—Contracts still executory at outbreak of war—Delivery of goods to customers after outbreak of war—Payment received in piastres by seller's agents—Claim by seller against his agents for sterling—Agency of necessity—Conversion—Damages —Treaty of Lausanne, 1923, Art. 84—Treaty of Peace (Turkey) Act, 1924 (14 Geo. V., c. 7)—Treaty of Peace (Turkey) Order, 1924].—The defendant bank, a Turkish subject, was at the outbreak of war between this country and Turkey holder of sight bills drawn in sterling for the purchase price of goods consigned by the plaintiff from Manchester to his customers in Beyrout which had arrived in Beyrout before the outbreak of war and were subsequently delivered to the purchasers against payment to the bank in piastres. At the conclusion of the war the defendant bank claimed to be entitled to pay to the plaintiff an amount in sterling which represented the then value of the piastres which they had received in payment for the goods. The plaintiff, on the other hand, claimed to be entitled to be paid the sterling amounts of the bills at sight. Alternatively he claimed damages for conversion. Held, (1) that the effect of the outbreak of war was to dissolve both the mandate to deliver the goods which were in the custody of the defendant's branch at Beyrout to the plaintiff's customers in Turkey and to collect the face value of the sight bills; (2) that under the conditions in which they found themselves the Beyrout branch had not become agents of necessity; and (3) that as that branch had taken for a former principal's goods moneys which they had no right either to demand or to receive the defendant bank was liable to the plaintiff for damages for conversion.—JEBARA v. OTTOMAN BANK [C.A.] 369

SHIP — Bill of lading — Short delivery—Claim by indorsees of bills of lading].—In an action for freight by shipowners against indorsees of bills of lading the defendants counterclaimed for short delivery. The shipowners denied short delivery, and contended that in any event the indorsees of bills of lading had no right to sue. Held, on the facts, that the defendants had failed to prove the alleged short delivery, and the counterclaim must therefore fail. Consideration of the question whether the indorsees of bills of lading could sue in respect of missing cargo was thus rendered unnecessary, and the question was left undecided.—NORTH SHIPPING CO., LIMITED v. JOSEPH RANK, LIMITED [Roche, J.] .. 82

Charterparty—Arbitration clause—Balance of freight — Short delivery — Charterers' admission of balance due for freight—Counterclaim for short delivery — Right of shipowners to recover admitted balance — Counterclaim barred by arbitration clause].—The plaintiffs chartered their ship to the defendants to carry grain, the charterparty providing that all disputes should be referred to arbitration and that the claimant's arbitrator must be "appointed within three months of final discharge, and where this provision is not complied with the claim shall be deemed to be waived and absolutely barred." Before completion of discharge the defendants made various payments to the plaintiffs on account of freight, and on final discharge the plaintiffs claimed that £568 was still owing for freight. The defendants admitted that £416 was still owing for freight, but they set up a counterclaim for £581 for short delivery and refused to pay the £416 until their counterclaim was met. Neither party referred the matter to arbitration, and more than three months after final discharge the plaintiffs brought an action for £568 balance of freight and the defendants counterclaimed £581 for short delivery. Held, that though the plaintiffs could not recover the £568 as the claim for it ought to have been taken to arbitration, yet they could recover the £416 about which there had never been any dispute, but that the counterclaim, as it was always in dispute, was barred by the arbitration clause.—Bede Steam Shipping Company, Limited v. Bunge y Born, Limitada, S.A. [MacKinnon, J.] 374

Charterparty — Bill of lading — Construction of clauses—Cargo of sugar in bags—Discrepancy between bill of lading number and out-turn tally—Meaning of "error"—Proof by inference excluded]. — The claimants chartered a ship from the respondents, the owners, to convey a cargo of sugar from Cuba to a British port, the charterparty providing that mate's receipts should be signed for each parcel and that bills of lading in accordance therewith should be signed by the master, and "Quantity stated on bills of lading to be conclusive evidence as to number of bags of sugar shipped unless error or fraud can be proved." The mate signed receipts and the master signed bills of lading in accordance with the receipts. The bills of lading provided that "the carrier shall not be concluded as to the correctness of statements herein of . . . quantity." The bags discharged at Greenock were found to be short of the number in the bills of lading, and a claim by the charterers against the shipowners in respect of the shortage went to arbitration. No fraud was alleged, and the arbitrator held that there was no evidence how the discrepancy arose and that under the conclusive evidence clause in the charterparty the shipowners were liable in the absence of proof of some definite error in the bills of lading or tallies otherwise than by inference from the fact that all the bags shipped were discharged, and he made an award in favour of the charterers. Held, that variations of the bill of lading from the charterparty were of no account, and that on the conclusive evidence clause in the charterparty the shipowners could not escape liability by giving evidence from which a mistake might be inferred but they must prove a mistake in the mate's receipts so that it could be seen how the mistake arose, and therefore the award must be upheld.—Royal Commission on Sugar Supply v. Hartlepools Seatonia Steamship Company, Limited [MacKinnon, J.].. 542

Charterparty—"Cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer"—Meaning of "alongside"—Custom of port of Hull].—The plaintiffs, as shipowners, chartered a steamer to the defendants to carry a cargo of timber from the Baltic to Hull. The charterparty contained a clause as follows: "Cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch . . . according to the custom of the respective ports. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary." The steamer arrived at Hull in due course. One customary mode of discharging a timber cargo at the port of Hull was to erect a staging from the ship's side to a line of rails on which bogies ran, and to place the timber on the bogies. The nearest rail was some distance away from the side of the quay.

SHIP] PAGE

On the refusal of the defendants to carry the timber to the bogies, the plaintiffs did the work and claimed to recover the cost from the defendants. The defendants proved that by the custom of the port of Hull the cost of placing the timber on the bogies was to be borne by the shipowners. Held, that the custom relied on by the defendants was inconsistent with the language of the charterparty, that the word "alongside" was not proved to have acquired any conventional meaning in the timber importing trade at Hull, and that the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to recover. The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423; [1922] 1 A.C., 397) followed. Charterparty—Dead freight—Charterers' obligation to load full cargo—Failure—Ship's call at port to load other cargo — Delay — Deviation — Mitigation of damages].—The plaintiffs, who were shipowners, chartered a steamer to the defendants to bring a cargo of sugar from Java to Europe, the defendants binding themselves to load a full and complete cargo. A clause of the charterparty provided: "The steamer has liberty to deviate and proceed to and from one or more ports or places in Java in any order . . . to tow and assist vessels in distress, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life or property." The defendants were not able to load a full cargo, and the steamer left with the quantity loaded, and, without the defendants' consent, she called at Alexandria on the voyage and took in oil cake to fill up, the loading of the cake occupying about five days. In an action by the shipowners against the charterers for dead freight the defendants pleaded that by loading the cake at Alexandria the steamer had deviated from the course of the voyage and the plaintiffs had broken the charter contract and had lost their right of action against the defendants for not loading a full cargo. The plaintiffs alleged that they had loaded the cake in order to mitigate damages. Held, that it was an implied term of every charterparty that, if the charterers failed in their duty to load, the shipowners had a right to take in other cargo to fill the vacant space, provided that to do so was reasonable in the circumstances, the test being whether it would diminish the damages for which the charterers would otherwise be liable, and that, as the loading of the cake must be taken to have been in mitigation of the damages, and as there was therefore no delay unauthorized by the implied term, there was no deviation, and the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed.—Wallems Rederi Aktieselskab v. Charterparty—Discharge—Total expense paid by shipowners—Mistaken belief as to effect of custom — Settlement with charterers on this basis—Subsequent judicial decision as to real effect of custom—Partial liability of charterers—Action by shipowners against charterers to recover charterers' share of expense].—The plaintiffs, as owners, chartered a steamer to the defendants to bring to West Hartlepool a cargo of pit props, to be "taken from alongside at the charterers' risk and expense as customary." The custom at West Hartlepool varied according as the discharge was to be into railway wagons or on to the quay. In this case the discharge was into railway wagons, and the props, after being swung over the wagons by a crane, had to be stowed in the wagons. The plaintiffs and the defendants settled accounts on the basis that the plaintiffs were liable for the whole cost of discharge, but afterwards it was held in The Rensfjell (40 The Times L.R., 458) that by the custom at West Hartlepool from the moment when the cargo was released from the sling the cost of handling it and stowing it in the wagons fell on the charterers. The shipowners, therefore, in this action sought to recover from the charterers such share of the cost of discharge as ought to have been borne by the latter, the claim being for breach of contract in not providing the men to stow the cargo, and alternatively for money paid to the defendants' use. Held, that as both parties believed it to be the duty of the plaintiffs to provide the men for stowage and therefore the defendants had not committed a breach of contract, and as the plaintiffs had made a voluntary payment under the mistaken belief that they were liable to make it, the action failed.—Aktieselskabet Dampskibs Steinstad v. W. Pearson and Co. [MacKinnon, J.] 531

Charterparty — Freight — Discount — Computation].—The plaintiffs, as owners, chartered a steamer to the defendants by a charterparty which, after providing for the rate of freight, contained the clause : "The said freight, less advances, if any, to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash, but if ordered outside the United Kingdom to discharge, in London concurrent with discharge, but, in any case, subject to two months' discount at 5 per cent. per annum." A further clause provided : "Money for steamer's ordinary disbursements, not exceeding one-fourth of estimated freight, to be advanced, if required by the captain, at the port of loading by the charterers . . . to be indorsed on bills of lading, if required, and deducted from the freight at settlement." Held (Lord Hanworth, M.R., dissenting), that the 5 per cent. discount was to be calculated not on the whole amount of the freight but on that amount less advances for disbursements.—Kokusai Kisen Kaisha v. Louis Dreyfus and Co. [C.A.] 131

Collision—Navigation round points or sharp bends—Port of London River By-Laws, 1914-1926, By-law 36]. — By-law 36 of the Port of London River By-Laws, 1914-1926, provides :—"Every steam vessel navigating against the tide shall on approaching points or sharp bends in the river ease her speed and if necessary stop and wait before rounding so as to allow any vessel navigating with the tide to round and pass clear of her." Held, that the by-law imposes on the vessel navigating against the tide two duties, (a) to ease her speed, and (b), if necessary, to stop her engines and wait before rounding so as to allow any vessel navigating with the tide to round and pass clear of her. The question whether it is necessary to stop and wait is one of seamanship, and depends upon the particular facts of each case.—The Backworth [Hill, J.] .. 644

Definition—Pontoon with crane—Adaptability for navigation].—The Court held that a pontoon with a crane fixed on it was not a "ship or vessel" within the rules of an indemnity association, on the ground that the quality of adaptability for navigation was not sufficiently present to bring it within the meaning of these words in the rules. Decision of Roche, J. (42 The Times L.R., 724) affirmed.—Merchants' Marine Insurance Company, Limited v. North of England Protecting and Indemnity Association [C.A.] 107

Practice—Service out of jurisdiction—Collision—Inlets of the sea—Bristol Channel—R.S.C., Order XI., r. 1 (ee)].—A collision occurred in the Bristol Channel, about midway between the English and Welsh coasts, a little to the eastward of a line drawn from Bull Point in Devon to Port Eynon Head in Gower, Glamorgan, between the plaintiffs' steamship Cornish Coast and the defendants' steamship Fagernes. At the place in question the channel is 20 miles wide. The Fagernes, an Italian ship, was sunk, and in those circumstances the plaintiffs, being unable to proceed for their damage in rem, brought an action of tort against the Italian owners in personam, and obtained an order giving leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction on the ground that the action was founded on a tort committed within the jurisdiction. The defendants thereupon moved to have this order set aside, on the ground (inter alia) that the collision occurred outside British territorial waters and therefore the Court had no jurisdiction. The Judge hearing the motion held that the collision occurred in a part of the Bristol Channel over which the English Courts had jurisdiction, because the waters of that part of the channel were inter fauces terræ and were deemed by the common law to be part of the territory of the State which owned the land on both sides, and that therefore the order giving leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction must stand. On the hearing of an appeal the Attorney-General informed the Court of Appeal that the Crown did not claim the part of the Bristol Channel where the collision occurred as being within the territorial jurisdiction of the King. Held, that in view of the information given to the Court by the Attorney-General and of the absence of evidence of any effective occupation the order giving leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction must be set aside. Appeal from decision of Hill, J. (42 The Times L.R., 621 ; [1926] P., 185), allowed.—The FAGERNES [C.A.] 746

Requisition — Cargo — Government order not to discharge—Detention of ship—Ultimate requisition of cargo—Compensation for detention—Emergency Regulations, 1921, regs. 9, 11, 25].—The suppliants were the owners of a steamer which, in March, 1921, was chartered from them to bring a cargo of coal from Sunderland to London. The steamer arrived at Rotherhithe on April 1, but on April 2, before she could begin to discharge, a Customs official gave directions that, by reason of the coal strike, the cargo was not to be discharged. The ship was detained until April 21, when the Government requisitioned the coal. She was then ordered by the Board of Trade to take the coal to Erith, and to discharge it there. The discharge was completed on April 23. The suppliants claimed damages for detention of the ship and asked for (a) a declaration that she was requisitioned by a Government Department, and that they were entitled under reg. 25 of the Emergency Regulations, 1921, to compensation for 21 days' detention, and (b) a declaration that they were entitled to compensation at common law. Held, that the order not to discharge was not a requisition of the ship, and that the suppliants were entitled under the Regulations to compensation for a requisition of the ship for only two days, namely, April 22 and 23, and that a mere negative prohibition did not carry with it any claim to compensation at common law.—W. FRANCE FENWICK AND CO., LIMITED v. THE KING [Wright, J.] .. 18

Sale — Goods — Specific performance—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), ss. 4, 62 (1)].—A ship comes within the description of "goods" in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, since by s. 62 (1) "'goods' include all chattels personal other than things in action and money." Under s. 52 of the Act the Court may direct specific performance of the sale of a ship.—BEHNKE v. BEDE SHIPPING COMPANY, LIMITED [Wright, J.] 170

Salvage — Duties of contracting parties—Salvage prevented by negligence of crew of ship—Damages].—The masters of the plaintiffs' tugs orally contracted with the master of a steamship—which after stranding and sustaining great damage had refloated on the flood tide—to render salvage services to the ship by towing her to a named spot and beaching her. Owing, however, to the negligence of the servants of the shipowners in failing to slip, at the proper moment, an anchor by which the steamship was being held, the tugs were unable to perform the contractual services, and the vessel again went aground. Held, that there was an implied obligation on each party to the contract to act with ordinary skill and care in carrying out his share of the combined work, and that the plaintiffs, having been prevented by the negligence of the shipowners' servants from performing the contract, were entitled to recover in personam against the shipowners, as damages, the amount which but for such negligence they would have earned under the contract.—THE VALSESIA [Hill, J.] 144

Salvage—Lloyd's salvage agreement, "No cure no pay"—Maritime lien—Arrest under foreign jurisdiction—Saisie conservatoire—No maritime lien under foreign jurisdiction—Sale of ship by syndic (trustee) in bankruptcy of owner in Egypt—Arrest of ship, after sale, in this country].—The plaintiffs, a firm of salvage contractors, by a writ in rem claimed salvage for services rendered by them to the defendants' steamship under the terms of a salvage agreement in Lloyd's Standard Form, known as "No cure no pay," signed by the master. The agreement expressly provided that in the event of security not being given by the owners of the ship and cargo the salvors should be entitled to take steps to enforce their maritime lien. After the salvage services the ship was arrested in Constantinople, but she was released upon her owner undertaking that she would proceed forthwith to Alexandria and there submit to re-arrest until such time as security was provided. The vessel duly sailed from Constantinople, but before her arrival at Alexandria her owner had become bankrupt in Egypt, and the ship, on reaching the Egyptian port, was seized by his syndic or trustee in bankruptcy, and by that official sold, in the bankruptcy proceedings, to the defendants, free from encumbrances. An order obtained by the plaintiffs for a saisie conservatoire of the ship, in accordance with Egyptian law, was therefore ineffective. The plaintiffs proceeded to arbitration in accordance with the terms of Lloyd's agreement, and having obtained an award in the absence of the shipowners, entered a claim in the bankruptcy in Egypt for the amount of the award. The syndic, however, opposed the claim on the ground that the master had no authority to sign the salvage agreement, and that matter was now pending in the Egyptian Courts. No maritime lien or right in rem is recognized by Egyptian law, or conferred by a saisie conservatoire. After being sold by the syndic the ship came within the jurisdiction of the English Courts, and she was thereupon arrested by the plaintiffs in an action in rem. On a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ in that action, Held, that the sale by the syndic was not a sale of the res, as a sale on a judgment in an action in rem, which would confer a title free from encumbrances, but was merely a sale of the interest of the bankrupt owner, and therefore a sale cum onere, and could not discharge the maritime lien of the salvors; that the salvors' maritime lien had not been discharged by the signing of the salvage agreement, because although Lloyd's salvage agreement was a bargain to arbitrate, the contract itself was based on the owner of the salved property providing security in the terms of the contract, and the salvors' lien could only be defeated if the whole of the salvage agreement was carried out; and that, in fact, security never had been provided in the terms of the agreement, and the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to maintain an action and assert their maritime lien.—THE GOULANDRIS [Bateson, J.] 308

Salvage—Services rendered by request—No actual benefit resulting therefrom—Award—S.O.S. calls for assistance].—Wireless signals for assistance made by the defendants' steamship were picked up by the plaintiffs' steamship, which was then asked by wireless to give towage services for a daily rate of remuneration. The plaintiffs declined to assist except on a salvage basis, and finally the defendants' steamship wirelessed "Accept your offer for assistance." Thereupon the plaintiffs' steamship steamed some 120 miles to the defendants' steamship, deviating for the purpose from her own course, but, although she was after a time able to make fast, the tow-ropes soon parted, and the plaintiffs' vessel resumed her voyage by mutual arrangement without having rendered any really beneficial service. Subsequently the defendants' ship was towed into port by other salvors. Held, that although merely responding to an S.O.S. call for assistance would not of itself necessarily give a claim to salvage remuneration, yet where a ship was definitely requested by wireless to come to the aid of a disabled vessel and do what she could to assist her, and she did go to the assistance of the disabled vessel, she was entitled to a salvage award, even although, as events turned out, she was not able to confer much, if any, benefit. Decision of Bateson, J. (42 The Times L.R., 720; [1926] P., 205), affirmed.—THE STIKLESTAD [C.A.] 118

Seaworthiness—Warranty—Bad stowage].—The plaintiffs employed the first defendants, who were lightermen, to provide barges to convey wood pulp from a ship at Erith to Farncombe and to stow the pulp in the barges. The first defendants employed the second defendants, who were stevedores, to do the stowage. The quantity of pulp put on board one of the barges was in excess of her capacity, and the result was that cracks in her upper structure admitted water and she sank while still alongside the ship and the pulp became a loss. In an action for damages the Judge at the trial held that the first defendants were liable, as the bad stowage, making the barge in question unfit to undergo the ordinary perils which might arise at all stages of the work contracted for, was a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness, but that the second defendants were not liable, as they had no knowledge of the capacity of the barge and had merely acted according to the instructions of the first defendants. On an appeal by the first defendants, Held, that there was evidence to support the Judge's finding against the first defendants, and the appeal failed. Decision of Roche, J. (42 The Times L.R., 744), affirmed.—ALBERT E. REED AND CO., LIMITED v. PAGE, SON, AND EAST, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER [C.A.] 272

Ship repairers—Dockowners—Damage by fire in dry dock—Ship undergoing repairs—Limitation of liability—Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict., c. 32), s. 2].—By s. 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act, 1900, "(1) The owners of any dock or canal, or a harbour authority or a conservancy authority, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any vessel or vessels . . . be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which, at the time of such loss or damage occurring, is, or within the period of five years previous thereto has been, within the area over which such dock or canal owner . . . performs any duty or exercises any power . . . (4) For the purpose of this section the term 'dock' shall include wet docks and basins, tidal docks and basins, locks, cuts, entrances, dry docks, graving docks. . . ." The defendants' steamship, while undergoing repairs by the plaintiffs in the plaintiffs' dry dock at Blackwall, sustained damage by fire, the outbreak of which was found to be due to the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants employed in the repairs. The plaintiffs therefore claimed a declaration that as dockowners they were entitled under s. 2 of the Act of 1900 to a decree limiting their liability. Held (Lord Wrenbury and Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that though the work in which the negligence occurred, giving rise to the liability of the plaintiffs in the present case, was work done by the plaintiffs in the capacity of ship repairers and not in the capacity of dry dock owners, s. 2 applied and the plaintiffs were entitled to limit their liability. Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 708; [1927] P., 47) affirmed.—THE RUAPEHU [H.L.] .. 402

Title—Russian ship—Soviet decree for nationalization—Sale by Soviet Government to Italian company—Right to possession].—The plaintiff company was a Russian ship-

owning company, and by a Russian decree made in 1918 the company's property was nationalized and it passed to the Soviet Republic, provided that the Soviet Republic took possession of it. The plaintiff company's business having been moved to France in 1919, the French Courts appointed an administrator, and to this office the plaintiff B. ultimately succeeded. In 1922 one of the plaintiff company's ships was laid up at an English port, and the master handed her over to the London representatives of the Soviet Government, and in 1924 she was sold on behalf of that Government to the defendants, an Italian company. In an action claiming that the plaintiffs were the lawful owners of the vessel and that possession should be given to them, the evidence was that the decree did not transfer property which was not within the jurisdiction of the Soviet Republic, and the Trial Judge came to the conclusion that it was not proved that the ship was within the territory of the Soviet Republic at the time of the decree. Held, that the defendant company had failed to establish a title superior to that of the plaintiff B., and that the latter had a sufficient possessory title to maintain the action against the defendant company and was entitled to possession. TITHES—City of London—Rate prescribed by statute—Exemption from prescribed rate—Premises for which less paid before Act—Onus of proof—37 Henry VIII., c. 12].—By the Act 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, and a decree made pursuant to it and having the force of a statute, the lessees of houses and all other hereditaments (with certain immaterial exceptions), situated in the City of London, are liable to pay a tithe of 2s. 9d. for every rent of 20s. by the year, "and so above the rent of 20s. by the year . . . by the rate aforesaid." The decree contained a proviso that in the case of premises in respect of which less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes before 1545, the date of the Act, the premises should be exempted from the prescribed rate. In an action by the owners of tithes against the occupiers of premises in the City for tithe at the rate prescribed by the statute, Held, that the onus was on the defendants to prove that the tithe paid before 1545 in respect of the premises was less than the sum prescribed by the statute, but that they had discharged that onus, and the action failed. TRADE MARKS—Assignment—Connexion with goodwill—Trade Marks Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII., c. 15), s. 22].—The principle that an English trade mark can be assigned only in connexion with the goodwill of the business concerned in the goods for which it has been registered is not satisfied where the owner of the trade mark, being a person who manufactures the goods abroad, assigns it to his sole wholesale agents in England together with the goodwill of the business of importing the goods into England and selling them in this country. In such a case the assignment is invalid unless made in connexion with the goodwill of the manufacturing and vending business of the assignor, and the trade mark, unless the assignment is so made, becomes deceptive in the hands of the assignee and is liable to be expunged from the register.—LACTEOSOTE, LIMITED v. ALBERMAN [Clauson, J.] 336

Registration — Distinctiveness — Red lines woven into canvas fire hose—Goods manufactured for export only—Trade Marks Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII., c. 15), s. 9 (5)—Trade Marks Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 79), s. 7].—Application was made to register as a trade mark for canvas fire hose three red lines or stripes woven into the hose. The mark had been used by the applicants for many years in connexion with woven fire hose which they manufactured and marked in this country for export, but they had never used, and did not intend to use, the mark in this country otherwise than by attaching it to goods manufactured for export, the applicants' reason for desiring registration here being to facilitate registration in other countries, and the grounds of their application being that the mark was in itself distinctive and that it had not been used by others. The applicants called evidence to show that the mark had come to be identified with their goods in America and Germany, and they offered at the hearing to submit to a limitation confining the use of the mark to goods for export to the United States and Canada. The Registrar refused the application on the ground that, though the identical arrangement of coloured lines had not been used in this country, the mark was not adapted to distinguish the applicants' goods, in view of the use of one or more lines by other manufacturers in the same trade in this country to denote quality or ownership, as distinguished from origin. Held, that there was no ground for interfering with the discretion of the Registrar on the question of distinctiveness and that therefore the registration of the mark, if for use in this country, was rightly refused, and that it did not become registrable by reason of the applicants' having consented to a condition that they would use it only in certain countries abroad. Registration — Invented word — Similarity—Calculated to deceive].—An application by a Liverpool oil merchant to register the invented word "Nuvol" as a new mark in respect of illuminating, heating, and lubricating oils was opposed by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, who had registered the invented word "Nujol" as a trade mark in respect of medicinal preparations for human use and had for several years past sold in this country under that name a preparation of refined paraffin, and was refused by the Registrar. Held, that the applicant had failed to discharge the onus which was upon him of showing that the proposed trade mark was not calculated to deceive. Decision of Court of Appeal (43 R.P.C., 313) affirmed.—MCDOWELL v. STANDARD OIL COMPANY (NEW JERSEY) [H.L.] 592

TRADE NAME—Passing off—Jaeger clothing—Change of meaning of word "Jaeger"—Confusion—Injunction].—A limited company was formed in England, over 40 years ago, for the sale of Jaeger sanitary clothing and bedding. At that time the word "Jaeger" as applied to such goods meant goods made in accordance with the principles enunciated by Professor Gustav Jaeger—i.e., goods made of animal fibre. The company's business was carried on subject to agreements entered into between the company and Professor Jaeger and certain German companies. In 1925 the plaintiff company, which consisted of members of Professor Jaeger's family who had been introduced into the business formerly carried on by him, opened a retail shop in London, and in 1926 they commenced an action against the defendant company for a declaration that they were entitled to use the word "Jaeger" upon and in connexion with articles of clothing and analogous goods and to carry on business in the sale of such goods under the style of Prof. Dr. G. Jaeger, provided that they took reasonable precautions to distinguish their goods from those of the defendants. The defendants by their counterclaim sought an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from passing off their business or goods as those of the defendants by the use of the name "Jaeger" or otherwise. Held, that the meaning of the word "Jaeger," as applied to goods of this nature, had ceased in this country to be descriptive and had come to denote the goods of the defendants; that the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration, qualified, however, by the insertion, after the word

TRADE UNIONS—Political objects—Expenditure of general funds on such objects—Statutory provision for making of rules—Alleged breach of statutory restrictions—Complaint to Registrar as to breach of rules—Cause of action—Trade Union Act, 1913 (2 and 3 Geo. V., c. 30), ss. 1, 3 (1) (3)].—By s. 3 (1) of the Trade Union Act, 1913, restrictions are imposed on the application of the funds of a trade union for the political objects specified in subsection (3), unless the furtherance of those objects has been approved as an object of the union and by a resolution of the nature mentioned in subsection (1) and unless rules approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies are in force providing that any payments in furtherance of those objects are to be made out of a particular fund, referred to in the Act as the political fund of the union. It is also provided that any member may, by appropriate notice, obtain exemption from any obligation to contribute to the political fund; and no prejudice, disability, or disadvantage is to attach to the non-contributing member by reason of his claiming that exemption. A valid resolution was passed by the defendant trade union under the section, and rules approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies providing for the matters referred to in subsection (1) were in force. In an action by a non-contributing member against the union for an alleged breach of the statutory restrictions by expending part of their general funds on the political objects to which the section applies, Held, that as the conditions precedent imposed by the section had been complied with, the statutory restrictions had ceased to operate, and the action failed, the plaintiff's only cause of action (if any) being for a breach of the rules. Semble, where a non-contributing member has made to the Registrar of Friendly Societies under s. 3 (2) a complaint of a breach of the rules and the Registrar has dismissed the complaint, such member has no cause of action for the breach of the rules which was the subject of the complaint to the Registrar.—FORSTER v. having as its object the imposing of restrictive conditions on the conduct of the motor trade. The claim was substantially for conspiracy. No member of the Association incurred any liability beyond payment of his subscription, and each member was expressly exempted from liability for the acts of the officers and the other members. The Association was a shifting body, some entering and some leaving it. On the defendants' application the Master made two orders, (1) dismissing the action against the defendants in a representative capacity on the ground that the claim was not sustainable in law, and (2) amending the writ and subsequent proceedings by striking out the words which stated that the defendants were sued on behalf of the Association. Held, that since the persons to be represented had no common interest with the defendants, as required by Order XVI., r. 9, the orders of the Master were right. Held, further, that the immunity conferred by s. 4 (1) of the Trade Disputes Act, 1906, upon trade unions, "whether of workmen or masters," in respect of torts, is not confined to unions of workmen or masters, but extends to any union which has the object of imposing restrictive conditions on the conduct of a trade, since such an object is a "statutory object" under s. 1 (2) of the Trade Union Act, 1913, and the definition of "trade union" in s. 2 of the Act of 1913, as including "any combination . . . the principal objects of which are under its constitution statutory objects," applies to a trade union under the Act of 1906. TREATY OF PEACE — Debt incurred before outbreak of war — Austrian creditor — Norwegian debtor — Action by creditor incompetent—Treaty of Peace Order, s. 7].—The defendant, a Norwegian subject, living in England, incurred a debt to the plaintiffs, an Austrian company, before the outbreak of war. After the Treaty of Peace the plaintiffs sued the defendant for the amount. The Judge in chambers made an order striking out the claim, on the ground that the only right to sue for the debt was in the Administrator of Austrian property. The plaintiffs appealed. It was admitted on their behalf that any money recovered by them would be subject to the provisions of the Peace Treaty and the charge thereby created. Held (per Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that although the claim was against a neutral subject, yet, as s. 7 of the Treaty of Peace Order made the debt payable to the Administrator and transferred to him all the rights of the creditors, the plaintiffs had no right to bring the action. In an action against the defendant by the other trustee to make the defendant accountable to the trust estate for the money so received, Held, that as the defendant, though he honestly believed himself to be entitled to do what he had done, had increased his remuneration by virtue of his trusteeship, the rule that a trustee may not make any profit out of his trust applied to the case, and the action succeeded.—WILLIAMS v. VENDOR AND PURCHASER — Receipt for purchase-money — Power to give — Sole trustee of Darkest England Scheme—Surplus revenue—Temporary investment in land—Sale—"Settlement"—"Capital money"—Whether signatures of two trustees required—Settled Land Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 18),

VENDOR AND PURCHASER] PAGE
ss. 29, 94, 95].—The sole trustee of the Darkest England Scheme, connected with the Salvation Army, is not precluded by anything in the Settled Land Act, 1925, from being able alone to give a valid receipt to the purchasers of land in which surplus revenue of the scheme has been temporarily invested. The deed poll constituting the scheme is not made a "settlement" by the Act, and the purchase-money on such a sale is not "capital money" within the Act and is not thereby required to be paid to at least two trustees.—IN RE BOOTH AND THE SOUTHEND-ON-SEA ESTATE COMPANY'S CONTRACT [Astbury, J.] 334

WATERWORKS — Liability of undertakers—Threatened injury to property—Right of owners to bring quia timet action—Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 17), s. 27].—Section 27 of the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847, does not merely save the right of the owners of property injured by the authorized waterworks to bring a common law action for damages, but leaves the undertakers liable to all legal proceedings which before the Act were open to such owners for protection against damage or injury arising from the works, whether such damage or injury is actual or threatened. It is therefore open to the owners of property threatened with injury by the authorized works to bring a quia timet action to restrain the undertakers from doing an act which threatens to injure such property.—GRAIGOLA MERTHYR COMPANY, LIMITED v. SWANSEA CORPORATION [Tomlin, J.] 600

WILL—Construction—Charity—Gift of residue—Probable surplus — General charitable intention—Whether an intestacy as to surplus not immediately required].—A testator, who died in 1916, by his will made in 1913 left the residue of his personal estate on certain trusts for the benefit of the inhabitants of a small village, the trustees being directed to make loans without interest to the poor and deserving, no loan to exceed £100, no borrower to receive more than one loan, and the period for repayment not to exceed nine years. The testator directed that any surplus should be invested from time to time by the Charity Trustees. So far as could be foreseen there was bound to be a surplus as the number of possible borrowers was small and the residue was valued at about £20,000. Held, that as there was a general intention on the part of the testator to devote the residue to charity, and as it was conceivable, though not probable, that all the loan fund might be required, there was no intestacy as to the surplus not immediately required for the purposes of the charity.—IN RE MONK—GIFFEN v. WEDD [C.A.] 256

Construction — Condition against marrying a blood relation — Avoidance — Probable prohibition of marriage—Public policy].—A testator left his residuary estate to his son

for life, with remainder to his son's children provided that he did not marry a blood relation; and there was a gift over in the event of the son's doing so. Held, that the proviso was not annexed to the gift of the life interest, and that the condition as to the defeat of the interest of the son's children, in the event of the son's marrying a blood relation, was void on grounds of public policy, as leading to a probable prohibition of marriage, since it would be almost impossible to ascertain definitely that any particular woman was not a blood relation.—IN RE LANYON—LANYON v. LANYON [Russell, J.] 714

Construction — Specific bequest — All rights in connexion with play—Contract to sell film rights—Executory at testator's death—Sale completed by executors—Whether legatee entitled to the purchase-money].—A testator, who was the absolute owner of the copyright in English of a play, made a specific bequest of "all my rights to or in connexion with the play." Before the testator's death his agent accepted the offer of a company to purchase the film rights in English-speaking countries for £1,500. The testator's executors assigned these film rights to the company in consideration of the payment of that sum. Held, that the donee of the specific bequest was entitled to the £1,500.—IN RE BANCROFT—BANCROFT v. BANCROFT [Russell, J.] 591

Construction—Specific legacy—"My piano"—Sale of article after date of will—Subsequent purchase of similar article—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict., c. 26), s. 24].—A testatrix, who at the time when she made her will had an ordinary piano that had been converted into a player-piano, made in her will a bequest of "my piano." The testatrix afterwards bought a new motor player-piano, and the old piano was sold and removed from her residence, and was not in her possession at her death. Held, that as the particular piano bequeathed had been sold before the death of the testatrix the specific legatee was not entitled to the motor player-piano.—IN RE SIKES—MOXON AND ANOTHER v. CROSSLEY AND OTHERS [Clauson, J.] 57

Probate — Motion to exclude clauses—Alleged offensiveness—No defamation of an individual—Motion refused.—IN THE ESTATE OF CAIE [Hill, J.] 697

Probate — Non-discovery for 20 years—Possession by executrix — Discovery after death of executrix—Suspicion from fact that executrix did not put will forward — No suspicion attaching to document itself — Onus of proof as to revocation—Judgment pronouncing for will].—By a will which was made in 1890, and in which the attestation clause was in order, the testatrix appointed E. M. D. executrix, the sole beneficiary under the will being A. M. D., an illegitimate daughter of E. M. D. In 1900 the plaintiff married A. M. D. In 1905 the testatrix died, and, the will not having come to light, letters of administration as on an intestacy were granted to her brother. Although by 1908 E. M. D. knew of the testatrix's death, she did not propound the will. In April, 1924, E. M. D. died. In July, 1924, the testatrix's brother died, leaving a will making the defendant his sole legatee, and in 1925 the defendant, in the month of March, was appointed administratrix de bonis non. Also in 1925, more than a year after the death of E. M. D., the plaintiff discovered the will of 1890 in a desk that had belonged to E. M. D. In October, 1925, the plaintiff's wife died. The plaintiff then propounded the will of 1890 as the personal representative of his deceased wife, and he asked for a revocation of the grant of administration de bonis non. The defendant put the plaintiff to the proof of the testatrix's knowledge and approval of the contents of the will and claimed that the grant of letters of administration de bonis non be handed out to her (the defendant). Held, that although from the conduct of E. M. D. in not putting the will forward there might be a suspicion that there must have been some condition subsequent under which the will, though in itself a valid testamentary document, ceased to be effective, yet, as no suspicion attached to the will itself or to its terms, and therefore the fact of execution was sufficient proof of the testatrix's knowledge and approval of its contents, and as the burden of proving revocation was on the defendant and had not been discharged, there must be judgment pronouncing for the will and revoking the Seaman's will — Writing on eggshell—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict., c. 26), s. 11].—The defendant's husband, who was a pilot on the Manchester Ship Canal, executed a will in ordinary form in 1920, and after his death in 1925 the defendant found in his bedroom on the top of a wardrobe an empty eggshell on which was written in her husband's handwriting, in indelible ink, "17—1925. Mag. Everything i possess.—J.B." The initials of the name of the defendant's husband were "J.B." and he always called her "Mag." The plaintiffs, as executors, propounded the will of 1920, and the defendant, alleging that the will of 1920 had been revoked by her husband's true last will, made in 1925 while at sea—namely, the writing on the eggshell—claimed a grant of letters of administration with the will of 1925 annexed. Held, (1) that without the aid of evidence from extrinsic circumstances the writing on the eggshell could not be deemed to be a testamentary disposition, (2) that it was not proved to have been made at a time when the testator's position corresponded to that of a soldier in expeditione, and the Court must pronounce against the alleged will of 1925 and in favour of the will of 1920.—Hodson and Another v. Barnes (Barnes and Others Intervening) [Lord Merrivale, P.] 71
